Regarding leadership, in order to face an ever more dynamic process of development, to perceive differently the change and its specific effects (often times debilitating), it is necessary to focus on an experience of judgment brilliantly systematized and on the processing effort of what is part of your cognitive universe. The power of adapting the imaginary to the conditions of accessible reality through the usual methods of experimental and logical science must exist in your consciousness.

Something impossible to understand and accomplish can only correspond to a world of imagination that builds a virtual space from which you can observe everything without being noticed, from which you cannot go any further. The scientist enters this space, sees the moment or a small circle around this moment, integrates himself into a new image of man and society, then returns in the immediate vicinity of reality with a vision that goes from up to down, not the other way around.

Leadership is a science of thought and accomplishment imposing itself through the succession of revelations. And if you want to turn this science into a space of creative reinventing, opposite to every form of conventionalism, then you have to enter the game of self-reinventing through the courage of fighting something that seems almost impossible to understand and conceive. Sooner by soliciting the madness of believing in something higher than the limits of reason.

Every supporting piece of the power structure that defines you, through inductive reasoning, through observations of "transfer of reflections", it becomes a declaration of originality and self-confidence in a world in which competition is becoming increasingly fierce.

Can you represent yourself as a feature of the philosophy of evolution of science from the perspective of a vision that gains in persuasion only through the imaginative substrate?

The power of creation is very likely to fade in the face of sincere dedication, especially if the artist fails to materialize the revelation of new evidence or new concealments.

These two constants of integration in scientific research – evidence and concealments – blamed on an accumulation of information obtained from the analysis of coordinates defining new principles, concepts or terms, have a certain weight on the effectiveness of manifestation of a new culture of thinking. We refer to a culture that does not inhibit the creation of a new generation that can inspire a real trend in the field.

Faster development of innovative images of reality, leaving room for a greater level of diversity and complexity of the production of individualized creations, may increase awareness of the role of leadership – because of the fact that it leaves way for reflections and thoughts to manifest freely. Communicating the value of personal communication can be achieved by the communication of a thinking of the unthinking, weaving the meanings of an abstract art, reduced or absent in the great equation of the development of a higher culture.

Reinventing yourself is the result of the experience of interpreting the message of revelations brought about by the act of creation into an affirmation of the vital impulse, desire and thirst to give meaning to a complex reality.

The Creative Act of Reinventing is closely connected with the method of "transfer of reflections" type of observations through which you assume the exploitation of science in the name of an ideology of renewal, which in turn launches an approach or proposes an unusual point of view.

The Creative Aura

Raise your leadership to the rank of art, by suggesting people to choose and accept that color-giving energy that would unlock their potential.

I have met her when I was a student in the first year, on the end of the first semester. She was a student, like me, only to another faculty. Very intelligent, cultivated, not the type of girl full of she and hypocritical, which I have enjoyed and also appeased me. She was also very beautiful, medium-statured, with the figure of a child, sweet and playful brown eyes, thin brown eyebrows, arched, fine nose, a bit sharp, slightly fleshy lips and a look full of mystery. Without makeup, being dresses modest but elegant. She seemed devoid of flaws. And how much youth was in her smile. However, she was still inspiring a certain maturity.

I've seen her too seldom to say that I know her well enough. Nevertheless, the first time I saw her in the university library, I realized that she was superior to me in several respects. I carefully watched her, she has not noticed and because of this she has not notified herself about it. She was right in the desk before me. Something aroused a lot my interest. She was writing something. I did not know what. She stood over her copybook. It seemed to me that she was hiding something. As if she had created a small territory encircled by invisible barriers, in which she was retreating. Because she seemed so absorbed in what she wrote, I bent my gaze on her copybook, hoping to glimpse the mystery. Have I done something that cannot be forgiven? I do not think so.

She was living in the world of imagination, was writing a poem. A love poem. Her words were matching so easy, made sense, had rhyme and sometimes became beautiful expressions. She was not repeating herself. The metaphors that she intelligently planted among the short verses conducted me to unseen spaces, in a fairytale world: with brave knights, beautiful princesses, fairies and goblins. It was a genuine creation, but the theme was similar to that of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" by William Shakespeare.

Leadership: Are you able to acquire the defining understanding of what you are in an exercise of admiration for a remarkable figure, illuminated by the revelation of the essence of art that is spiritually assimilated by an act of visual interrogation?

I was watching carefully as she wrote. Something was holding my eyes targeted over her. I do not know what. An unseen, mysterious force. Oh, what a girl ! I felt that if I would stay longer around her and I will be able to be like her, creative, spontaneous, inventive, unique and extraordinary. I wanted to know what went through her head and thoughts, to know how were coming her ideas, how she managed to write so beautifully, so fast and so well. Just as a writer once said, a young girl is a born teacher and you can always learn something from her.

In that moment, with a lot of enthusiasm and a crazy appetite, I wanted to learn from her to write. But, not writing poems, but to be creative, to have ideas, for my mind to run faster and faster, knowing that only creative people manage to go far. In that moment, such like from a stream that has dried up a long time, was overflowing in me an unrestrained creative joy. Three words sounded more and more loudly in my ears, more often: knowledge, inventiveness, success. Successful people have the advantage that they are intelligent, ingenious, quickly find ideas and know how to build something from scratch.

I never talked to anyone about that day when I became a writer. Unfortunately, I have not kept in touch with her although we have understood each other very well. We have not seen each other for a long time. For nearly six years. I remember only a few things about her. I would like very much to see her again. She knows that I have written several books. She found out recently. I suspect that she is still surprised. Probably she wonders how I managed it. Will she ever find my secret?

Leadership: Do you have to respect a way of expressing a sense of closeness to someone, allowing you to experiment with the creation called "the compromise of accepting another version of reality"?

My attempt to express my potential was as if I would choose a color that transformed me completely ! It was the color that highlighted the useful part from me, just as a painter is served by certain tones and shades to highlight certain features of the model. It was a color that accelerated my whole process of change, increasing my performance, like absorbing any nuances that did not fit my values and beliefs.

My characteristic "color" has been a way of expressing my own feelings. And thanks to Maria that gave me the creative spirit that I needed for showing my skills.

Can you suggest people to choose that "color" that they would consider it part of their being? That color, which may cause them experiences, states, feelings, which would have a positive effect on their psyche, leading to their total transformation? Does your color have the personality of an artist who assumes reality after a model of thought that inspires only by the testimony of his presence?

Raise your leadership to the rank of art, by suggesting people to choose and accept that color-giving energy that would unlock their potential.

Leadership: Can you express what you are in a pure, authentic and powerful way, intensely appealing to the instinctive factor of the sense of mystery that keeps an entire world in suspense to the last moment of life?

A moment in the life of a person can become decisive. For me, that moment was when I met Her. If she were not been the one who would give me the spirit needed to take action, perhaps now things would have been far different. In my heart, I thank her for the influence she had on me. The mystery she scatters around, her unique charm, warm smile and wit, had convinced me to want to get to another level, to get more involved in my career, to be better in terms of professional, more persistent, and not least more creative. Since then, it has not passed a day without writing something, without putting my imagination on the line.

Romanian writer, Cristian Ţurcanu, observes: "The presence of mystery is what gives wings and inspiration to inquiring minds. The mystery's presence and the need to elucidate it is what drives the mind to deepen knowledge and acquire a whole series of qualities. Mystery is that which fascinates, gives depth and savor to any perception. The mystery awakens within us unprecedented dimensions and makes life really interesting. Driving away mystery from our lives is like exiling ourselves in a desert area. If, as you are learning more and more, you realize that you know less and less, it means that mystery is present in your life, and the soul grows freely."

The purpose of a leader is to determine people to believe in him and follow him. He must be a role-model. He must have a power of transformation. He must give people the source of energy and the creative spirit that they need in order to become better and more efficient. He must give them the inspiration that they need.

If people will give all their best of them and will achieve results beyond any expectations it means that they were led by a very good leader. And if they will equate with their leader, then their success will increase significantly.

To accept a new version of reality means accepting to permanently live with the consequence of adopting a form of power that has been created on the background of unmeasured admiration for someone or something.

The Creative Aura is 50% inspiration and 50% perspiration. Between dreaming to achieve something and to put your dream into practice is a big difference. You should always well-evaluate your potential and your possibilities of achievement, the basis from which you start, to be sure that you follow a good path towards the individual accomplishment.

The Creator Of Illusions

On November 17, 2009

Increase your power of persuasion and influence, without falling into the trap of illusions that you create.

I carefully keep in my bookcase a very old book, the strong palm fiber wrapping of which it is sewn with a red line. I cherish it deeply. It is my only connection with its author, a man who will remain forever in the heart of every person who was present at one of his shows, in the weakness and strength in each of them. I know little about him. Because he never told anything about himself or about his past. Furthermore, he discouraged every attempt of incursion in his life. I did not even manage to find his name, there are only a few who know him, because he wanted and knew how to keep his entire existence a secret.

Through the mystery surrounding him, he distinguishes from everybody, and I think that is what makes him memorable. Nevertheless, I, being the only one having a remembrance from him, know how he would like people to call him: "The creator of illusions".

Lights were switched off in the hall. At the left and at the right of the scene, on some small pedestals, four torches were burning with a white-orange flame. The scene seemed to be empty. Silence still reigned over. Then, on the background, a strange music started to play slowly. Almost at order, the drums that increased suspense started to echo. Furthermore, suddenly, HE appeared from nowhere. A Venetian style mask, beautifully elaborated, was hiding his face. The black hooded cape and his black suit, which maintained the mystery, gave him an air of nobility.

The show started. He slowly lifted up in the air. I was mesmerized by the way he flew his cape from the left to the right, as if the cape was helping him to rise. Everything started to feel unreal. He was different from all the other illusionists I had seen on TV. His person seemed to me composed of two distinct parts: one visible part, the other one invisible, probably because of the dark that reigned over the hall. I could not realize if his fine performance was really hiding magic or cheatery. He sometimes appeared, sometimes disappeared. However, he was playing his part flawlessly. He certainly saw through me and the other spectators, he knew what we were thinking, and knew how to act. I somehow felt in the middle of the most amazing phantasmagoria of an original illusionist. He was passing over an emotion and an extra-special feeling.

During the entire show I was very attentive. I was hoping, probably like all the other spectators, to discover his tricks. I was not satisfied with the gestures and manoeuvres he was performing, I felt the need to explain myself, to discover what lies behind them. However, my attempts failed. All his secrets, all the illusions he created in that two hours of show will never be known by anyone. Only by HIM – The Creator of Illusions.

Leadership: Do you block or unblock people's potential to reproduce an experience that does not forgive even the smallest error?

The notion of "illusion", the blind trust in an authority with enforcement of an advanced science, has different contents from one system of thought to another. Here are just a few of the most common senses that leadership acquires when subject to requirements of form and substance.

First, early abandonment of real identity separating the two types of content: one that disturbs through its enigmatic character, and one accessible, which impresses and attracts. In this case, the space for the act of transmitting an inspiring and mobilizing message, maximizing the passion for performance, is separated by an invisible barrier from the space of balance that gives meaning to the simplifying approach of the "mysteries'" understanding and exploitation process – i.e. the higher thinking that articulates on a reality difficult to justify, on the axis of a highly sophisticated science.

Then, the gap between people's potential to reproduce an experience that does not forgive even the smallest leaks and the results they can generate from the impact with an explosion of associations, comparisons, equivalents, analogies and valuable feedback, be it positive or negative, necessary to critical mirroring preceding the stage of evolution.

Leadership: Do you set an original relationship, but which does not work by virtue of a coherent self-image?

When it comes to illusion, we think about leaving our comfort zone and entering a supernatural area without a simple analysis of how scarce resources are allocated to achieve a particular unit of "product", whose value people can use abundantly. Let's remember that leadership is a product of science, ethics, culture and practice.

The guidance type of ordinary individuals, depending on the quality of the product offered by the leader after beginning and ending the show named "I am what I am not" or "I know what you don't know" appears as a form of professional failure, leading slowly, but surely, to anxiety. It's a kind of betrayal, a cancelation of reciprocity principles.

Basically, common people, or bystanders, are "crushed" by the authority of a higher, difficult to assess entity. They will internalize without comments an original relationship, but which does not work under the virtue of one's own success image. They will accept with conviction the "fatality" of failure and will weirdly reproduce it in situations that require the awareness of others' needs.

Leadership: Does the miracle of creation experienced by people around you find its most striking expression in the form that establishes a false profound revelation of your world?

The great secret of an illusionist is that he can deflect public attention, after previously having established a connection with his spectators. Just like some modern poets manage to seize ten connotations with a single symbol, he succeeds in redirecting the audience's attention with a single move. I managed to understand why everything goes so well in a successful illusion show. Because the illusionist is a perfectionist. Nothing would turn up perfect if he did not struggle to make everything perfect. It is not that easy to go from one technique to another. It is not that easy to cast spectators off a concrete, objective world into a world of illusions.

Illusionism involves a great number of materials, team work and a huge effort. Everything that can be embodied and seized through human senses must be modified in such a way that it cannot be perceived any longer.

In this kind of a show, everything must seem real. Everything has to be convincing. It must be clear. So clear that the mystery would become even bigger. Even if the spectators are trying to find a plausible explanation, it should not be found. Observing is not a matter of choice. The public should not perceive reality, but something that does not exist. The reality is complemented by various sounds, smells, feelings or even physical elements, for the illusionist to succeed in detracting the spectators' attention and perceptions. It is not about making tricks, but getting the audience along elsewhere, in order to suspend their beliefs.

Self-image is how you see yourself in an absolute and immutable reality, inaccessible to rational knowledge, in which everything you emanate and emit returns back to you.

Leadership: Can you claim to grow as "an artist of the stage" without daring to compare what you still have to learn from what works, rather than from what fails?

Illusionists are also people. They have fears, passions, desires and ideals. However, they developed some knowledge and abilities that common people do not possess.

Leaders, just like illusionists have developed some knowledge and abilities that few have. And they know how to use them very well in order to ensure their rise and to impose their supremacy. Even so, the biggest mistake a leader can make is that of leading people to a wrong direction, after redirecting their attention, by imposing his personal reality.

There is nothing wrong about imitating an illusionist, in getting into people's heads and captivating their attention, on the contrary, it is advisable for a leader to always arouse their interest. However, people cannot be nourished with "vain illusions". That is the most important thing a leader must pay respect to.

Although a leader is endowed with an unusual illusionist talent, he cannot abuse his position in order to perform tricks. Leadership, even if implies influencing people, it is not an illusionism show for the leader to maintain the illusion of fantasy. A great leader cannot afford to play the "hocus-pocus" when people's lives are at stake. And he cannot rely on optical illusions created by his gestures' ability and velocity, by his hands' perspicacity.

The creator of illusions is the artist who through his whole imagination and dexterity consecrates himself to those things that life and soul poured into it. He is not the man who keeps the secrets of his activity only for personal success out of reasons of selfishness, but rather the man who makes the hidden truths a unique game, an act of control, a matter unpredictable and of powerful emotion which can extract a new perspective approach to art and a new perspective of affirmation.

Leadership, as well-stated someone, is a process through which a person establishes a goal or a direction for one or more persons and causes them to proficiently act together in order to achieve them.

A leader who is not able to distinguish reality from illusion will waste his credibility in time. And if the "show" he performs does not meet people's expectations, his career might turn into a real fiasco.

Conclusion: A leader must start from the existing objective elements, to conceive concrete, feasible strategies and approach methods, for only thus he will attract supporters. Furthermore, if those he co-opts will discover that he only possesses a trivial stick called "the magic wand", the so-called leader will soon smash deplorably, completely abandoned. Disappointed, he will feel like a straw floating on turbid waters.

Increase your power of persuasion and influence, without falling into the trap of illusions that you create.

The Creator Of Parallel Worlds

On October 13, 2020

It is enough to go through a story with life, about life, to find an infinite pleasure in the act of sublimely living another life.

I found my spiritual duplication in a symbol associated with perfection, knowing that what is seen with the naked eye is the image of an escape into another world, seen and felt more intensely at the intertextual level, as Immutable Unity. The rose, because it is best associated with the art of transfiguring and spiritualizing creation in its entirety, told me at one point: "I come from a time when there was no need for a pen to learn a clearer understanding of an entire action, but only of a brush cut from the primary reflex of the unique essence."

Of course, the virtue of being closer to the pure state of the Creator must not be absent from the union of artistic expression with the way of organizing the plastic composition. Red + yellow = Orange. And the pen with which I write these words, as well as the brush with which I paint the reality of my world, are just instruments located in the same plane, of artistic construction. The distance from one to the other can be measured with the help of a word that denotes the quality of the brush to spread the color on a higher plane in relation to the descriptive one.

If we want to find this word and translate it into an artistic construction, we must first use the pen and the brush for the same purpose: to measure the length and width of the rose flower, placed in a unifying circle whose circumference is everywhere and whose center is nowhere. I found this word alive, autonomous, invigorating, calling it Axisturenthis, translated "life beyond the mirror of this world", and I added a finding: any change I would make in time, it could be correlated always with the double state of a person, to live and be one with the Creator of the Universal Order.

Leadership: Does an adequate relationship to the wholeness of the creation you are going through spiritually make you recognize the image of the "New Man" in terms of the correspondence between expressiveness and abstraction?

I think I know myself quite well, and the rose confirms my level of knowledge when it bends its stem in front of me, referring to the fact that I would express my feelings in words anyway, they will be a manifestation of the divine plan. I am an artist because that one word that totally defines me, by style and good taste, by the state of emotion I create, is detached from the "art behind art", and only the color of the brush can equal the readability of the content on which I transmit and intertwine with the Primary Reflex of the One Essence.

Therefore, the creation of an artist is the word written with a pen from Adam, in the form of an allegory, composed in the amazing manner of a brush to spread the color on a higher plane in relation to the descriptive, and to highlight it spiritually by triggering the inner pulse and capturing it in an artistic form.

In this respect, the interior is legitimate in an artistic creation only if it pivots around a higher plane of existence of matter, in a world of words in whose descriptive structure the brush and pen stand out in relation to their magical form of generating always new interpretations of man's relationship with nature.

The same two brushes make the artistic writing pass through a divine plan, bearing the mark of the rose, located in the immediate vicinity of the correspondence between the arts – the plastic and the literary. In this way, I will try to define "the integrity of creation" as a meeting of two wills (science and art), a combination of free thought and the subtlety of the generous but non-abusive interpretation of an image that can harmoniously shape your soul.

The act of manifesting expressiveness is exercised in a frame of mind that brings together the subject and the artist, making them integrate into art and the "Created Image", like the connection between a character of the narrated world and a character of subjective feelings.

Therefore, expressiveness is the expression of a subjective position towards certain visual-plastic entities, while abstraction, inextricably linked to language, is a simplification of the complex reality by modeling the symbols and their meanings.

Quite naturally, the fundamental property of placing two brushes in the image given by the painter of nature, is to indicate to the pen the plane of the relationship between two characters: a character of the narrated world and a character of subjective feelings related to the experience of uniting creation with God. In the same way, the continuous exercise of writing made through an artistic approach, related to the duality of an abstract dimension, reminds me of what Jorge Luis Borges said about the Argentine poet Evaristo Carriego:

"While Carriego was immersed in thoughts of great importance, worthy of being remembered, something happened. Anything. Something we will not be able to recover, something whose meaning we know, but we do not know its form, something usual and ordinary and unsurprising until then, which revealed to Carriego that the universe (which is given to us in its entirety at any moment, in any place, not only in the works of Dumas) was also there, in that present circumstance, in Palermo, 1904.

A heartbreaking guitar chord, an irregular string of short houses seen out the window. Enter such a house, here are the gods, Heraclitus of Ephesus told those who found him warming themselves by the fire in the kitchen.

Sometimes it occurs to me that any human life, however tangled and rich, consists in reality of a single moment; the moment when man realizes once and for all who he is."

To understand the act of creation in the vision of the Enlightenment, we must first recognize ourselves as creators of a world in which any life, intertwined with other lives, is a correspondence between reality and the representation of the act of painting a story that has become (afterwards) reality.

The Creator Of Parallel Worlds knows that it is enough to go through a story with life, about life, to find infinite pleasure in the act of living another life. To call yourself Creator, you must define and draw the reality of your reflection in another world in which life, like other lives beyond the experience of art that elevates you to the absolute, is a revealing metaphor that signifies the idea of metaphysical knowledge.

The Creator Possessed By The Idea Of His Masterpiece

On September 20, 2014

Conceive a creation that would draw sap from the primary flow of the basic ideas that guide you, so as to take hold of what defines you.

Eisenstein talks – for the moment, in general - about the joy of having at hand a very good script, he is conquered by its simplicity, and declares that his movie will be one about children and adults, for adults and children. However, the one who knows his antecedents, cannot be deceived by the linearity of this start.

His movies, becoming complicated constructions, always meet in their course a fiercely increased arborescence, however, organically, from the substance of the initial idea. It is like the plant eruption in the tropical Mexico, the luxuriant multitude of ideas flooding the whole area of creation, by drawing sap from the primary flow of the basic idea. There is always in the creation of Eisenstein this violent explosion of inspiration, which takes hold on everything, it amplifies in waterfalls, a thought calling dozens more, into a chain reaction, apparently unrestrained, and almost universal, but which is ordered rigorously on the guidelines of a precise mathematical conception of some rigorous pursued perennial preoccupations.

*The stranger is the phenomenon, if we know - and we know it ! - That this creator, as if exclusively possessed by the idea of the movie, has always the power - and the need - to follow alongside any other ideas, different: theoretical abstractions, or just other movie projects.

Leadership: Are you served by the linearity of a start that focuses more on trying to develop a so-called "professional autonomy"?

If you try to make a way alongside the irreproachable concept, according to which the leadership possesses a certain kind of unity, based not only on knowledge, but also on the responsibility to be just yourself in everything you do and think, at any time of the ascension process, you will encounter a series of questions and fears. For always the decision to build a masterpiece of art, put in the service of progress, involves some explosive violence of inspiration, which takes hold on everything you are trying to highlight.

And precisely due to this aspect, often tested in practice, we can talk about leadership as about a need to shape art by the experimental classification of what you commit into a new form of perceiving what you want to offer. Moreover, especially of what it is relevant in applying the thinking. We distance ourselves a bit of this hypothesis and we assume that art is a kind of "restoration" of the man, meeting a different vision, which shows devotion to what it defines, taking hold on what initially appears a burst of joy and life.

The start that you give into leadership development is provided by the joy of having at hand a more simple and consistent way to build up new standards of style and performance. The simplicity is a real explosion of joy. However, this start cannot be activated before fulfilling the basic condition: Defending the professional autonomy against mediocrity (that you can defeat only with the undeniable value of a scientific thinking).

The idea that gives orientation to creation is an emanation of inspiration which is manifested in the form of a pulse that covers the distance from the theoretical abstractions to the forms of artistic expression of wonder towards everything you have achieved.

The leader is a creator, as if exclusively possessed by the idea of his creation, always having the power and the need to follow alongside any other ideas, different: theoretical abstractions, or just other research projects. If things stay like this, then the question arises: Helps him the art to intercept and understand the more comprehensive patterns of vocational adjustment to new requirements of personal transformation?

In general, I think so, but not in the way involving the act of creation and the personal appreciation. There is always in this act an explosive violence of inspiration, which takes hold on everything, including what we call "art". In this case, the leadership becomes a complicated construction, knowing always some variation in the configuration of its structure.

The leadership is focused on trying to develop in yourself a thinking that goes beyond the traditional thinking, by the act of creation, by the force of scientific creation taken until a definitive result for what you become.

The need to follow in parallel ideas other than your own denotes openness to knowledge, a certain sophistication of tastes for the new, a welcome thirst for expression, a certain amount of interest in what others think. You cannot mix two different meanings without getting a third meaning much closer to inventing an art of interpretation and transformation.

Professional autonomy is given by the very power of creation to exist and to produce effects on the guidelines of a precise mathematical conception of perennially and rigorously pursued preoccupations such as those artistic, ideological, and cultural.

Is what defines you the vision of a creation that is rich and is based in relation to the duration, actions and results of your innovation?

The creator possessed by the idea of his masterpiece is the leader, who brings on the professional level something completely personal with the power to overcome himself, creatively multiplying his spheres of knowledge.

If you want your leadership to get a broader value and meaning, if you want to take hold of what defines you, then conceive a creation to draw sap from the primary flow of the basic ideas that guide you. These ideas represent the leap from the extensive to the intensive phase that requires changing the pattern of thinking and the manner in which you express your vision.

The Crime Hidden Within Eligibility

On February 13, 2013

Give your leadership a unique content, so that it corresponds to a clear and easy applicable prediction.

My creation was almost born from the vacuum, was kneaded in illusions and errors, just out of need to give a strong boost to my development. It was the result of an excessive approach, which sometimes defied all logic, all reasoning. Supported by resettable certainties, pervaded by an hardly accessible content for all those simplicem plebem.

The signal of exclusivity. The need to generate new and more nuanced perceptions, ensuring and evolution and its resorts – well focused for the prefiguration of a sustainable future. Thoughts. Preferences. Fixations. Own rules. Designed to reveal hidden truths, to spread some unexpected and absolute realities, to build a different horizon – in favor of promoting another kind of leadership.

When you try to give life to an idea, out of nothing, you can happen to cling to the things that are really important throughout a lifetime. And this comprehensive creation, this integrator of authenticity, the spring of my will to redefine a perspective of accelerated change, was acting as a factor that conditioned the development of elusive phenomena. Phenomena hidden under the mask of normality, which tended to corrupt even the noblest consciences, creating at times some kind of unbalance.

No one and nothing could prevent me to promise that this research, my young creation, will change the world.

Leadership: Where do you find yourself in relation to the idea of a special creation that has laboriously made a reputation of itself for being prone to a lot of other possible variants that you can only attribute to the hazard?

One child boasts that he witnessed a murder. A few hours later, this child dies. At first glance, it seems to be just a strange coincidence, the irony of fate, an isolated case. But as well, some minds would think that it is a demonic intervention, a conspiracy of evil. A terrible misfortune, a game of chance, a natural phenomenon? An exaggeration, an obvious reality that escapes our control?

And there are a lot of other possible options that we can assign the incident.

"It's not so easy now to determine what is true and what is not ! ", would note with regret even detective Hercule Poirot, rubbing his moustache.

And so my whole creation. Like an arrow, it seemed to be crossed from one end to the other of a blend of sense and nonsense – abstract thought, but they could also be brilliant. Putting to the test the patience and the power of understanting of even the most enlightened minds.

These minds virtually witnessed a globalization phenomenon of certain sensitive items of knowledge, of an innovation of which you could doubt, of an "artistic construct" with many question marks. Very few people could realize the true significance that the content of my creation reflected.

The hazard that determines you to place yourself in a continuous beginning of scientific research, in order to create something from scratch, is the measure of the feeling of being caught by the surprises of a large event.

Because indeed, it was "a crime", an offense to aesthetics and refinement, because I attributed a too complex and subtle meaningto my creation. I gave it a pure coloratura that enriched, combined alchemicaly with my own structure, my conscience and the values that I promoted, supported and implemented in my actions. Solely by my lead, freely, but in a very rebellious and condensed way.

I did not know where I was going if I did a comparison, an analogy, a concordance with the influence of the outside that completely surrounded me. However, I was tempted by the mystery of what lies beyond the limits of life, the mystery of what there is beyond the appearances of material existence, beyond the appearances of an eternal normality, the fact of allowing myself to get lost and then found in a labyrinth of unnecessary elements, the deformed mirrors, a labyrinth of wandering from which you can only release yourself through imagination.

Yes, imagination is a black square in blinding whiteness, the only means of filling a hole with symbols and suggestion. Where there is nothing, something can be added, an interpretation can be attributed. And something still comes out of the magician's hat. The surprise of a big event is given by the magician's power to perform extraordinary operations, that of managing to dazzle the public, to break them away from reality for a little bit, so that afterwards to offer clear evidence regarding the different aspects of reality.

As a capacitor connected to a direct current source, the horizon of my own knowledge was connected to the positive terminal of a creation, the resultant of which allowed the confirmation of a prediction, resulting from a lot of other possibilities.

Leadership: What is the nature of your "crime" vis-à-vis the recognition of a creature started from scratch and finished with the approval of a power that no one has and only you can control?

Is your work crossed from one end to the other of a mixture of sense and nonsense? Is it an integrator of authenticity? Is it a completion that raises many questions? Is it supported by resettable certainties, pervaded by an easy accessable and digestible content?

The nature of my "crime" in the space of creation refers to the attempt to give meaning to unintelligible events, my mistake lies in not paying attention to the message of the universe that says: "no one is allowed to change the structure of matter, the predetermined order of things, no one should embrace the intelligence of matter." I violated a grave law of the universe, but I was absolved of any blame because of the courage of measuring my forces with a superior entity, which in turn also made me divine.

A perfect leadership appears to others as a genuine revelation – in order of urgency and complexity, as unit distinguishing itself from all others, as a way of expression and openness to new, as a way of asserting your individuality. Such an "integrator of authenticity" naturally becomes a transmittable code – designed to attract as many supporters, a continuous test to check your functionality and your level of reporting to their demands and requirements, helping you to clarify the "representations" of the essence of your knowledge.

These representations of your own values and belief system, extensive differentiation or mediation processes between concept and perception, come to your help to make the evolution of your creation more visible. For a perfect fit of your knowledge in the "concrete" of the understanding ability of your supporters. Therefore, it is necessary to monitor their understanding ability, and at the same time, to give a boost to adjust your ability to relate, communicate and convey the so-called "adhesive knowledge".

The power that no one has and only you can control is the imagination of an answer to the question: "are you able to allow yourself to be caught up in the adventure of wandering in an endless labyrinth where any sense is lost?"

The Crime Hidden Within Eligibility highlights the risk that you expose your work to during its activation and promotion on a large scale among your supporters – but also the general public. You can always be held accountable for the possibility of being incomprehensible, just as Don Quixote has experienced the drama of being misunderstood, of being ridiculed.

The idea of "crime" solves one of the issues that leadership aestheticians often subject to attention. The crime of which you can make yourself responsible in this whole process of promoting leadership is "immanence absolutization", if I can call it that way, by means of concepts, truths, meanings, revelations which, unsurprisingly in this mixer of knowledge and competitiveness consumption, cannot be dwelling in the mind and soul of those around you.

Do you commit a cultural, ideological or intellectual crime? Is it easy to determine what is true and what is not in the leadership that you promote?

Always be receptive to others' ability to assimilate your knowledge. Fight for promoting your leadership, but shoot only with convincing guns, specific to their level of understanding.

Give your leadership a unique content, so that it corresponds to a clear and easy applicable prediction.

The Cross Will Help Us Triumph

On March 04, 2009

Use your skill to capitalize on the concrete conditions of exerting a decisive influence on the world, until your story reaches the essence of a reality that deserves to be reflected in the memory of time.

- They came here hoping to destroy us. Yet again we overwhelmed numerically.

Cortes raised his voice.

- But just think for how many times we've been faced with the same situation in the past months. Did we not we fight an equally frightening force on the Tabasco River? And did we not triumph? Remember the Texcaltecs and the cannons and cavalry that Narvaez was waiting for us with at Cempoallan !

Cortes paused for a moment.

- We have always triumphed because we are not ordinary people or soldiers. Now you can all proudly say that you are Cortes' soldiers. In the years to come, ballads will be composed that will sing of our bravery. Because not only your courage, but also your skill in handling weapons, sets you apart from ordinary mortals. Remember that you have been chosen by God Himself to march under His banner.

Leadership: Are you influenced by the tendency to assign value to an event that is uncertain regarding the implementation of a plan, but which is effective in conveying a motivational message?

To strengthen his words, Cortes raised the blue-and-white flag, which had once fluttered on the mast of his ship.

- The cross will help us triumph ! And now I would like to tell you one more thing: remember that you are at an advantage as long as you have the strength to fight. These Mexicans do not want to kill you, but to take you prisoners for their pagan rituals and that is why they are more vulnerable. As you know very well, they will not fight as a united army, but individually. Today you will not be dealing with a united army, but with individuals. Today you will not be dealing with a battle, but with a series of duels. I believe God will give you the strength to resist. Stick the swords directly at the target, do not turn them blindly over your head, so as not to expose yourself to their sticks and knives.

Cortes stopped, waiting for his words to take effect on his soldiers.

- In the centuries to come, when people write the history of the world, we will occupy a glorious chapter ! They will speak of this day until the end of the world and you will be remembered as heroes. Therefore, gentlemen, let us prepare and face the enemy. When I give you the signal, we will attack and win !

Leadership: Are you ready to experience a sense of belonging to a WHOLE, integrating your self-knowledge in a context of unhindered action and acceptance of consequences?

The category of leadership attributed to the burden of approaching a conflict zone can be defined as a kind of enlivening of a person motivated by obtaining the approval of others to achieve an important goal. The moment of approaching a conflict zone, but with possible material or spiritual benefits, can determine the leader to transgress (through the consciousness of belonging to a fulminating historical event) all the obstacles of space and time.

So, in order to complete the physiognomy of this important phenomenon of great spiritual force, through which the leader assumes the task of writing a new page of history, we must look at things not only from great heights or far reaches, but also from great depths.

How does Cortes feel when he knows that history will be written by the hand of a hero who, in the presence of the materiality of a human body, will become immortal through the power of his decisive deeds? And what does he feel can be attributed to a consciousness that systematically relies on individuality, or the Whole?

The whole that defines leadership is the sum of all the forces that act in unison to accomplish a goal meant to change the destiny of the world.

Cortes feels that deep connection with each of his soldiers, as Jesus did with his disciples, and if he can't ignore that fatality of the end of the road, at least he can successfully make his way to the point where history turns into a true legend.

Therefore, operating with the very concept of "fatality", and trying to investigate the evolution of man from within, "from the depths", intuiting the feeling he inspires and has towards life, we can offer the revelation of the inner genesis of the original phenomenon of the expression: "identification in a context of renunciation of individualism".

Often the man who wants to commit heroic deeds because of a powerful experience that exceeds the threshold of ordinary experience, is a man who raises his own person to the rank of ideal, that ideal of glory and greatness that intoxicates you with despair and unconsciousness. But at other times, the man, seized by a restless ardor to achieve something great, is good enough to support the feelings of identification with the group, asserting his superiority (with splendid consistency) over a basic rule of victory: "The first and greatest victory is to defeat yourself."

The essence of the reality that deserves to be reflected in the memory of time is the following: a deed that does not impress by its greatness, so that does not have the necessary scope to involve all human, natural and divine forces to change the destiny of the world, will never last as a posthumous mirror of its initiator.

The Cross Will Help Us Triumph if we are determined enough to accomplish a goal to which the world itself and God are obliged to accept it as a change of the world for the benefit of its progress.

The Crystalline Edifice Of Alchemy

On August 18, 2013

Handle well the strings supporting science, so as to reach without repercussions the maximum point of your transformative power.

To evolve towards the inaccessible purity, to the crystalline edifice of alchemy, the so fascinating microcosm where the philosopher's stone was found, I had to put into practice the motto by which functionality and motricity constantly self-sustain to the maximum, reaching that unique tension generating and modifying matter, and creating a clear reality.

It was just a blossom of thought rapidly spreading information from entrance to exit, at the present time, and an exploitation of the access link of the future. So neither the information from the coordinates of the future was impossible to extract. That information was, indeed, the first element from the basis of my knowledge, which, if well-structured and placed on a*rotationis-retexamus* type network, could have provided new elements about certain processes and phenomena underlying alchemy.

Unlike other alchemists, who had to implement the motto "obscurum per obscurius, ignotum per ignotis" in order to evolve towards the inaccessible purity, I had already reached the maximum point of matter's transformative power. I had managed to eliminate the excess of energy allowing matter to behave and act in a certain way, keeping constant the percentage of stable substances assumption. In the state of composition, the matter tended to participate in rapid reactions, releasing heat, which took place in the solid phase of coordination compounds.

The mysterious ways of alchemy disagreed, often losing the primary revelation that led to developing an accurate map, hiding the entrance to the secret place where the philosopher's stone was. I had imagined the map by the same extraction patterns of uranium from quarries and from underground.

Leadership: Does your perception of the science you represent dependent upon the "beauty and usefulness" of your own universe of thinking that knows how to be special through a spectacular salvation from the embarrassing circumstances of the whole of knowledge?

I left the inaccessible after believing that I mastered this art. But I could not limit my newly acquired teaching only at alchemical practice. Many times I would have had to pass under the overstrained strings of secrets from one bank of science to the other, risking to hang my flagpoles and not recognize the unique characteristics of truth stripped of all illusion, and to reach the maximum point of disgust towards myself.

If the fire of knowledge got out of control, he could consume much of everything that I had understood. As a result, the photolysis of live water, chemically transformed into palpable powder, under the effect of a natural pulverization, should have been fast enough to reduce to level 3, on a scale of 1 to 5, in order to prevent the spread of fire.

Even alchemists are small, vulnerable and seem to have no significance to the Great Work. The amazing potential of their power of extraction of the essence from the philosopher's stone, unrefined in open fire, can be lost if the strings on which the alchemy's crystalline edifice is raised are overstrained.

Leadership: How much can you expand your selection and balance of creative resources without triggering a delusion in the forefront of a consciousness that wants to be free and evolved?

Can you train your mind by exploiting the access link to the future? Can science supply you with new elements about specific processes or phenomena underlying your evolution? When exactly do you think that you will perfectly master the art of leadership?

Given the lack of access to valuable information sources, useful for outlining a comprehensive science, beyond any beliefs and limitations, you can appeal to superior values of creation to which you obey. The selection and balancing operations of your available creative resources, analyzing the "up and down" effects that may reduce the value of leadership, indicate situations when you are faced with choices than cannot be quickly converted into results.

But as long as there is the "inaccessible", the awareness of the incomplete character of your science, there cannot exist anything harmful. On the contrary, it can result into a simulation of the creative consumption by crediting new and more selective information, not only referring to leadership development in relation to what is new and what is produced in the material plane, but especially to its highly complex structural composition, so to the number of rigorously delimited steps, traversed in order to reach the construction of another content, namely to facilitate decisions that lead to its achievement.

Leadership: Can your science be subjected to transformation through a set of relationships and conditions that turn its feelings and experiences into a strange mixture of logic and creativity in the symbolic construction of reality?

A usable measure of leadership content, by modifying or adding new settings related to the creative mechanism, is the rapid spread of information forward, from entrance to exit. At this stage, "the blossom of thinking" occurs, with the ability to distinguish each direction to follow, to concentrate all available resources and exploit new opportunities. So the information is, indeed, the first element of knowledge that, if it is well-structured and placed on a certain level of development, can create the adequate conditions for creation.

Your science may be subject to transformation by a set of relations and conditions, resulting in the implementation or in the failure to implement leadership only if it turns into a "threat", aiming to intimidate or endanger what you have created. A successful art work, as leadership should be, having certain effects of expansion or contraction, with the ability to cancel each other, must fall into certain patterns of thinking, shared as outcome, and encourage the spread of certain ideas.

In order to acquire mastery in the art of leadership, limit your newly acquired teaching only to a deep practice, validated by science and adopted by all types of individuals. If you try to pass under the overstrained strings of secrets from one bank of science to the other, you risk hanging your flagpoles and not recognizing the unique characteristics of truth stripped of all illusion. And if the fire of knowledge gets out of control, it could consume much of everything that you have created. Do you want to reach the maximum point of disgust towards yourself?

Leadership is the whole of knowledge that builds your desired reality through the effects of coincidence and overlapping of some theories or atrophying your subjectivity if someone does not let you take a little of each and do those steps YOURSELF to transfigure reality.

The Crystalline Edifice Of Alchemy, so fragile and illusory, defines that small area where the leader takes refuge, alone with his science and philosophy, to discover "the philosopher's stone", with which, like a magician, will be able to give answers and act appropriately in al problem-situations.

The tendency to persist or to choose the path to such an area, which is inaccessible to the majority, can be dangerous for leaders who fail to master "The Great Work". This foray into the heart of science can destroy like a sand castle all that they have created.

The Dark Shadow Of The Occasional Demon

On December 18, 2013

Place on a higher pedestal the ability to understand yourself, so that you maintain the internal cohesion of your defining structure.

Everything was so intricate, dense as a globular cloud that once it invades your mind, impedes you from thinking clearly and fully appreciating your own thoughts. Gloomy, pierced in the bottom of your being by that feeling of domination that the conscious refuses, but can't fight, I was clinging to some misleading appearances. To that changing minus that I couldn't understand, that I couldn't accept, making me to unreadily join a demonic delirium.

In this one-to-one relationship between disorientation and dizziness, which opened the way to the individual phenomenon of self-loss, the local sizes of the tolerance field harmoniously oscillated with the same pulsation, but with different initial phases. I had to make a distinction between those two perpendicular directions: a cause generative direction and an effect generative direction. And to clarify the authority and responsibility relations that I had with my defining entity.

I didn't realize back then that, similarly to Faust, sold to the Devil, I was searching for impossible things. The Philosopher's Stone of integration in a new structure of becoming, the potential cure of this disintegration tendency of the internal cohesion between my constitutive elements, was just a transitory measure in order to install a relaxing and calming mood. The pressure between reason and despair remained constant; it didn't reach critical levels, nor dropped to the normal accepted level.

Leadership: Do you continue to live through what you have always been, denying what you are in a struggle with the deceptive appearances of a reality that stubbornly resists you?

Completely aware of what was happening to me, I retreated in my own disappointment, in the shadow of a demon, the creation of my own desperate mind, materialized in an intense self-displeasure. It became more and more impossible to cling to something, to an experience, to a reality, to a conviction, to a momentarily inspiration that offers me support in the doubts abyss created by my own thoughts and perceptions.

The reality experienced through the accumulation of question marks beyond natural urges to look at things differently than I thought I knew, and from where this attempt to resist misleading appearances, lies in the shadow of a certain kind of soul deformation such as "A life that lost its focus". It was a kind of weight in the darkness of an immense sadness, a convergence of inner fractures with the great fractures of preferences for finding untapped realms, with which my sensitivity tried to potentiate the intrinsic value of each thing examined in a wider context.

In order to become more self-assured, to reach for the heights of the ability to understand myself, to unite my strengths and values in a wholeness that makes it possible to centrally coordinate all the protection and command functions, I had to explore and discover new approaches of my inner world.

The direction of the interaction resultant with various overwhelming moods had to be identical with the direction of my own personality's component forces. The resultant had to be balance.

Leadership: Do you continue to remain anchored in a deaf displeasure, without changing its effect, or are you ambitious to embrace the immense incidence of being yourself in the exercise of subjective temporality?

Man's guiding light, the biggest trial of character and aptitude that wields personality, often conflicts with the individual phenomenon of losing one's self, which manifests through a constant tension and discomfort feeling, through the lack of value and interest towards the surrounding world. This is the moment when uncertainty is triggered, when man retreats from his activity, annulling his will agreement. His Ego is another, a stranger, an indifferent unknown.

Man's reality, arising from an immense conglomerate of motives, fears, fulfillments or refusals, is supported by these character innovation efforts with the purpose of facilitating access to discovering a beneficial and fertile field for life quality continuation. A limitless tendency towards self-knowledge, but also a materialization of the initiative regarding the apparition, in time, of a new way to perceive life experience; it can mean an enormous advantage for a human functional system that wishes to be improved.

Leadership takes on a new dimension given by taking into consideration the factor called "routine", transformed into a real drudgery at the existential level by individuals who can't project in their thought area a support system. The stability of a direction focused, not on abstract, but on a tangible that "takes a fearless bite" of reality, can provide sufficient pertinent motivations and justifications regarding its discernment, stability and evolutionary level.

Leadership: Do you focus on what is important to surround yourself by looking at things from a number of possible alternatives, without showing your hidden powers in a hostile wasteland?

To continue living by examining things from a range of possible alternatives without showing your hidden powers in a hostile wasteland means accepting the terms of using a reality that extends beyond your understanding without thinking what people around you say.

The way a man acts or thinks can change in time, based on the nature of his internal processes that occur during the disorientation stage. Leadership will be of little efficiency in this case. Man can self-destruct if he can't clarify his authority and responsibility relations with his defining entity, determining structural affinities between various ways of investigation and reflection upon reality, in which case, between what he is, what he thinks he is and what he has become.

Experience doesn't always help you predict very clearly the apparition of these feelings and moods, determined by an accidental reality that can't give clarity and coherence to the inner world. It's as if you wanted to be the first one that shows his hidden powers in a hostile desert, semi-arid, and percutaneous enough for your way of life. If you don't want to get lost in an unfriendly existential decorum, place on a higher pedestal the ability to understand yourself, so that you maintain the internal cohesion of your defining structure.

Leadership has no chance to expand if the man's mind is hosted in an unfriendly and unconditional decorum. He can't survive to all analysis and decision processes; he can't allow human performance being evaluated, because everything is so intricate in this stage of self-negation. If you are planning to get involved in leadership, you will certainly experience new roles and responsibilities, but also new feelings, new manifestation trends.

The man who shows his hidden powers in a hostile wasteland is the same maker of worlds that investigates all aspects of reality by thinking about his life experience that repeatedly confirms that nothing is everything it seems to be and what seems to be nothing else than an image of your own subjectivity.

The dark shadow of the occasional demon describes that internal imbalance situation following a discrepancy, be it only temporary, between the defining structure of man and his capacity to understand some unpredictable and unanticipated situations.

The Dead End Of Brilliant Minds

On February 25, 2013

Use your work experience as a lever for the transformation that defines you, by giving meaning and harmoniously unifying your whole potential of producing original creation resources.

I had been playing with the idea of writing a little book about writing for a year or more at that time, but had held back because I didn't trust my own motivations—why did I want to write about writing? What made me think I had anything worth saying?

The easy answer is that someone who has sold as many books of fiction as I have must have something worthwhile to say about writing it, but the easy answer isn't always the truth. Colonel Sanders sold a hell of a lot of fried chicken, but I'm not sure anyone wants to know how he made it.

If I was going to be presumptuous enough to tell people how to write, I felt there had to be a better reason than my popular success. Put another way, I didn't want to write a book, even a short one like this, that would leave me feeling like either a literary gasbag or a transcendental asshole. There are enough of those books—and those writers—on the market already, thanks. *

Leadership: Is it time to revise your approach towards constituting an intellectual "consummation" experience, so to take your masterpiece to a point where you can control the reality that surrounds you?

If you do not have the necessary artistic means to carry out a certain task under the burden of the combinations and the constructions of the so called progress characterized through gathering knowledge, if you have no personal experience in identifying the value that you bring to your masterpiece, then leadership won't become an investment with a high profitability potential.

An expenditure of "compromise" representing an advanced resource consumed in the present in order to obtain future events is absolutely essential to reaching a better perspective with respect to implementing a certain orientation towards productivity and results. It is about the compromise with the reality of the other people that you are willing to represent through a masterpiece that highlights the idea of "alternative nonconformism" belonging to a brilliant mind that amazes the world by what it can do, but also by the way it is followed.

Probably, this is the most important ingredient necessary to build a high-quality foundation, a strong direction of the new leadership within an intense creation effort that will help you obtain a better reference between satisfaction and motivation. The transformation that defines a leader is inscribed in the attempt to give his masterpiece a meaning of "being ahead", "being above", that everything he does confirms a bright mind, subtlety in shaping reality, meticulous in putting things together to create as fairy-tale of a décor as possible.

The masterpiece of an artist can be an alternative to a world cloned after real life, it can be closely linked to the progressive acquisition of an increasingly complex knowledge, it can be a manifestation of a form of intelligence, of a skill, of a trick, it can be closely linked to the experience in handling information, experience working with brands in many fields of activity, etc. What is important is what you emphasize through what you express, through the form you give to your personal creation.

In leadership, the consumption experience is equivalent to the elaboration of the authentic version of a masterpiece that can be "reactivated and updated" at any time to support that interpretation of the reality that becomes the frame of motivation and action of other people.

To know how to use yourself and your work experience as a lever for the transformation that defines you, that corresponds to your dynamic by giving meaning and harmoniously unifying your whole potential of producing original creation resources.For that find a better motivation than that of winning over the audience. Revise your approach of building an intellectual "consummation" experience.

Truly. You can go even further with your choice. Recreating and reusing the past of your work experience together with your transformation experience will be only some of the factors that determine the difference between motivation and lack of motivation. There are totally different experience areas, whose exploitation you start from the moment you engage in a new process of making the most of your own potential or making the most of your intellectual property. Actually, I think that we all tend towards making the most of things in fast and multiple ways.

To take your masterpiece to a point where you can control the reality that surrounds you means to apply to your knowledge that characteristic that people need most: the motivation to use its meaning to satisfy their ambitions to reformulate the world. And to promote their own qualities.

The Dead End Of A Brilliant Mind brings forward that lack of motivation for doing something new professionally speaking, that follows every performer in their evolution. Up to a point where they either completely loose interest, or they gather their strength for a new fight on the open front of personal progress.

The Decisive Pass Towards Mastery

Raise people above their own limits, encouraging them to perfect their mastery.

Antoine Bourdelle was one of the most influential sculptors of all times. His works, famous all over the world, appreciated worldwide, have become over time a real reference point for all those who wanted to excel in sculpture.

Nevertheless, what few knows is that Bourdelle was a perfect teacher. He felt obliged to transmit to his students the spirit of his messages. Considering that it is essential the formation of their own personality, he warned them from the beginning to avoid the easy imitation: "It would mean to betray you if I'll tell you: follow me. My path, my torch, are not yours." And kept telling: "suspect the formulas".

Leadership: Can you filter through your individuality the entire material of direct experience, as well as the suggestions from the source of your creation, in a context that provides a lot of information about your performance?

In order to determine what need people around you, you must objectively look for their good and poor points – the good points indicate the direction towards which they must move, what they can become, while their weaknesses, once you found them, indicate you what you have to do, what measures to take in order to get closer to their potential performance.

Do you feel obliged to transmit to people your own dexterity level for the development of their leadership? Do you consider it is essential the formation of each of their own personality? If yes, then your task is to assess their potential, and then to try optimizing their qualities and performance, by heading their steps toward a successful career.

The source of their affinities must be searched in time, since their first contact with your "art", and as they deepen their knowledge, vision and principles that you promote, with a curiosity always supplied, never drained, the more they will develop their qualities and the more you will grow up in their eyes.

As a leader, you need to give people suggestions from the content of your experience, so that the performance of your individuality can be passed by them through the filter of information that can promote the development of their creation.

In football, the "Czech street" represents the decisive pass, made in the area of completion, between the opponents, and can be easily transformed into a goal by the one who got it. In leadership, the "decisive pass" that can be transformed into a great success, is given by the influence that they receive from you, is given by the perspective that you can offer regarding the manner in which they must think and act, it is given by the fluidity of your skills and qualities, by your ability to communicate with them, and by imposing your own high standard, without restricting their right to freely express their guidelines.

Hence, their education in a particular way, by giving them a certain perspective, in the idea of building a career, should be based on establishing an agreement, of a solid partnership between you and them, which would prove particularly beneficial for both sides.

The content of a creation that aims to stimulate the act of creation among other people must provide an experience of self-knowledge, but also an unforgettable experience related to a certain event. Moreover, the content of a creation must provide a delightful view of a certain life situation that serves as a means of expressing a scientific idea.

A true leader is always ready to reveal details about the results of his work, drawing on a life experience that serves as a means of identifying and expressing his own conceptions of what it means to be a Creator.

The Decisive Pass Towards Mastery it is the stage that marks your success or your failure as a leader. It is the stage that helps you see where are people in relation to your vision and your values, and where they head to your prompting. Your approaches, your attempt to change people's optics on leadership, it is the "decisive pass" towards enhancing their performance and their level of influence.

Just as the goal remains without doubt the concrete reward of the football game, victory being the supreme coronation of the efforts made by the 11 teammates - even so, joining of the other people to your art, undoubtedly remain the concrete reward of your efforts to optimize their way of thinking and of using their own resources, which ensures your success and performance.

Conclusion: The performance in leadership it is evaluated by the results obtained by the team, and achievement of the intended purpose. The performance of a leader it is measured by the individual performance of each person in the team. Therefore, a leader must be involved and sometimes enormously work for the development of a corporate culture, because in vain he has his own high standards if they are not consistent with those of the team members, and if he detaches from what they considered to be normal, he risks generating misunderstandings and a strong adversity from their side ... in this case, it is all over with the performance.

Evaluation of individual performances, identifying the strengths and weaknesses of each individual, identifying the training needs and professional development, the identification of potential performance, applying a motivating remuneration system (if, the remuneration system it is determined by other factors than performance, and if it is uniform for all, the evaluation would be already useless, and the motivation would also disappear) and last but not least, communication, finding adequate bridges of communication in order to obtain mastery in the team.

The Deep Shades Of The Being Ruled By The Immensity Of Judgment

On May 03, 2014

Give your science the possibility to build around creative reason, experiencing that expansion of your perception about yourself, which does not precede duplication.

The evolution of my science was possible only through a double and continuous back and forth movement, like a balance between the harsh reality beyond appearances and the imaginative projection of unclarified conjunctures, imposed by steps towards a time of rediscovering my identity, in which there was no space and no matter, but only a benchmark for the readjustments of the minuses and pluses of my knowledge.

It was a kind of transition from subjectivity to objectivity, and vice versa, from objectivity to subjectivity. It was a complicated process of removing my limits, opening new perspectives for understanding and relating to my own person.

But in this forward and return movement to a point of maximum expansion of my own conscience, the speed of connections shutter with new status entities varied in time in a predetermined manner. I felt somehow trapped in my own person, as if I had abandoned myself to a beautiful delirium, going from derisory to immensity, blurring my reason to react against a domination refusing to determine. Maybe I should have tried to push reason beyond itself.

Undoubtedly, I became particularly skilful in formulating ambiguities between reality and imaginary, relying on depth effects of creations stemming from self-revelations, necessary for life experience and leadership, in those difficult battles between the infinite and the finite, between reality and conscience.

The infinite that encompassed my essence, with all its lights and shadows, which became a purely relative judgment, and the finite of a significant life, that filled in an inspired manner the gap of thoughts, contrary to the conditions of a scientific capital reallocation, with new depth shades, which highlighted my real personality.

Leadership: Have you become part of a finite virtue acquired by refusing to place yourself in the service of a rule that refuses to determine itself?

Great science, as part of some sort of human connection to the outside, namely with his surroundings, against creation of facts, but also spiritual fruitfulness, is also defined by a series of other elements. First of all, it is a system of comprehension of a higher self-consciousness, which is hard to influence and accessible only to a limited part of humanity, only to insiders, as it can't be "cloned" to an industrial scale in order to be plentiful.

The great science has the function to support the reason to react against a domination that refuses to determine. This domination is given by the ambiguity of your own interpretation of the concept of "identity".

The conscience to reject this foreign force, that keeps you trapped in an innovative thinking, beyond material aspects, oriented to your full knowledge of man and the world, claims a certain share of contribution to the acquisition of a particular virtue. That virtue of "finite", of temperance on your relationship with the great science, with that forward and return movement to a point of maximum expansion: perfection.

Identity is an active, affective, and cognitive process of self-representation in a hazard of reality, associated with the subjective feeling of permanence, which allows the person to perceive life as an experience that has continuity and unity in a frame of originality.

Leadership: Does the development of your personality become possible only by abstaining from an excessive consumption of science, in accordance with a reality that makes accepting a supreme reasoning a projection of your imaginations?

Striving to achieve perfection turns man into an automaton, slave of a mechanism with unlimited existence in terms of generating new scientific foundations, built around a higher reason, admitting that lengthy improper conduct to make something forceful, somewhat artificially, into a life of compromise and sacrifice. This effort violates the basic principle of moderation: abstain yourself from the excessive consumption of science.

The great writer Paulo Coelho was right when he said: "Stop being who you were and turn into who you are". If your scientific development becomes possible only through a double back and forth movement, like a balance between the harsh reality beyond appearances and your imaginative projection of the conjuncture of life, you get to turn, paradoxically, into a "marginal" for others.

Even if, at the same time, you learn to know yourself very well, people will learn about you, but don't get to know you.

The marginal, the duplicated man belongs to two worlds, of science and life – but he tends more towards the first one. This gives the complexity and richness of unlimited creative power. Basically, such an individual deletes any question about himself, for inside him there is no space, nor matter, but only variable effects of transition from subjectivity to objectivity, and vice versa, from objectivity to subjectivity.

The marginal is a source of unique and very valuable intellectual income, continuously feeding with creative power, but not with spiritual power, hovering outside the moral scale, leaving social manners.

If you want your leadership not to get caught in a two-fronts war, of self and selfishness, give the opportunity to your science to build around the creative reason, experiencing that expansion of perception of yourself that does not precede duplication.

Duplication aims in this case to multiply self-worth by capturing excess knowledge, not by regularly renewing reality for a better discernment of essence from randomness. Duplication is the state in which you see yourself as someone else, you want yourself to be someone else, and, ultimately, only you will remain, an "unreal".

The deep shades of the being ruled by the immensity of judgment concerns that perfection of self-knowledge, coupled with the real "MySelf", and the possibilities for action in an ever-changing external environment regarding aspects of human factor.

The Deeply Renewing Character Of Leadership

Use practical and unlimited montage possibilities, so you get to finding and defining new means of creating leadership.

Once you remove the general rules of drama from the director's arsenal, the content is expressed directly. That is why the script is missing and the method of creation is moving from the theme, right to the montage sheet. Eisenstein does not propose a film that will illustrate, through a story, the significance of the strike. He wants, with the expressive means of art, to answer the question: what is a strike, how is it organized, what are its prerequisites, its course, its effects? Hence the need for a lack of fabrication, of individualized characters, them being replaced with personified notions: the organizer, the worker, the spy, the foreman, and so on and so forth… And also from here, the necessity of metaphorical montage.

*Through the purposes, he proposes to himself, director Eisenstein projects himself implicitly in the core, in the essence of the problems of montage. This explains the deeply renewing character of Eisensteinian montage. So is explained how Eisenstein came to finding and defining the essential means of modern film. **

Leadership: Can you project into the core of what the universe of your own creation represents to make your evolution known from the point of view of the significance you assign to the artistic expression?

The leader-creator has a clear role in the context of approaching science, in that it manages to build the vivid picture of a universe of infinite variety. He implicitly projects himself in the core of what this universe represents in order to make his evolution known. And who tries to reach the core of what is wrong with the vision exposed by a leader, regarding such a universe, constituting in the world of art a sort of functional reason, making it more individualized, will surely encounter a logic and mechanisms difficult to understand.

We cannot speak of leadership if we do not offer food for the science on which it rests, placing it in the context of an orientation that is, essentially, in relation to everything that was accepted as the norm of transitioning towards a superior level of visualizing a reality that hides a story. The creative work of an artist, distinguishing between authenticity and kitsch, is the clearest demonstration of the need to ensure stable sources of power and control to better accelerate development and the process of change.

The form creation takes is given by the montage you achieve. The montage involves the sequential assembly of separate components of information, images, perspectives and experiences. It is a way to show off your coordination capacities and those of producing innovative elements, activities specific to undertaken research and knowledge dissemination. Without a quality montage that will raise the level of efficiency in solving the three fundamental problems of leadership: how, what and for whom do you produce science, you will not be able to prove your value and your professionalism.

Artistic expression is a revelation of performing art, a revelation of a personal truth transposed into a story, it is a combination of ideas transposed into an image consisting of facts, feelings and interpretations. It can have the meaning that the director gives to the reality that he himself experiences through emotions, by different real causes and effects.

Can the form your creation takes be processed in a way in which science can ensure a new usage value for leadership?

The identity of the structure of several models of representing knowledge used in scientific research is reduced to a succession of detail elements. These are formed in an undetermined unity of time in relation with the landmarks of the existence of authentic forms of creation, contributing to promoting a new style of art.

The details and working procedures, depending on the premises of a new direction of evolution of science and on the effects of a new line of trend, are part of a personal expedition of searching for a deeper meaning of what you transmit, by engaging in a game of selecting information and the way you process it.

Leadership appears as a complex of intuitions and possibilities of exploring a particular reality, based primarily on the experience in working with elements of creation that have continuity and unity in the field of produced effects.

Your creation can be processed in a way in which science can ensure a new usage value for leadership, only if you manage to identify a way of using the expressive means for the construction in the present of a "perfect future". Winning independence in shaping science is possible through the renewing character of what you achieved with the help of new standpoints in terms of defining new directions and perspectives of thinking and feeling.

A new value of use for leadership is the process of reaching a higher reality by replacing with personalized notions all the precise images and facts that can more accurately reflect the intentions of a director: to portray a dream world, where everything becomes possible.

The Deeply Renewing Character Of Leadership results from the means of creation, transposed into practice, used in the process of conquering the segment occupied by the production of new models of scientific research, accepted and considered as added value to a different style of interacting with new levels of performance.

The Deja Vu Principle

On November 21, 2014

Bring new evidence in support of what you have become, by remembering who you really are.

I found myself in a rationally unacceptable phenomenon, that of recoverable time, as a reminder of who I really was when I was surrounded by what I was not. Willingly, by practicing introspection, I had engaged in exploring a hidden, unmeasured, intimidating truth that surpassed me in its vastness and complexity. What was immortal in me could conceal another reality, subject to improbability, even imaginative.

Everything was revealed by a strange reversal of optics, like a magical mirror, at the level of a hallucinatory subjectivism, as if written by Stephen King. It appeared as if I was suspended in a space of extended consciousness beyond myself, driven only by that blindness of intelligence without feeling. As if I had tried to revive long-forgotten visions in a reality that stubbornly acted upon unknown rules – a superior one, sustaining itself by unifying the three congruent circles: inconsistencies, paradoxes, and illusions.

And this pre-update of self-knowledge led to the extreme, as a centrifugal force that freed me almost entirely from the grip of the handcuffs of the unimaginable past, continued with imaginary improvements and solved the small leaks for the bugs in the "alpha" versions of the reality drastically anchored in the frameworks of a changing mindset.

Here begins the beauty of self-understanding – I was always caught in the repetitive play of matching with a certain type of role that could be approached from several angles on several existential sides. In this aspect there was, in my life, another Me. Because I was going through another extension of myself, through a Deja vu that made me feel like I was living someone else's life.

Leadership: Can you build a "Select" in the dynamics of the past that returns the "True" logical value under conditions of the present?

I think that in this residual state of thoughts and actions that we have undertaken in the past, framing new time functions in the specificity of the consciousness that gives shape to a lost reality, the fusion between essence and appearance occurs. That is, what defines you permanently and what defines you when you disregard what you have become, taking more into account the image of what you have been.

The living proof of what you have become, by providing other answers to the question, "Who are you?", may actually be unconscious rehearsals of what you once were, processing and developing within logic – held by the thinking put in favor of coordinating existence – a valid or invalid reasoning. That is, a reasoning favorable to the placement of personality in a context of alignment to a model of being completely new to the old one, thus in the conditions of a plurality of identities that provide room for maneuvering the ways of re-assessment, rediscovery and reinvention.

The past is the messenger of essential truths, of reference values that have not precisely outlined themselves over time and have not grown uniformly with the experience of life. Some sort of clues left behind that can lead you to another area of knowledge, because in the past you are reliving fundamental moments of your own exceptionality – claiming your totality. Moments placed into the light with no interruptions, having truth as a guide, pieces of what you think, emotions and states, having their finality in the opportunity to form yourself continuously and to get in touch with a sum of qualities that you should not miss when you want to become a leader.

In a field such as leadership, subject to changes of progress or regress in any direction, the obligation to start looking for what you once were can distribute you into a new role that makes you feel that you are living the life of someone you could've been. This, in the conditions of an existence affected by that reality that infuses spirit in self-image, in everything you do, through the distribution of what is subtle, seemingly small and insignificant, in another structure and in a vision of an ensemble with additional and more advanced features and nuances.

The beauty of self-understanding can be labeled as a reminder of the destiny that awaits you when going further is an update of the reason with which you'd want to meet yourself in a time other than the one unravelling now.

The Déjà Vu Principle aims at that recognizability of what you were and what you are, in everything you achieve, maintaining the upward trend of performance coupled with innovative ways of deepening your own identity.

Your leadership activity has to go beyond this position of an interpreter of the past to prepare for the present and the future. So that your belonging to what is called the "mainstream" of the thought you expose should have as a priority the assurance of a proper role in the relationship between background and context, of what you have overlooked and what you are able to realize in the reality you experience.

The Delicate Shadow Behind Leadership

On August 29, 2013

Use your understanding of human nature by taking as reference, with wisdom and moderation, the axis of your influence.

Hannibal Lecter is an equality between two latent psychological expressions: an animal behavior and a highly calculated thinking. You don't need to create anything, just to accept everything in this subtle ecuation of invisibility of the concentrated electrifying means of the mind. Where, so unusually, an only unknown can be selected, put into a new background and transformed into a capital sentence: the reflex act, the automatic response to interaction with a certain humanist content.

The strength of the extasy of using the supreme level of understand human nature absorbs greedy, like a sponge, any trace of sensibility and sentimentalism. An individual experience, a subtle shiver, a rutheless thought, a negative emotion in real time, a strong mental anchor, they are all concentrated in a polyhedron of forces where any face has the property of activating strong vibrations, awakening the hidden and extreme part of the nature of the one who constantly supplements his energies.

The priercing force's momentum when it breaches through the mental shield, disassembling the protection of the subject, that was kept through emitting a surging flow of high-frequency is repeated now too, in a strange manner, prooving to be disastrous.

Leadership: Do you consider yourself necessary for the transition to an "impossible absolute" due to the words loaded with the power to reveal the true meanings of a strong emotion?

If you have an opposite force acting on a shattered mind, what is the condition for that mind to act in balance, within normal parameters?

Like a stock jobber that triggers the explosion of the great hit he has been carefully planning, Hannibal Lecter interrupts every self-control and reason conducting circuit of the human mind, amplifying the frequency of the energy field that exercises a paralyzing and irreversible action. He considers himself necessary for the transition to an "impossible absolute" when he succeeds in gaining the full trust of the man beside him, negatively influencing him through the suffering he inoculates through an image that contains enough information to shock to the point of horror.

Lecter catches the fugitive moment when he can lead someone to downfall. Exactly the moment when Miggs, locked in the next cell, is about to shatter, based on the continuous tension he has cleverly generated through suggestion. Miggs has to defeat some opposite action forces, but he can't oppose his downfall, he can't react along the correction, control and punishment axis where Lecter's verbal interventions are based.

The news travels fast. Miggs is dead. He swallowed his tongue little before dawn. Lecter suggested him that, or those are the hospital's director, Dr. Frederick Chilton's assumptions. The night guard heard Lecter slowly talking to Miggs. He said something, but the night guard couldn't hear exactly what it was. Miggs cried for a while, and then stopped. Forever.

Nobody knows how Hannibal Lecter managed to convince Miggs to commit this gesture. But just like Peyrade, the informant of Balzac's novel, muffled the door ring after midnight, so that nobody would know who's visiting him, so did Hannibal Lecter, starting with the first moment when he talked to Miggs, activated his primal instincts, thus instantly annulling his resistance force field, without him noticing what's really going on.

Leadership: Can you eliminate the secondary factors that have at their core rejection forces?

We can examine an important quantity of complex "supplements" that support the efficiency of leadership, starting with the influence that the leader has over the ordinary individual who's being monitored, analyzed and controlled.

Influence, that always menaces to extend it "clinging" and "leaping forward" effects, being selectable, configurable and achievable at any decision level, becomes the only battle fought on enemy territory. Its coordinates, fully deciphered by the most talented of leaders and its sphere of coverage, applicability and action creates around leadership a certain potentiality that tends to accomplish itself up to perfection.

The secondary factors that can interfere in the evolution of leadership have at their core rejection forces between the leader and ordinary individuals and they manifest constantly through mentality, attitude and behavior changes, controllable or incontrollable, generated willfully or by constraint. These factors are related, predominantly, to those convictions or limitative ways thinking that can arise in the process of analysis and evaluation: related to the intimate, social and professional life of individuals.

In turn, these convictions or limitative ways of thinking can be gradually modified or changed provided there is a sturdy influence and a wise approach promoted through superior quality values; and only if they're not enclosed in the circumstances inadequate for the final purpose, which is balancing the potential.

In leadership, the opposite action forces must be eliminated before they put too big of a pressure in the area of similarities and common thinking patterns, before they produce an irrecoverable rupture.

Leadership: Can you balance the two factors of equality, without becoming a constant of the attitude of protest against one's self that extends the capacity to be receptive to others' suggestions?

The perspectives of expanding leadership towards excellence in the future world need to be deeply understood, starting first of all from the acknowledgement that there is a stable and durable balance between the influencing and gain possibilities.

By using the level of understanding of human nature without taking as reference, with wisdom and moderation, the axis of your influence – "the personal power of infiltrating and invading", you will disassembe the protection component of leadership, that only by creating a 100% compatibility of thought, can oppose "the downfall" of the others that are your referents.

The impossibility of identifying, understand or healing certain mental patterns, or on the contrary redimensioning or disassembling them, is deeply rooted in a volume of changing dimensions, depending on the individual leadership performances and on the value of the persuasion "coefficient". At the same time, it depends on the power of suggestion of the leader, and also on the level of the masses' sugestibility.

You can set the balance between the two factors of equality: an equality of your own beliefs and values, eliminating that equality between mentality and different purposes, but only if you succeed to eliminate the hidden and extreme part of your nature.

Leadership is not a system of objects able to produce satisfaction simply by gazing upon them, or that can be moved so as it completes the desired design. It's more of an incursion into a foreign space, initially unknown, where by introducing control rutines at our "internal frontieres", there should be an exception. And the element of empathy has to be valued more than the element of persuasion.

The hidden and extremist part of human nature is revealed when the suffering of not being recognized by others manifests itself as a refuge of lack of empathy or as a crescendo of despair of considering yourself an invincible power.

The Delicate Shadow Behind Leadership is that special capacity of the leader to influence the masses by using his persuasion and suggestion abilities, supported by more or less real elements.

The leader, the "inductor" of suggestion, needs to have a suggestion "catcher" (the masses of people). His success is dependant greatly on the suggestion inductor-acceptor relation. Of course, suggestion can be used for evil or good purposes, it can be positive or negative. But history proved that the great leaders that used suggestions for evil purposes, more or less personal, ended in a regretable fashion sooner rather than later, or they have stepped through "the backdoor" of history as negative examples.

Consequently, be careful how and to what extent you use suggestion.

The Delicate Touch From Behind Bars

Measure your force of influence, without driving the forces of everyone else beyond their resistance limits.

The frightful creature, locked up so it can't get away, had the power to hypnotize its victims, of drawing them with its demonic force until their mental resistance limit, in a circle whose barriers can never be crossed. Like it were marked through an unknown and uncontrollable magic, which has the power to control elements, people and their emotions and moods.

Still, in this very moment, FBI agent, Clarice Starling, no longer looks at Hannibal Lecter like she did at the beginning, with a mixture of fascination and fear. But with a hungry look, with the desire to use him, to take the file with all the information about the serial killer, known as Buffalo Bill. But Hannibal continuously tests the young student's will and nerves.

Clarice is disconcerted. In tears, she can barely find her words. She finds the power to beg him one more time: "Please, tell me his name doctor ! Please ! "

This stationary position into nothingness is becoming exasperating, more likely triggering a mental experience which revolves around an unbalance value. The molecules that absorb regenerative energy, improving blood flow to the brain, are suddenly blocked. As if an oxidized substance would have deposited on the arteries, depriving the brain of essential and necessary nutrients in a moment of maximum activity. Clarice turns to stone.

Leadership: Can you assume the destiny of a being that does not manifest itself in the soul, except in the form of a perceived danger as assuming a mission that can give it the opportunity to capitalize on its potential in a graceful evolution?

The law enforcements barely manage to make her come to her senses and escort her towards the exit of the room where the monster's cage was situated. When suddenly, from behind bars, Hannibal insists: "There's your file, Clarice ! " The woman breaks loose from the policemen, comes closer to the monster's cage and reaches her hand for the file he gives her from behind bars.

And in that moment, it happens ! Such a delicate and meaningful touch ! A hyper-sensitization of the senses occurs, one that doesn't lead to a certain conditioning, but it determines the alignment process between two realities. Two totally different characters unite in a decisive second, developing an extremely intense force. For the first time, the product of two opposite energies vibrates and resonates on the same frequency.

Hannibal's well-calculated touch, this self-containment together with great spontaneity, this presence which guarantees closeness to a human, could it be the sign of the self's rebellion? Or one of his weaknesses that gives birth to countless possibilities to reinvent himself? Or an error fully explicable at a psychological level and even plausible for a human being that perceives things with finesse.

Leadership: Is your space of maneuvering beyond the limit of subtlety in expressing your power and authority, in the sense of the extraordinary feeling of pride in bearing in your soul the compassion for the pain in others' souls?

The pain of Clarice's soul was not closely related to the possibility of an FBI failure, but to the image of the victim subject to the cruelty of the killer, known as Buffalo Bill. She had to hurry, she had to find him in any way before he killed his victim. And Hannibal Lecter was the only one who could help, the information needed to catch the murderer was in that file.

Clarice had the pain, Hannibal had the cure for the pain, but at the same time he was overwhelmed by the desire to feel the rumbling of a breath of despair, he wanted to touch a human being full of emotions to find himself in another person. When he touched Clarice's hand a sort of merging of two distinct worlds into one, the good and the evil in a small universe, an ideal psychological security space which for the time was unknown in its essence, was created.

Let's build a new sphere of understanding the way leadership works beyond the ordinary limits of human mind, from the manifestations that individuals generate, condemn or judge.

Here, this is not about any aggression or deviation from the rules, coming by part of the leader that calls forth the superiority of his science in order to exert his influence, starting prior to the idea that every identifiable thing can later be determined and pinned down. But it's about the possibility to destroy, with the help of various "surrounding" and intimidation maneuvers, up to a certain level, o hard to detect human being, especially to recognize those certain key characteristics that elude classical evaluation attempts.

The leader's whole maneuver space will be placed beyond the limit of subtlety in the way of manifesting his power and authority, only when he will succeed in precisely identifying the capacities human nature hides in various moments.

Unlike a development strategy, which gradually meets conditions for increasing efficiency and productivity, the leader has to be able, through some moves, to make use of an objective superiority that doesn't give in to even the slightest doubt. And also, he should be able to put others in a favorable position to unite with him.

Leadership: At what level of depth are the two distinct parts of your universe associated with the refinement of a composer trying to reach all the emotional sides of being?

I believe that mostly in the future, a cunning leader will make use of the help coming from different representations of individual patterns, comparable with his pattern of being, together with other international means, in order to easily be able to test the limits they want and can compare to.

Putting the psychological profile of individuals in the foreground, and comparing it with his profile, thus by merging common characteristics, the leader can determine the alignment between two realities. Thus, two opposing energies can resonate, which means that all those who keep the same kind of simultaneous thinking will easily succeed to achieve great changes.

Leaders with the capacity to appreciate human "content" can't be doubted, having a particular interest in the analysis performed on the individual profile, they will easily be able to obtain "spontaneous" answers and results from others. Therefore, the meaningful association between the two distinct parts: leader-common individual can encourage a greater openness achieved at a normalcy level around an unconditional and carefree mentality, directed towards involvement and action.

The two distinct parts of your universe, good and evil, can associate at depths in describing certain regularities or preferences in the manifestation of human character through a high affinity of feelings towards unfavorable events experienced with great intensity.

The refinement of a composer who attempts to touch all the emotional sides of the being can be seen in the psychological details harmoniously blended into a space specially designed to make memorable events that sustain the philosophical and sociological life of the great explorers of human consciousness.

The Delicate Touch From Behind Bars highlights the synchronization between different human typologies, similar, yet different. The unification of beneficial energies into a sole one with a giant motivational force. If you want your relation with people to be perfect, measure your force of influence, without driving the forces of everyone else beyond their resistance limits.

The Delight Of The Gaze Stemming From The Direction Of Stellar Light

A clairvoyant eye is not always a fleeing eye, but one that sees from afar what is quite close.

I was just walking lazily on the boulevard, when, suddenly, I came across some of my friends from the Iași Athletics group. It was the "after the sunset" training, because today is said to be a special night. The night of the Perseids. Indeed, I regret that we could not be together, united by the sport that we love so much, but I thought that an equally good option is a welcome break after so many half marathons in which I participated in the last few weeks.

It's still a special night. I didn't see shooting stars, but I did see small lights that formed a kind of filament vaguely interrupted by the space between two seconds that you calculate as you go, while you are overwhelmed by the inevitability of a familiar dynamic. And even if I had seen the shooting stars, detached from a legend of the Greeks who worshiped everything that came from the universe of the gods, they still would not have had as much strength and intensity as the fairytale lights that illuminated my path.

Logical. I grew up in the lights, which in terms of the symbolic message it suggests, directs me to adopt a more natural aesthetic of the world around me. It is an art to run, just as it is a miracle to shine, but the great challenge is to be one of those lights that open the way to another galaxy, immortal and fascinating, figuratively called "harmonious equality". A complex and mysterious harmonious equality.

Leadership: Can you define a landmark of the authenticity of the image you immortalize in the most beautiful frames, so as to highlight a new approach to art?

I think that an important value of life that we must know to cherish, as much as the projection of lucky stars that appear in the shadow of the highest mountains in the world, but also in the shadow of the loneliest valleys, one of those things that gives value to the desire to shine beyond the circumstances of life, is EQUALITY.

No one shines brighter than the other in a galaxy full of stars. Everyone shines as brightly as they should, in a certain way, so that from certain angles everyone can create a dream or a vision. An emotion, a story, a memory...

Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and looks as if through the stars' eyes towards earth ! This is a landmark of the authenticity of the image that I will try from now on to immortalize in the most beautiful frames, highlighting a reality that does not necessarily have to be expressed in concepts, but a reality that awakens the power to give life to an image, keeping alive the flame of an inexhaustible passion for art.

If happiness is born of love, the gaze directed to the stars is born of the desire of the eyes to adapt to darkness. And if the work of art is born as an improvisation of stories to small scenes that investigate the relationship between things and people, and if it lives and develops during its execution, this nature ensures the fullness of expressive rigor precisely because the gaze towards beauty is illuminated by the same natural radiance as a star in the infinity of space.

That is right. On this warm, peaceful night, I did not run through the light that blows in the wind in the dynamics of a running session, but I caught a snippet of reality that is visible to the eye in the form of a bunch of rays, gathered at one point which is called the "vanishing point". The closer an object is, the larger it will look compared to a distant object.

Is your leadership guided by the visual impact of an image that you seek to replace with another, through the soul's extraordinary property of looking beyond the immediate reality?

That's why my friends' training gained a special shine, better than a meeting with the stars, because their night run aroused in me something I hadn't felt in a long time: the fantastic desire to become, for example, a phenomenon of reflection of light fluxes of the same intensity as the stars. So let us abandon selfishness, our gaze to ourselves, and turn our gaze to those stars that can serve as indicators, reminding us that light always pierces darkness.

Why do I say that? Because running with friends is like the gleam of a star that lights up somewhere far away, whose photographic image is as punctual as a star, but whose nature is not necessarily stellar, but acts intensely on the work of an artist, as a challenge, as a playful activity – ideal for developing creativity.

Because any step in running, directly proportional to the apparent magnitude of a star moving towards the Earth, can shine in the night sky, as inside me, a kingdom of happiness, an unforgettable story at the stage of immortality. To watch a night run means to specialize in a special technique of observation and analysis of memories that never "go out".

Do not forget that an image with runners has the power to charge you with the burning desire to always triumph, awakening especially the power of the collective mind of those who embrace the ideals of unity, solidarity, but also harmony between "background" and "form".

To look beyond the immediate reality means to see from afar, in a completely different light, which can only be explained by the collaboration between "a guiding beacon through the fog of the unknown" and "the projection of an artistic vision".

The Delight Of The Gaze Stemming From The Direction Of Stellar Light can be easily seen on the face of an enthusiastic artist who looks at himself with the same adoration and delight as a star whose light continues to shine forever in the solar system.

The same star will continue to shine forever in the heart of the artist, in his memories, in his creations, whenever he looks beyond the outside of people, looking for their real, intrinsic values. Remember that a clairvoyant eye is not always a fleeing eye, but one that sees from afar what is quite close.

The Depth Of A Superior Understanding

On May 10, 2016

Seek within you all resources necessary for the development of the force of action, always looking behind you.

I knew that I had to forget or retain, what awaited me from the perspective of a precise conception of my own being, analyzing things more thoroughly, placing within a safe place, in a drawer of the heart that could be kept ajar in need. I knew, as a painter knows how to pick his models, how to select all those points of interest, the crumbs of knowledge assimilated through experimentation, pushed to the manifestation of a certain shape. These could be resized by following a trail of identity and unity.

I had to make sure they fit the image I wanted erased from memory.

Oddly, it was the same image I wanted to project into the future, in its entire complexity, with all its continuities and contradictions, through the power of the reason of a seeker of new worlds, even if the flows of the currents of good mood were modified according to the perspective I was about to take.

To understand the theories or hypotheses of an artist who thinks about the vision inspired by an update of reality, you must use imagination to create a fabulous image.

Leadership: Can you cultivate a self-image that gradually derives from the subjective, conscious and synthetic reflection of the Ego placed in the concrete situation of concealing the thoughts from which reality feeds?

All is fleeting in the world. The desolate image of this truth is reflected in the profound examination of the present life that art uses as a lever to highlight the glow of a moralizing mystery. The man in which consciousness works constantly, the determinant of any resistance of an a priori order, enveloping itself in this secret as a character who can no longer leave the story in which he was been integrated, always draws benefits from it. The secret suggests the idea of seeking yourself where you cannot find anything, or where you can find out everything.

This mystery of the perception of surrounding things, of everything that is happening to you, may consider the idea of looking for yourself where you cannot find anything, or where you can find out everything through a vision of universal unity.

And the key to a carefully hidden mystery can be a moralizing story when it comes to authentically connecting to the reality of the existence of a work called "information", to its representation as a "landscape" whose poetic charm is extracted from a film decoration. It is moralizing because it teaches you to look differently, as a whole, as a being who enters more plans to construct the image of the world, not only physically but also spiritually, energetically.

At the end of the day I accessed all experiences gathered in a heap in the mind, from imagination to loneliness, combining them sporadically and finding them a place in the interior of explanations that would not take into account the truths of the known maxim: "In all affairs, let us consider the end". Trying to reconcile things that were irreconcilable, I could strengthen the resolve of always fulfilling a different plan of stimulating my availability to recognize myself and discover myself within the totality of my defects and qualities.

Leadership: Do you know how to appreciate the art of a desolate image, without undergoing a transformation in how you use things fleeting?

When you look back to discover what already exists within you (the power to forget, to forgive, to endure) you expect to hear the call, the unique voice of the heart which will resonate strongly in future circumstances through the action of reason capable of shaping a new identity. Art is the result of a wider view outside of yourself with the intention of becoming aware of a new way of perceiving your own emotions and understanding your tendencies without suffering any disappointment from possible image changes.

To undergo a transformation in how you use things fleeting means to relinquish what you are while your life casts a mystery look on the shadowy genes of profound reflection perspectives. Do not forget that everything that happened to you is borne by the very precious revelation that needs an external manifestation.

Here, the art I am trying to highlight is compatible with the vision of the world at a point of the experience of existing as a being wishing to reach a relationship with the discoverer hypostasis of an alternative reality without taking into account the limits that are imposed by the symbolic force of details that in time can become more and more marginal.

Leadership: Have you reached the phase of recognizing yourself and identifying yourself to a great extent with those beliefs that support the link between your previous experiences and expectations, in correspondence with "that loneliness that drives you crazy"?

Leadership is the merit of the initiative of building yourself around your own Ego subjected to a solicitation of the type "finding connections between your previous experiences and expectations", because your representativeness (from the angle of a wider perspective on the world) occurs after you've gathered and assumed the courage to recognize yourself in the totality of your defects and qualities.

One of the conditions of art is to not create a false, misleading image of what is happening within you. I make here a parallel with a great personality in the history of the world. What helped famous Tyllerand find himself profoundly, permanently trying to discover a new spring of power at the root of every defeat, was the imperious need to note his own experiences in the secret of moments of solitude.

Since his early youth, he would consult his Ego, asking himself various questions. For example: on what grounds did his parents cast him away from their home and didn't love him? On what principles did they base these actions? What moral, what religion or what interest dictated them such a behavior? What human value could be held by a religion and moral that allowed for such a cruel injustice as this one, who he was a victim of?

As Jean Orieux could characterize him: "Cardinal Tyllerand, the magician who made all the games of the world, mastered them, subjugated them with an unprecedented naturalness, surpassing master Bonaparte by a lot in cleverness, had a particularly extensive culture. But above all, he was a penetrating mind, speculative, and proved great skill in his actions. He was famous for his broad views, possessing more than anyone else the superior qualities of the man of genius."

The one who experiences "that loneliness that drives you crazy" is in fact a seeker of truth who wants to benefit from the light of intelligence, the virtue of bearing in silence and with hope the mistakes of each day, the only one capable to get stronger after each challenge. The ascension leadership embraces is the length of a step forward made by the man who challenges the limits of his consciousness, seeking to discover what hidden meaning life has and its role within it.

Friedrich Nietzsche well said: "Life means to constantly turn into light and flame everything we are and everything we meet" during the course of each day. A man of self-transformations, comprising within the borders of his consciousness the concepts of "good and evil" in order to accede in the horizon of full understanding, gets close to that greatness that fate and all other outstanding qualities of brilliance made by sublime spirits.

Identifying yourself to a great extent with those beliefs that support the connection between your experiences and your previous expectations means reflecting on what made you become someone else's value of thinking to get deeper into the concreteness of things, your realism.

Are you led by the belief that any image that you maintain with perseverance and trust can become dependent on the creation and propagation of a new form of art? And is the art you are trying to highlight compatible with the vision of the world at a point of experience of existing as a being wishing to reach a relationship with the discoverer hypostasis of an alternative reality?

The Depth Of A Superior Understanding is not reached through the simplicity of viewing everything innocently, but rather by taking up the courage of recognizing yourself in the totality of your defects and qualities.

A man can reach the phase of recognizing himself and identifying himself to a great extent with the beliefs that support healthy behaviors, with those "Yes" and "No's" of consciousness, only if he always looks back to discover what already exists within himself – the power to forget, forgive, and endure.

He secretly awaits to hear the calling, the unique voice of the heart, which you resonate strongly in future circumstances through the action of the reason that shapes a new reality.

The Depth Of The Human Existential Universe

The way, in which you lift up the man or bring him down, depends on the way in which the externalized reality is filtered by your consciousness.

I was amazed on how far was taking me my road, tortuous, but creative, releasing of any enchainment, interpretable by the alternating percentage between subjectivity and objectivity, between real and unreal. Two constant, whose source of knowledge, for my later development, became more and more obsessive, more ample, and louder.

As if I had made a cross-dimensional journey, stepping into a parallel universe, based on the cause and effect, of which only science, comprehensive, that was beyond the physical possibilities of any scientist, could help me escape. To go back, like a wandering son, loaded by a powerful "magnetism", to the harsh reality of life, to myself, to the depth of my being.

A world apart was fertilizing like a potential energy, as being influenced of some thoughts and feelings, electrifying by their manifestations, requiring a certain harmony, a certain balance to my soul. Revealing and transforming, they were slipping easily, like a gentle steam, in the most hidden corners of my consciousness, gaining more and more ground.

Leadership: Do you seek to demonstrate the possibility of going from the real to the unknown, with various situational nuances, covering in part the mechanisms of thinking with the danger of exaggerations flattening the separate elements of the background you place your image on?

The most significant human mysteries, of the feelings conditioned by objective circumstances, could be perceived only if I reached that level of understanding the true dimensions of his existence, that uplifting power of a thinking consumed by the great questions of the universe.

It was me, the one who was changed. The tenacious man, who after long search and many failures, after many internal disputes and many bitter disappointments, analysis and complex tests, managed to identify the primary element that was underlying alchemy, but also the method underlying the implementation of illusions. Have I turned into a magician? The founder of a superior entity that could easily influence the human existence? Have I really had found that "Lapis philosophorum"?

Was it everything enlarged, exaggerated by a fertile imagination? I was wondering unsure, measuring like a seeker of treasures, the importance of my discovery. In fact, it was just me and I, the magician and the man, two extremes, which although manifested concomitantly, were mutually excluding each other. Warring myself with the expectation, time, anxiety, and routine, without filling with anything that emptiness in the corner of my pride as an explorer. Was it a penalty kick, une tentative de pénalité, given by destiny for a "backward", for my probable regress?

So unpredictable and pretentious was the magic.

Leadership: Do you get caught up in the beauty of the complexity of the background on which the surrealist experience you have acquired to maintain the illusion you do not see takes place?

Leadership is based on a formula, a simple philosophy, the most comprehensive form of its development, supported by all true leaders: "The way, in which you lift up the man or bring him down, depends on the way in which the externalized reality is filtered by your consciousness." About this, I widely discussed in my previous webinar.

The way you perceive reality determines how you perceive your image. Therefore, you should start from this correct premise that the man can be shaped, influenced, if his existence is placed under the influence of some "electrifying" thoughts and feelings which creates a new controlling entity: the magic.

To succeed in identifying the primary element underlying leadership, first find the main and decisive factor of understanding the magic that amazes and gives a good image to a complex artist. Follow the path of knowledge based on the verisimilitude, justifying the quality attributed to the thought of profoundly changing the situation known before it, the values, the attributes of an idea.

Climb to the dominant area of human character, which houses the most important mysteries of the being and of its life, through a celebration of the inexplicable. Examine the human traits with the powerful magnifying glass of your own virtues, looking up into the depths of his being, every angle, every corner made of emotions, requiring a certain balance to his existence - this is the highest mission of the leader.

And this is, in fact, the main indicator which must be considered. With the high power of concentration of an aeronaut, the genuine leader carefully crawls all the "expansion" of human nature, all regions of reason and of the feelings unexplored by anyone. But, at the same time, it underlines the magic of the moment of recognizing itself within a different identity, profoundly illustrating the faulty saying: "Verweile doch ! " (Moment, stay !)

He knows how to take advantage, and even to direct the breeze that blows from the most inaccessible peaks, harsher and more barren of the human psyche, so that to dispel the fumes of personal incompleteness or of self-devaluation in the bright rays of a sunshine. The development and implementation of a moral renewal on any surface covered with the "mist" from the human world – that's the total success in leadership !

The illusion you do not see is what happens to you ass the eyes of the world are fixed to what you have made them believe: that you have forgotten who you really are and that you are lost in another reality.

The depth of the human existential universe brings into the field of attention the result of a conscious targeting of the intellectual effort, emotional and creative of the leader towards unraveling the biggest mysteries of the world: "human being", and also the most important question of all time: "What is the meaning of his existence?".

Just as an archaeologist reconstructs a full epoch after the discovered style of construction, so do you, to understand the human dimension, you must start from the correct premises that underlie human existence, to admit the existence of those weaknesses which undermine the development in his way towards perfection, to identify, analyze them with that "divine organ": heart, and then try to correct or to eliminate them.

Do not you have twinges of consciousness; does your soul hurts when you realize that you, or people around you are unable to reach a certain stage of "evolution"? Have you done something wrong? Did you forget something? Have you missed your mission?

Conclusion: The leader must know that he acts on an unstable and constantly changing ground. The ground consists of people, who are distinct individuals, and who together represent a force that acts synergistically, or not with him.

On quicksand you cannot build anything. Therefore, the leader has the role to find the perfect binder to strengthen the "ground". This goal can be achieved only by deep knowledge of people and their inner universe, as well as finding ways and appropriate methods to lift them up, and not to bring them down.

The Depths Of The Soul

On October 15, 2010

People will be willing to accept you as leader as long as they will perceive you as a man approached to their soul.

At the end of the movie "Prince*of Persia - The Sands of Time"*, there is a dialogue between the princess of Alamut, Tamina, and the Prince of Persia, Dastan, who followed to marry so that the two nations to be closely linked not only by neighborhood and friendship relations.

- How can I trust the man who pierced the walls of my town? the princess asked Dastan, earnestly looking at him, surveying with a constant attention like, trying to decipher his intentions.

Dastan's look was calm and even brilliant. Looking deep into her eyes, filled with an inexpressible joy, he replied with that warmth of heart that will not ever find when you are looking for:

- I begin to think I'm no longer the same person who has pierced them.

Leadership: Are you experiencing the main features of a difficult, and yet, ultimately fulfilling road of an ideal created with an unwavering faith in a victory that ensures your return from a feeling of "deja-vu"?

In his voice vibrated a certainty, a conviction, and an energy, which alarmed the princess. Looking at him astonished, excited, Tamina exclaimed cautiously:

- It's a short period for a person to change so much.

- Perhaps, answered Dastan, who undoubtedly remembered all the events lived with her.

- It looks like you discovered something Prince... a new spiritual consciousness.

- A destiny, he replies in a voice full of quiet.

And then it was as if time has stood still. These words lit the fire in the heart of Princess. She looked at Dastan with an expression of tenderness that seems like love, the voice of her heart was completely happy and had promised only joy and fulfillment. An almost superhuman serenity seemed to enshroud them both as a halo. Their blood felt the same ardors.

Leadership: Does the inspiration to accomplish a great destiny stem from your total acceptance of a reality called "coincidenta oppositorum" in the act of retrieving the self from which you have always fled?

One of the secrets of leadership is that you do not need to understand one thing to feel it. There are times when people feel instinctively, but cannot express in words. I just know. I understand instantly how things really are. Perhaps the reason or conscious may fail, but heart will never betray them.

Princess Tamina examined Prince Dastan only by eyes, she did not judge the facts, but she felt his nature, soul, in his warm and tender eyes. Watching the glimpse from his eyes, she understood. She was immediately engulfed in a kind of respectful and mute admiration. As she could look to the depths of his soul, and saw the true face, his true nature, his true "ego". She would never be valued that union if not "seen" the soul of Prince, what he thought in his mind and what he felt for her.

As a leader, you must take a journey: a journey towards yourself, that will help you know in detail the personality and the beliefs that you have, and to consider your choices that you will have to make. Look at you with the eyes of your soul, and then shape your potential after your own beliefs, criteria and ideas. Seek to be as you see yourself. Give voice to the reality through what you are, what you think, what you feel, and what you want. The leadership is strengthened by developing your emotional intelligence.

Coincidenta oppositorum, a philosophical and religious concept that signifies the "coincidence of opposites", applies in the situation where two people with completely different convictions, through a twist of fate, come to share the same experiences, the same values, to possess similar knowledge and to think through each other's thoughts at every next step.

And to find your self from which you have always fled is similar to buying a map that helps you shorten your way to the final destination even when you're about to give up on your journey.

Leadership: Do you practice the application of freedom in alternation when you are about to feel something you do not want to feel?

Leadership is the product of your contribution to perpetuating a correct and clear understanding of the experience to connect with others. The way in which you manifest yourself in their eyes, ensuring the ratio between natural and forced, says a thing or two about your refinement, about the depth of your own reality – where you see yourself as an entirely different person, giving criteria to classify the dispersed elements in your personal climate.

In this regard, leadership isn't only about a future filled with aspirations that you can see through the mind power of controlling reality, but it's also about the present where you find yourself as a spirit, leaving your mark on improving those contrasting aspects that have a significant impact on the conscience. The conscience of being the bearer of a unique destiny – the destiny of your own functioning in relation with a high significance level.

The definition of what places you in a higher "illumination" configuration and transformation, at a conscious level, towards a new dimension of who you truly are is given by the French author Marguerite Yourcenar in one of her books:

"We all practice applying the liberty in alternation: emotions, ideas, preoccupations, at any moment they must be able to interrupt themselves and start all over again. The certainty to be able to chase them away or call them back like slaves that deprive us of any tyrannical tendency, untying ourselves of the feeling of any restraint."

Everything that relates with your personality and convictions, either distancing you of what you usually include in the sphere of your own greatness, or drawing you closer to what fuels your happiness, is reflected in this "liberty in alternation", that must be practiced as a role-play.

It points to the expectations, attitudes and strategies of the individual for his approach in a changing climate, in a game full of interruptions and replays that always fully represent his own thoughts and feelings. And in this case leadership can be considered the result of a hard work with the self, accompanied by a leap in the future, a cantonation in the past and a coming back to the present.

To feel something that you don't want to feel is to admit that what you were doing before you failed was not what you wanted, or that what is happening to you is an amplification of the previously crystalized feelings of abandonment.

Many leaders are showing a growing concern towards achieving results, placing less value on the human side. They are looking to simply push people in the right direction, directly or indirectly forcing them to line on their own beliefs and values. But they do not understand that to change people you need to intervene in their behavior, in the minds and especially their hearts. People feel who you are, and if they do not see you as a person able to express genuine feelings of care and compassion, as a long-term partner, but perceive you as a master, then it will never create a spiritual bond between you and them.

Just as the blood supply towards tissues depends primarily on the amount of blood that the heart pumps, namely on the cardiac output - so achieving an emotional maturity, which is absolutely necessary to establish and maintain on long term the relationships with the people around, depends primarily on the positive contribution that your leadership has in the increasing of people's ability of relating to you, and of the "quantity" of patience you should impose to yourself in order to find their value, their true nature and their true characteristics.

Sometimes, if you want to change something that doesn't work in your life you must be aware and recognize that what you need to experience is someone else's creation.

The Depths Of The Soul are hard to penetrate, especially for those who do not know the answer to what is happening to them all along the sinuous path of a destiny from which one cannot escape, not matter what.

It's very important for a leader to be perceived by the people who elected him as their ally, a person close to them, which will drive them like a guide on the best ways. Sometimes his soul (his true nature) is not known until after long collaborations and sometimes can only be guessed. But once discovered, people's behavior will be favorable to leader, or will take a bad turn which will create a huge gap between them, placing them in antagonistic positions, harmful to both sides.

How does your leadership contribute to the increasing of your people's ability of relating to you?

The Deserted Islands Of Understanding

On August 12, 2013

Ensure the evolution of your leadership towards new horizons, without directing your power of understanding the science to extremes that reach beyond the unanimously accepted normalcy limits.

I came across a multitude of islands, one of Jules Verne's heroes confessed, sown by a whimsical hand, large or small, the majority barely jutting out of the waters and so low that, sometimes, the smallest tide was enough to fully cover them.

The islands represented the symbol of a diversity of landmarks, well established on the map of my visions and ideals, between the checkpoints of complete knowledge, above any understanding. These contact surfaces, big and small compared with the size of my Self, indicators of a stagnation in the deep area of some idealistic experiences, expressed the connection between various processes that kept constant, presenting a maximum of stability towards the perturbing factors that generated strange thoughts.

Thoughts that seemed to repeat endlessly in a real visual journal of long gone times. Thoughts that rose me above the ordinary and introduced me to projection areas that alternated generally accepted perceptions about space and time.

A being's spiritual territory is an exercise of invading a lesser known island. I was looking for a sign, supported by an infinite multitude of more or less relative truths that could have settled a connection between answers and questions. But the murky waters I was bathing in at that time, maybe the most important experience of my life, couldn't be covered with anything but the highest layers of the psyche in relation to science.

Leadership: Does the meaning of your life amount to an incessant exploration of the horizon between acquiring a new self-consciousness and the experience of managing a knowledge oriented towards changing perceptions of what you relive with your memories?

Practically all my intellectual force, in extreme efficiency conditions, was being grinded or became inactive after a few cycles of use, just like a chemical reaction, which donated the energy that determines transport processes in an anti-entropic meaning. My thought system stopped exhibiting an ideal behavior. The islands seemed to expand towards the edges which exceeded my acceptation dimensions, creating the effect of chain negative reaction.

I was standing in front of a rediscovery of my essence of being, as I have never seen it before. I couldn't not notice that the radical innovations I was generating, especially the inaccessible I referred to, produced a certain distortion in the analysis or interpretation of the combinations of absurd and chaotic ideas. I had to sift through the chaos of my travelling thoughts towards new destinations, in search of a glimmer of honest clarity. Where was I in relation to myself?

The islands had to interfere with the truth aspiration, which included any interpretation. And this involved only one thing: to stop doubting the arbitrary character of my life experience in relation to understanding my thought structure. I had to find a logic in everything I did, no matter how hidden it was. And a fluency in my mind, my thoughts and my ideas. Otherwise, the situation would have become unbearable.

My memories still relate to these isles that shape my perceptions of what is important to learn new about myself in the face of a different reality, one that exists beyond what I think I can recognize at first glance. The science that I feel able to understand, the existential determination of the knowledge still connected with the interpretations of a literary life, can be gained by approaching an idea that connects the whole world to me.

Leadership: Do you stop at the gates of an unconquered fortress, or continue to offer new interpretations of your life experiences to landmarks that are placed in less accessible areas?

Do thoughts lift you higher than the ordinary? Are you in search of a sign, supported by an infinite multitude of more or less relative truths? Could the murky waters where you bathe be covered by anything else but the highest layers of the psyche in relation to science?

In terms of science and life that can become superfluous in front of the actions whose permanent protagonist is you, the winner you can obtain from contributing to these two challenges pragmatically and responsibly approached, meant to determine a good operation, don't need to present them as an object meant to replace true leadership. But as a product of thinking beyond traditional patterns, which achieves the making of a visionary conception about the evolution of the relation between leadership and the unpredictable results of knowledge, in connection with your Self.

To stop at the gates of a fortress yet unconquered, but one of colossal significance, means to contradict the verisimilar, the immediate, perceptible reality, by determining a very low probability of securing a new self-image.

In the absence of even the most frail perspective renewal that can enhance the chances of growing the profit you can get from your "accessibility", you will set on your road towards excellence in reverse. The landmarks well established on the map of your visions and ideal act impeccably and will gradually extend to the limit where they could become uncontrollable.

And then leadership will give in, or will register a minimum of stability towards the perturbing factors of an inappropriate supply with approaches that don't bring the expected results.

Leadership: Can you extend the interpretations you give to reality by becoming aware of self-acceptance and the right to exist as you are before an unknown horizon?

An unfamiliar horizon is an island that you have not deepened but deserves all your attention, being probably located in the vicinity of that side of science to have truths about the essential nature of things and phenomena. That means being able to get rid of the conformism of society and to work beyond prejudice.

Two intermediate moves with uncertain perspectives can lead to a configuration modification or invalidation of your operational system. The first, reaching an attraction and unification between thought and knowledge, in the sense of an ascension towards superior ways of understanding leadership through a better framing of the landmarks on the map of own visions and ideals. The second, creating a bridge between the control points of perfect knowledge, in contrast with the opposite force of any possibility of self-assertion.

These two moves can lock or unlock the access paths towards the science's unconquered fortress gates, which always has its place at the top of leadership. The gates open and enhance the innovative capacities, disturbed by the aspiration towards height and perfection, slightly distorting the truth you know about you and that can't always align with the openness towards change.

Just as a good conversation implies a balance between listening and speaking, so the connection between your evolutionary process and the perceptions about yourself throughout the production of new approaches and idea transformations must remain constant. Otherwise, your intellectual force, with maximum efficiency, will be grinded or become inactive after a few cycles of use.

Unanimously accepted limits of normality are given by those aspects of reality that can be seen and cannot replace aspects of unreality.

Ensuring the evolution of leadership towards new horizons means to enrich yourself with new interpretations of your life and learning experiences, filtered through a sense of understanding of reality that others do not know how to exploit and extract from it what is valuable.

The deserted islands of understanding are those areas insufficiently known and researched whose exploration is hindered or limited by current knowledge. Persistence in these areas leads to a stagnation in leadership and eventually furthering away the originally proposed terminus point. And in the end to the decadence of leadership.

The Devil's Servant

On June 10, 2010

Examine well your convictions that you form about the one who leads you, by giving them an order which will take into account the impact that they could have on you.

The pacifists' principle says that you should never harm other people. But the devil doesn't take into account morals and ethics, which humans are so fond of. He judges people by some very rigorous criteria, which only he knows, treating them according to his interests.

Do you remember the movie "The Mummy - Tomb Of The Dragon Emperor (2008)"? General Yang always hoped to bring back to life emperor Han, the only one who could reinstall order in the chaos in his country and, then, he could become his right hand. And he succeeded. Awaking the sleeping one, his dream became true. All he had to do was to prove his absolute loyalty to HIM.

Leadership: Can you create a new reality of your life with a "duplicate content" of the type THE VERY BEST, without feeling that you've put a part of you in it?

Many are called, but few are chosen. The devil never can carry out the plan without the help of some loyal servants. Even he needs support. But the hardest thing in the world is to find his perfect servant, who enthusiastically will devote himself body and soul, day and night to his ideal. The perfect servant must be fit for everything. Imperfection, doubt, mistake are considered weaknesses.

His old general, general Ming had betrayed him that is why emperor Han had some difficulties in trusting the new contender for such a high rank. However, he accepted that Yang be his general because he had resurrected him from the dead. That proved his loyalty. Such a man doesn't need a resume, he mustn't be tested, evaluated, monitored, go through trials and receive grades any more. With no doubt, he is the right man; he is decisive, has the mind of an explorer and proves confidence in himself.

Leadership: Is your importance measured by the mission that you assume in an effort without success, but which has the potential to meet the standard of proof of an ungraspable greatness?

Hatred that lies in an unshakable heart cannot be concealed forever. Emperor Han, who had the sole objective of becoming the ruler of the world, could never have quenched his hate towards his enemies, all the people who would never have wanted and who would never have accepted to obey him.

Emperor Han, brought back to life after 2000 years, could not forget his old thought of conquering the world, but on the contrary, he was even more determined to reach his goal, especially that both him and his army were condemned to suffer a torturing death.

By the fact that not even after his death, emperor Han never abandoned the mission he himself had assumed, he became a fearful leader.

Leadership: Can you open a promising perspective of reconnecting to a supreme entity, gaining confidence in the context of a change of origin?

Whoever follows his leader devotedly, shares the same fate with him. Whoever serves the devil cannot break free of him. This is also the case of general Yang. It's madness. It's grim, but there was a sort of relationship between them, a mysterious relationship and I cannot give it a name. But under no circumstance can it be called friendship because the devil never has friends, he only has servants.

His immense ambition to serve his master and his confidence that he would win, added to the confidence in his own strength, gave general Yang a powerful impetus, a courage relating only to madness or genius, but which lead him to damnation. He was very ambitious, but in his rush to succeed in everything that he had set forth, he judged superficially. And paid for his mistake. He should have thought better before rushing into such an adventure together with the devil.

The origin of a man dwells in his freedom, but in leadership, too much freedom as to what regards rules gives rise to antipathy because it ultimately leads to a lack of coherence in achieving objectives and instability in what regards the decision-making autonomy. This origin of man must use another variant of acquiring a privileged status, namely through symbolic equivalence: "to go one's way".

Basically, General Yang had to claim only the "display" value of a supreme power, and not its personal use version.

Leadership: Do you assess as objectively as possible the tendency to be oriented towards tasks without acting against image representations that are often simultaneous with another coordinated representation?

Just as a leader must have the ability to assess his people, so also those who choose a leader has to evaluate him with special attention. It rarely happens for a leader to have other intentions than the ones declared to his team and to deceive the team's confidence or to guide it to an end point, other than the initial one, and even to failure.

Do you have the ability to sense the truth about the nature of the one you accept to lead you? Have you somehow made a wrong impression about him?

You enter a new field just for the sake of serving someone? Do you recognize the importance of selecting the right leader? How can you recognize the true leader?

Your success depends, on a proper sense own, largely on your ability to choose. Examine well your convictions that you form about the one who leads you, by giving them an order which will take into account the impact that they could have on you. Think twice before choosing your leader.

The representation of an image of superiority is, in most cases, simultaneous with another coordinated representation: a multiplication of a self that projects the other in itself.

The Devil's Servant is the man who cannot rise above the spiritual condition of the preacher of a frightening belief.

The Difficult Target From The Box Of The Accused

On October 12, 2012

The way you face the reality that others intend to impose on you, is the result of the transformation process that brings you face to face with yourself.

It was something totally unexpected. The woman shuddered at the sight of the assassin, as if she would be touched with a red iron, because she felt a terrible thrill passing through whole her body, incinerating all her hope, all the power hidden in the subconscious, all the unmanifested feelings.

Her innocence and his justice intertwined with a dizzying will and determination. As if between the two of them would have been a unique parallel, direct and disturbing: her weakness, her education in the spirit of the church - and his instinct of a killer, to which is added his role as an intermediary link between the "procedural exceptions and defenses background" between a pure acceptance and renunciation of principles.

The poor woman was aware that her hour has come. She unwillingly became a target. The moment arrived when she has to be put to the test. Her heart ached. For a moment, she felt transported into another world, of the defeated, of the exiled, of the ones taken out of the laws' defense. She caught a propitious moment, and looked into the eyes of the killer, pondering it all. It was impossible to escape. From all the parts were watching the iron laws of justice. She was in a box of the accused.

Leadership: Is the lesson given to you by the hazard that of having the ability to diminish the potential of a danger before it hits?

O realitate impusă cu scopul de a deturna opțiunile individului. Seized by a sense of rebellion, of culpability, so deeply rooted that no logic, and no reason could not ever annihilate it, the woman gathered all the courage of her heart and said:

- You have no reason to hurt me...

- No, but I gave my word, replied the assassin. Your husband had the chance to save you. But, he used you in trying to save himself.

- You should not do this, said the woman with a voice of an angel.

As a superior man, as a merciful judge who grants a last chance to the one condemned to death, Anton Chigurh throws up a coin twenty-five cents, catches it, and tells her:

- Okay, that's all I can do for you. Choose.

- No ! I will not choose ! categorically replied the woman with a striking courage, worthy of a warrior. The coin has nothing to say. *

Leadership: Can you analyze yourself from the perspective of a self-evident understanding by experiencing that sense of distance from suffering that has very little connection with the present, but makes you think that you belong to something or someone?

Someone well-remarked: "The reality that you live is the mirror reflecting everything inside you: compassion, hope, humanity, solidarity, positive thoughts, forgiveness, inner peace, confidence and faith."

If this reality, in which you find yourself it is stolen, modified according to the will of others, subject to some different criteria than those which should prevail, then it will produce a trigger in your way of being.

Instead of evolving towards a higher level of your consciousness, with which to resonate 100%, so towards a deep understanding of the essence from whom you are molded, you will be anchored as a rusty wreck in an enclosed space, not ventilated, in which the "nothingness" will take roots. A flow of an abnormal change process, forced, which sometimes significantly exceeds that form of reality that you claimed it over the years.

The leadership may prove useless, devoid of substance, if it reduces the degree of strength and protection in the collision with an opposite pole. It can turn into an agent of a rupture with yourself and with the nature which it creates, with the resources, which it puts you on hand in order to keep your status as a man of great character.

A kind of sabotage from outside, from the unpredictable direction of an elite led by other principles, unhealthy, and in the other terms that are not characteristic to it, which do not honors the most basic values.

Leadership: Can you face the uncertainty of a final result by a deviation from the general rule according to which throughout your life you pay more and more for what you receive than for what you give.

Do you unwillingly become a target of the reality of others? How do you manifest your personality at the contact with another reality? Do you feel transported to another world, of the defeated ones? Are you in the box of the accused? How can you maintain your stability in the conflict between the accusers and defenders?

You cannot be a great man, if you continue endlessly to stay small in the eyes of others, if you let yourself caught, like a snowball rolling continuously in various situations, in which you find it difficult to act.

If the source of values that feeds your beliefs It stops functioning, your way towards achieving perfection will break down and will continue to slide until any intervention, and any major manifestation of your will no longer be useful.

Leadership: Can you face the reality that others intend to impose upon you in a world where nothing seems to be what it is and where anything, absolutely anything, can happen?

To confront the reality that others are trying to impose on you is like collecting mirrors, neutral surfaces against which you can look weak or strong in order to see yourself reflected. It is an attempt to reveal without restraint your fidelity towards your own identity, a form of manifestation of the purest side of your Ego, which constantly watches over you, especially in the harsh conditions.

For your development to be as healthy as possible try to follow carefully the red thread of the events that challenge you, independent of your reason, that unsettle you and involve you in a risky game. Try to foresee what does not fit in any way with your searches and do not let yourself be captured by the strange force of the hazard and coincidences that make it so that, at a given time, each to be close to each other, looking for or just intersecting without his will.

Beyond your values and beliefs that you create by building relationships, since this is a constant process, any prospects that make you understand the true essence of your own personality, must be at any moment and under all conditions, possible.

The precarious reasoning that allows for the existence of the factor called "resignation" interferes with what you find needs to be changed in the world starting with what happens to you in a way that sees beyond the limitations of immediate reality and the danger of the facts that spread out before you in your life.

The difficult target from the box of the accused is the man who, depending on the hazard, is condemned without his will to change his destiny. He goes from one stage of acceptance to one of survival !

Are you ready to start an assessment of the reality that you live, when you are under the influence of the ones estranged of the sound principles of leadership? The boundary between accepting their reality or rejecting it, being anyway extremely fragile.

To accept the reality that others are trying to impose on you, always requires an assessment of your own principles, feelings and modalities of action. Do you accept turning into a gravedigger of the reality that you live, or to become its architect?

As a leader, you must be in compliance with reality, but also to yourself - that unitary whole (composed of ideas, concepts, principles and feelings) strengthened over time. Accepting a reality imposed, in disagreement with what you are, can send you into the box of the accused. Be faithful to your principles and your Ego, be yourself an impartial judge of what you are, and you will prove your innocence and fidelity towards you, and towards the people, who have invested their trust in you.

The way you face the reality that others intend to impose on you, is the result of the transformation process that brings you face to face with yourself.

The Direction Of Leadership

Find the essence of understanding the image that amazes you by its unexpected intrigue, accepting as a landmark the reality that is "outside" your expectations.

I'd made an imperious obligation of knowing such things that only the suggestion of some revelations – with the role of "take heed" – could determine their importance, at the crossroads of options my future depended on. In an image that very much corresponded with that reality where the victory over the attempts of interpreting certain situations, individual and collective actions resounded, in an attempt to find a guiding thread between the struggle of life and the admiration for high moral virtues.

Such a reality could remain integrated at an elementary level of consciousness with the risk of diluting into a reprehensible passivity, like a sort of punishment of my revealing concerns, being evaluated in accordance with the ability of recognizing the emotions of others and the ability to react to them. The advanced conception of the world, extracting the precious ores of the perspective of seeing everything through the eyes of an artist who makes his religion from the refusal of the accomplished act, to melt it to the crucible of memory that coagulates meanings shared by large groups of people could be the supreme expression of my mentality and art.

In addition, fairly advanced in terms of ideas, feelings, and acts of thought that tested my ability to foresee any variable of the "painting" type, which included the appearance of certain answers and theories under the action of random forces, of which only a mind full of expectations up to refusal is capable of grasping, I had myself sat numerous times between the way of seeing the world and the way of acting within its limits.

Thus, a continuous tissue was formed in the interior of my literary journey, from the sensation of sight in the conditions of penetrating a mystery, of descending in the open depths in creation, by relating with the most mysterious depths of man, up to the sensation of being a participant in the creation of the content of a new approach to leadership.

But always a new approach requires, through the variety and magnitude of situations, a relentless dynamic of life and the characters within it, forces of movement that try to oppose change or accept it without opposition.

Leadership: Do you qualify in the phases of the training of the type "guide your own exploration of the world around you, to what you can do with it", so to produce an essentialized vision comprised between what is happening to you and what you find that actually is hiding from you?

A fragment of the book Children of the Wind by Jorge Icaza highlights the reality of those things I tried to understand, those important pieces necessary for the completion of the "painting" I had to polish well before giving them a certain color in my works.

"One summer afternoon, the almighty priest of Guagraloma was called to give the Holy Communion to a dying man. But in his way, was the devil. A group of mestizos had made a circle around an exciting cockfight, laughing and making catches. What difference does a dying man make when a profitable game and a compelling stake intervene?

After a while, amidst shouts and comments at the end of the fight, a child emerged, crying and panting because of the hard ascent. Approaching the priest, he said: "He died ! He died, Father ! " It is understood that he died, who says this? He received two blows to the head like bullets ! answered the priest, trembling with emotion.

No, no, he died of fever, in his shack. All had abandoned him... Now he needs nothing... He needs no one, sighed the boy deeply. And only in that moment it was easy for him to discover in the sweet and obsequious smile of the priest the cunning greed, unscrupulous."

Within each man of the cloth hides a wizard, and it is easily understandable that good or evil hangs, as Schopenhauer said, especially from what is and what happens within him.

And the painting a writer interested in capturing the humane outlines, working on the living portraits inspired from reality, what we admire in the depth and perspective of the image that his text highlights, is the way of capturing that special something inside of man that comes out when the reality "outside" of his expectations has a large influence on him.

Leadership: What have you at hand to control the emotion of discovering fragments of truths from life's experiences, interacting with the image of a new version of reality that automatically introduces you to a cause that does not remove the character and the consequences of the deed?

The reality "outside" of expectations, created by the most atypical characters, captures all those circumstances of high impact that sustain or paralyze the emotion of discovering new truths or fragments of truths, stemming from life experiences, from the impressions of others and that produce pleasure or displeasure, desire or repulsion, sympathy or antipathy.

Therefore, we have to choose between believing that the understanding of leadership, based on accepting the differences between good and evil produced by the recognition of the true human potential is in the phases of the training of the type "guide your own exploration of the world around you, to what you can do with it". And the fact that the fruits of life, as we understand and desire it, are those parts we can control and those we can accept as being normal, are at the crossroads between greatness and villainy.

To guide your own exploration of the surrounding world towards what you can do with it means to get close to a clear understanding of the truths that hide behind appearances and opt for the facet of the essence of what remains within you after you have accepted everything.

The essence of understanding leadership is similar to the process of acquiring the most penetrative writing: is revealed by going through a difficulty and troubling path.

First you must endure for a long time the consequence of manifesting an event external to your being, whose effects increase the possibility of producing a wide range of experiences. Then, you must accept it within the reality of your existence as a landmark for determining your dominant position: that of a moderator of a severe general image, that of a revealer of a more nuanced meaning of the world or that of a man who stoically bears that pressure of revelations that are not consistent with the set of values followed and promoted worldwide.

The only thing you have at your fingertips to control the emotion of discovering some awkward or confusing truths from the experiences of life is that moderate motivation to become aware of the other contexts and values in your life that favor a new trajectory of spiritual ascension.

Spiritual ascension seeks only to manifest the good and the choice to remain faithful to beliefs based on humbleness, tolerance, self-giving, and love for man and humanity.

The Direction Of Leadership is given by the course you followed after passing the crossroads between the way of seeing the world and the way of acting within its limits, between the truths found independently of your own will and the accepting of a reality assessed in accordance with the ability of recognizing the emotions of others and the ability of reacting to them.

The Direction The Leader Is Heading Towards

On April 09, 2010

What you represent to yourself is far more important than what you represent to everyone else.

Master Chan Xiatang told Huoan:

People's talent and skills are, of course, great or not, because these things cannot be learned. For example, those who have a small piece of paper cannot pack large items. Those with short ropes cannot draw water from a deep well. An owl can catch a louse and see a hair at night, but when the sun rises, its rays irritate the owl's eyes so much that it cannot see a hill. It seems that talent and skills have been divided.(Thomas Cleary - Zen Lessons)

This story teaches us that each person corresponds to a model of internal representation, corresponds to a certain pattern of active genes that make them unique in certain circumstances. Just as each artistic genre corresponds to a certain way of expression, in multiple aspects: composition, vocabulary, syntax, style figures.

The secret is in you, the leader. Just as fire, earth, air and water form the four elements of nature – so too do solidarity, empathy, responsibility and mutual respect ensure the cohesion of the team, of the people who have accepted you as their leader and who follow you in the direction you choose. These are the "parts" you need to connect in order for your leadership to work well.

Imagine trying to find a match between four pieces in a puzzle. What are you looking for to decide if they fit or not? You must first keep in mind that each of these four pieces must intertwine, serve each other, fit like a glove in the "context" of this puzzle. Each element must evolve through the prism of the four factors: knowledge, affectivity, intelligence and will, to eventually form a single unitary whole.

The premise of leadership success lies in the harmony of its fundamental components, which I have mentioned. In addition, no one will be able to become a performer by building their leadership on a disharmonious combination of its constituent elements.

Leadership: Does your transformation into a very self-confident person correspond to a model of internal representation that can improve your experience of accepting yourself as an autonomous individual?

The leadership model that deserves to have an influence on people must be based on content, on the relationship of resemblance and understanding between your profile and their profile, between the characteristics that best represent you and those that interest them. When you move to a higher level of leadership, it becomes important for your skills to be validated by others. Or, as a well-known leadership expert puts it, each step of development involves further development as part of leadership capacity.

Fighting alone means tilting at windmills. That is why you must have reliable allies to achieve "victory" for the benefit of all. How do you gain allies? The secret is in you, the leader. It exists, but it must be found and you must know how to listen, for it often cries out: "Here I am."

The secret lies in what defines you, in what gives you authenticity and integrates you into the circle of people looking in the same direction. It is given by that element of you that dominates the existence of your leadership and that can bring to others benefits of any kind – a use, a constructive value. It is that something, that energy, that emotional force, that power of influence that you have to use in your favor, but in such a way that those around you reach their maximum potential.

The secret is found only by those who have learned and know how to play Chess or Bridge, and not by those who specialize in poker or, worse, by those who would limit themselves to "Pig". Leadership is a smart "game" and it can't be played by just anyone – it's a team game with multiple winners.

Leadership: Does the ability to evaluate yourself begin to take shape in the light of your position of "apparent power" that turns you into a circumstantial, unbearable case of liability?

What is your position on promoting relationships with other people: Striker or Defender?

When I speak of leadership, I start from the idea of progress, of ascending to the top step of the pyramid of values, to which brave people will always aspire. But in order for this ascension to take place without any inhibitory factor, without the slightest degradation of your own potential, it is necessary to develop human relationships. Ascension is nothing more than a combination of self-imposed development and experience gained over time, to which I would add the passion and enthusiasm for your work and position, but especially for the exceptional potential of people. For without them you cannot progress.

What attitude do you take towards human relations? Do you reject any form of relating to people? Do you attack any thinking that does not correspond to yours, restricting any individual or collective initiative to intervene in your leadership? Or do you defend and encourage the evolution of people through constant focused actions to develop their resources? In order to move from "amateurism" to "professionalism" you must develop your passion for human development, to build effective collaborative relationships.

Can you score a goal from a closed angle?

Just as in football, the game of defense is, by definition, only collective, so is leadership, adding that your efficiency in getting things done and the ability to work with other people are always limited. It's as if you want to score from a closed angle: only a few can do that. If those leadership qualities that you have do not guarantee your success in establishing and maintaining relationships, then they are ineffective.

Can you express your vision in such a way as to make people act in its spirit? How do you interact with people? What is the price of your progress? Are people willing to pay that price? Do you control your expectations? Is your leadership a low-risk, high-profit opportunity for people? Do your decisions meet people's expectations, or are they against human nature?

Can you find the connection point between what you are and the goals you are pursuing, so that your leadership allows an optimal highlight of the role you play in a circumstantial position?

How do you position yourself towards your goals?

The direction in which the leader is heading is also the direction in which the people are heading. Mrs. Georgeta Vanțiu, about whom I told you in another article, had a real battle to promote the Spanish language and culture. She was successful because countless people, eager to learn the Spanish language and culture, came together around her vision and ideals. She has achieved her goal by creating a learning environment that others have accepted. It was not her ability to attract people that was the ace up her sleeve, but the choice she made and the attitude she adopted and promoted. If people are willing to choose your path, then they will adopt the same attitude as you – and you will not encounter too many obstacles along the way.

As I have said many times before, people and the leader must form a strong and professional team that will work efficiently and correctly, with seriousness and responsibility, and that will be able to consistently achieve remarkable results. For this, it is especially important that team members, who have a well-established role, help each other whenever needed; to have a lot of trust in each other, to share the same visions and to be devoted and motivated to the ultimate goal.

Nothing can be achieved, nothing can work properly, no progress is possible and everything will remain unchanged if one or more team members do not work at full capacity. Everyone must produce something useful, bring their contribution to the smooth running of the company and be very diligent, very serious and responsible in solving the problems related to their competence.

The functioning of leadership is based on teamwork, loyalty to those you work with, enthusiasm and passion for the activity you carry out, competence, efficiency , and last but not least unity and fairness. This means that all the members of the team work together to find solutions, and work on equal footing, not less for some and more for others, not having someone standing idle while others break their backs working.

"One for all and all for one", the famous motto of the musketeers can also be applied in leadership, which implies cohesion, mutual help based on a unity of thought and action. The role of the leader is to determine the emergence of this unity of thought and action.

Leadership is the position you hold as an autonomous agent in those situations where the ultimate goal is not to perform meaningfully and effectively in difficult times, but to demonstrate the truth of all your perceptions and thoughts in the most unexpected ways.

The Direction The Leader Is Heading Towards must, first of all, be the direction of accessing the level of the Integrated Self and the level of the Higher Self. So learn to work toward self-affirmation and self-fulfillment before positioning yourself in a particular relationship with the world.

The Director Adapts His Editing To The Music, According To A Special Mechanism

Finding the perfect match between the image and a "higher revelation" requires a clear knowledge of the available visual material.

Prokofiev considers Eisenstein a fine musician precisely because he notices the symphonic character of his montage constructions, the nuanced understanding of the musical phenomenon. Eisenstein, who on many occasions noted his lack of skill in music, nevertheless once wrote: "I think that it is only by chance that I am not a composer. Because nothing interests me more than compositional problems".

The composer takes into account the musical opinions of the director, it happens that he redoes the music of a fragment six times and when he once introduces some previously composed themes, he then redoes the music at the request of Eisenstein who "didn't let old horseshoes sneak up on him ."

When Prokofiev begins, the director adapts his montage to the music, according to a special mechanism. First of all, he has to imagine very vividly, to see clearly all the plastic material available for that scene. Then he has to look for the perfect coincidence between a precise image and a certain fragment of the music.

He looks for the coincidence between the "invoice of the object or the landscape" with the time of a musical passage, an intimate consonance that cannot be rationally explained, between a musical fragment and a fragment from the image. It is not so simple, because at this stage the fragments of images are in chaos and their ordering, according to the precise structure of the music, pushes him to jump from one end of the film to the other, to guess which juxtaposition of fragments will correspond a certain musical phrase.

Leadership: How can your work become a visual interpretation of the ideas and emotions expressed in a realistic composition, providing an integrated view of the story that inspires you?

The text highlights the complexity of the process of synchronizing the music with the filmed image. Eisenstein was a perfectionist who wanted an absolute match between the two artistic elements. Their collaboration demonstrates the power of art to transcend boundaries and create works of unique beauty. The text provides valuable insight into the artistic relationship between Prokofiev and Eisenstein, highlighting the mutual respect, artistic exigency, and collaborative spirit that defined this fruitful collaboration.

Music represents "a higher revelation", if we consider the director's work as a visual interpretation of emotions and ideas expressed through sound.

Prokofiev considers Eisenstein a fine musician precisely because he notes the symphonic character of his montage constructions and the nuanced understanding of the musical phenomenon. The relationship between music and image has been a topic of debate among composers and directors for decades. In essence, the symphonic structure of a musical work can be compared to the editing of a film: the organization of themes, harmonies, musical phrases and pauses reflect the movement between scenes and the rhythm of the story.

Leadership: How can you reposition your artistic vision to integrate the aspiration for a perfect match between the precise image and what resonates in people's souls?

In creating a perfect consonance between music and image, the composer seeks a fine balance between melodic structure and visual expression. When Prokofiev begins, then Eisenstein adapts his montage to the music, according to a special mechanism. First, he must imagine very vividly, see clearly all the plastic material available for that scene. Then they have to look for the perfect match between a precise image and a certain piece of music.

In this phase, the fragments of images are in chaos and their ordering, according to the precise structure of the music, pushes him to jump from one end of the film to the other, to guess which juxtaposition of fragments will correspond to a certain musical phrase. However, such an ideal juxtaposition is not always easy to achieve, as film 'musical editing' can be a complex process and often requires repeated reinterpretations to find the perfect match."

An exceptional director must know how to reflect in his own creation the process of ordering visual fragments in accordance with what resonates in people's souls.

The director adapts his montage to the music, according to a special mechanism, taking into account the visual image and the emotion that resonates in the souls of those watching. He also combines sounds and rhythm with visual sequences to create a harmonious and immersive experience for the audience.

The Director And The Magician

On November 09, 2012

Diminish the vulnerability of your protagonist position in the show of life, by performing thorough researches that will result in strengthening the positive aspects characterizing the "Man" within you.

I harbored in my subconscious an abnormal attraction for the strange things, devoid of significance, but revealing and bearing significance through the very way I relate to them. I always had the feeling that something else is sharing my life with me, a constant presence, which sent me messages through a permanent non-verbal communication. An effect with a revealing potential of a confrontation between two human types, two protagonists in the tightly-closed spectacle of life: I and He, The Director And The Magician.

A transition from one state to another. As a kind of exchange of souls that should work easily and smoothly. Without guessing that all this chapter of my life, all this gear in which coupled the two halves that composed my personality, this va-et-vient continu, would turn into a race, where I estranged more and more of myself.

I got it as the prince from the oriental tale, who, breaking seal after seal from the locked doors, finds more and more jewelries and gems, piled up in every room. And, greedier, he takes them by turns, impatient to reach the last one. The spectacle of his life was that of always being in search of something to echo inside him, to make him happy, something to express his inner ills and torments, but he could not discipline his mind to accept the appreciations of a life focused on the relationship with God.

My excesses were more and more of a "selective", fantastic, mystical nature. Forced by an unprecedented intensity, I walked towards the headquarters of a higher authority, of an agnostic consciousness, sinful by the fact that buried or reinvented all my principles and values. My position towards myself, towards my guidance, towards reality, towards society and the world was ambiguous, extremely shaky, dominated by a foreign influence.

Leadership: Can you take yourself as an example in the construction of the quality of life in order to crystallize a consciousness whose long agony is to separate the individual experience from the experience of a profound conversion to the authenticity and validity of a non-possessive approach?

The magician was caught in a continuous game of mirrors that always reflected a different personality. A strange game that set in motion - in a great way - all the fibers of boldness, strengthening all the too convenient excuses, which justified the lack of the traits' continuity that characterized the "Man" within him.

He was so obsessed with his art, of the pure acting, consisting in an exchange of identities, faces and different roles. He was not as concerned about his performance on stage, as more of the one resulting from his "live" interpenetration with ordinary people, the small spectators. Insomuch that became perfectly master on his means to impose himself through a disguised form.

The positivity he showed was that he was not willing to enter into the conflict of life consciously and to solve it through a work of purifying the most precious feelings and values of life, but was interested only in the fascination they given by magic tricks and effects. Conscience dictated a single thing: "be as good as you can be in what you do, without undertaking the risk of choosing what you represent as a man broken by the force of life."

He simply forgot any other human preoccupation. He literally forgot that life could also offer him and other pleasures than the material or professional ones, to intercept the most extensive and complex viewpoints. Like a precious object thrown into the sea, the magician deepened his thoughts into a more and more vulnerable reality.

Leadership: Do you follow a path that reflects your higher self, or one that reflects your inferior self?

His self, detached from one of the constants of the experience of belonging to a mysterious underground world that will never disappear because it successfully illustrates one of the oldest crafts, that of finding, inventing and reinventing motives to put that part of latent creation into operation, giving hope, creating a meaning, is actually the final stage of authentic success.

A higher self, because it recognizes its perfection in discovering new means of expressing itself beyond any human comprehension. Not a lower self that sustains the predestination of a proud man who knows all the answers but has no answer – a sad experience of the failure and the fragility of the human condition.

And exactly this extreme volatilization of his constant of "to be" determines him to use tendentiously his masks. Everything was spinning mainly around a certain mask, binding a freestanding identity. A white mask, cold as the polar ice, built amid the self-forgetfulness, of ignoring the need to periodically review the conditions that currently prevented him to make a change of 90 degrees. Only this mask held him prisoner in the deep and absolute darkness of his rationality. Of the rationality, trapped in the carousel of a continuous confrontation.

Was this undeniable contribution of the mask, of this panacea, to show that there may be a psychology and a physiognomy of a new state?

Leadership: Can you climb a rock without being as tough as it is in the case of establishing an identity that opposes sustainability in terms of "vulnerable reality"?

The human purpose that embraces the leadership's science just as much as the personal development, should not be just to rise to a high level of functionality, but rather to plumb that understanding which misses him. Identifying the formula of transformation and assignation of his own identity coordinates, based on the intellectual, emotional, behavioral, and professional constants, which fulfill the purpose of his existence, he could really bring down his invisible opponent.

The invisible opponent, that Ego, which is exhibited in another one multiplied, that good-"directed" Alter-Ego becomes a constant presence, which dictates him new rules, stopping his functioning and estranging him from the true values and principles. An identity that opposes sustainability in the field of "limited causation" is a reflection of the experience of being part of a scenario whose protagonist lives surrounded by the mirage of a reality purified by the concrete, likely only in the face of the ability to maintain a lush atmosphere.

A redundancy of a functional potential, an accumulation of ideas, meanings, tendencies, accepting another "half" damaging your true identity. Resulting in a negative combination between sustainability and evolution, a slight cutting of your way of being, a desynchronization, and an incorrect arrangement of the reasons behind your actions.

A departure from your way of being that gets you closer, without having to suspect, to a higher authority, to an Alter Ego which always whispers, and orders you to be someone else. And this self-removal is similar to climbing a mountain.

You are climbing on the slope of a cliff to admire a stunning landscape; you are covered by the spell of another temporal horizon. You feel magnificent and powerful. But that does not mean you are a "piece of cliff" it does not necessarily mean that you have a more mature and solid thinking.

It just means that you have reached a level where you abandon some ideas in favor of some new others. It means that you deepen your thoughts into a reality that may become more and more vulnerable by the fact that the new horizon moves you away from whom you were, restricting your old horizons.

Leadership: Do you allow yourself to be the "man beyond the mask" in the presence of a reality that can be included in a creation full of contrasts, so that you turn the grace of your vocation into an art of reinventing your existence?

To keep that "spiritus purus subtilissimus" which crosses like a creative and universal effluvium the eternal of his being, here, this is the true greatness !

To find the long-sought bridge that completes the two structures defining your existence: Ego and Alter-Ego, and to obey only to that person, who literally can offer you and other pleasures than the material and professional ones, just as your condition to be what you are up to the end, here, this is the real accomplishment, the one that rises you and dissipates any mask !

As regards the "masks" selected for inclusion in the essence of a personality, they emphasize the authority of those who wear them. And, represent, in the leadership's case, except the study of interpretations that we confer to certain situations, the reproduction of some parts or even of the whole of the "Man". Either per se, either in the form of some chapters from his existence with a wider grip on all that is happening around him, but with an effect of blurring the reality.

Leadership is the reality you turn to as you express your appreciation for everything that means "constructive approaches" and what you represent in a frame full of characters clustered around the excesses of the image that prove to be something other than what the world believes they are.

What is your position towards yourself, towards your guidance, towards reality, towards society and the world? Is it ambiguous, extremely shaky, dominated by foreign influence, by another way of "to be"?

The study of the "magician" with all his peculiarities, as a man and as a leader, was specifically conceived for the human side of leadership. And his masks reflect, in the present study, a vulnerable position of the man, put in front of the transition towards maturity towards accepting his condition of "to be".

Are you letting yourself caught in a continuous game of mirrors always reflecting a different personality? Are you moving away more and more move of yourself? Are you imposing your personality through a disguised form?

Diminish the vulnerability of your position by performing thorough researches that will result in strengthening the positive aspects characterizing the "Man" within you.

The positive aspect that characterizes "The Man in You" is that everything you want to achieve through magic gives you the opportunity to observe indelibly, how you manifest yourself in different situations, and thus realize what is the boundary between personality changes which are brought on by a memorable career full of challenges and controversial decisions.

The Director And The Magician are two faces of the same mask behind which some stubbornly find themselves, their reality depending only on the option of "twisting" to refusal, sometimes called "genius", expressed in many dimensions that are very difficult to comprehend.

The Director Of Scientific Production

Be firm in your intentions to approach leadership, perfectly clarifying your vision of the means to produce science.

"Strike" should have been the theme of the fifth movie. The first vision of "Strike" was, in fact, a translation of his ideas applied to the stage, in this new art of film. Apparently, Sergei Eisenstein played with the movie. He seemed to create an artistic entertainment that he practiced as if with a childish frenzy. But, in fact, "Strike" was a serious attempt. It seems incomprehensible how this director, a recent student of polytechnic school, a man with an unusual curiosity for anything in his path, realized a movie and composed a clipping before knowing the technical means at his disposal.

The only explanation remains that of an Eisenstein firm in his artistic intentions, with ideas as clear as possible, with a "first vision" of the movie perfectly clear, so an artist interested only in subsidiary by the purely practical and technical manner of realizing ideas. This explains also the fact that, often, he claimed seemingly impossible technical solutions, but then realized, however, when the technical factors understood the artistic purpose. *

Leadership: Can you break the invisible walls of the shortcomings created by the impossible demands of the approaches to the creation that overlap with the current directions of science?

The source of the constant innovation potential of ideas is built on the wavelength of curiosity, so man can manifest his curiosity in two broad directions: towards what is called the "rational practice of the relation between effort and reward" or towards what it becomes in time that obtains certain results.

These tell us how much we are prone to accumulate new frustrations, from errors and contradictions, and how much satisfaction we get comparable to our expectations.

The quality of creative work, added to the whole scale of perceptions, judgments, techniques and motivations fitting to the modalities of generating the "unique" value, of another make than is obtained by translating the results through technology transfer, has as a first purpose an incentive for curiosity, but we still have to note here, instinctively, especially their desire to discover a new vision.

And this systematic curiosity, refined over an entire career, struggling to find a good price to stay in the space destined for creating new patterns and new benchmarks, which allow the distinction between "professional" zone and "personal" zone, is always required to be increased, despite all the risks that involves a beginner's position in the technique.

The shortcomings generated by the impossible demands of the approach to creation in relation to the requirements of practice relate in particular to how you try to evaluate your entire activity over time depending on how ideas and visions are concretized: through visual images, metaphors with special penetration, the ability to tell a history, inner sensibility, the special technique of showing real things, etc.

Inability to reach the maximum point of innovation, contained within a science expanding its horizons, is much more favorable to compromise, showing the installation of a downward trend to materialize ideas in subsidiary. The compromise between the tendency to put your personal Ego into action and the desire to act according to the collective and social Ego is a desideratum that you must accomplish.

Can your science configure the creation trajectories of a superior leadership?

The standards of excellence that you develop have as a support the basic ties between different intensities accumulated between "unusual curiosity for anything in your path" and "the realization of ideas in the subsidiary", involved in the process of generating value uniquely added to the tendency to claim a certain to create a certain manner of creation.

Failure at the professional accomplishment exam is decisive through the wrong maneuvers of installing and repositioning the creation at the level of authenticity. And the implementation of ideas to use and promote science in reality, with original solutions to your taste and to other devourers of novelty automatically includes leadership in the equation of developing new theories and methods to approach science. This science deals with the identification, localization and configuration of trajectories for creating by expanding the leader's consciousness and ability to experience different realities.

The ability to experience both your inner world and especially a world that can ultimately impose seemingly unnatural constraints on the composition of "inserts" outside the unanimously accepted science gives you the chance to reinvent yourself.

Otherwise, we can even speak of a cognitive type failure, which considers the non-achievement of performance targets, and a non-cognitive type failure, which considers your inadaptation to the demands of a much too high science. You must always insert new values, perspectives, concepts and ideas that lead to a new set of leadership meanings, in order to turn yourself into an artist of escape from the universally accepted norms and standards.

An artist interested only in subsidiary by the purely practical, technical way to realize ideas, even if he claims seemingly impossible technical solutions, will be able to give life to an authentic creation, which will have open access to a new source of renewable energy as he perfects his technical means of building his visions.

Higher Leadership takes highlights of science reflected in an "artistic work" when your creation claims to be able to capitalize on some seemingly impossible compositional techniques.

The director of scientific production is the leader that, through a deep knowledge of what is expected of him, becomes a real vector of change, a founder of an effective leadership, based on his own analysis, interpretation, clarification and suggestive character. Leadership must be a unique, customized creation, with a different style of looking at things and creating new scientific approaches.

On January 22, 2016

Strive to obtain more clarity over what you achieve by making a leap outside the value fed from the individual accumulation of knowledge.

Russian composer Dmitry Kabalevsky who visits Prokofiev these days notes: "What amazed me more in this rational and extremely precise method of work was the fact that the framing in the canvas of measurements with its dramatic and psychological accents precisely placed would in no way disturb his freedom of creative thinking. He writes the film music just as inspired and with the same passion with which he would write his own compositions in which he remained an absolute master without any restriction."

Once the music was done, Prokofiev would play it on the piano for Eisenstein, following the image on the screen and he himself singing the part of the choir, but badly, to the director's amusement. Thus, the music recorded for trial is followed alongside the image and, if they coincide perfectly, Prokofiev writes down the orchestral sheet music. Finally, after careful rehearsals with the orchestra, the music is recorded. As with the occasion of collaborating on the historic film "Alexander Nevsky", Eisenstein still assists during these recordings. And, just as back then, he remains enchanted. *****

Leadership: Does the exemplary echo of others' actions reflect on your TRUE or FALSE value, considering the ability of the art to return to you in an unexpected, miraculous way?

Art is reflected in what you create differently from the usual expectations that you have from others. One is to create in order to help someone, another is to create in order to reach a level of excellence that you aspire to.

The various forms of support, recognized in leadership as a sort of appreciation and affection, contribute to the satisfaction of necessities of functional order of the man who wants to climb the highest steps of intellectual greatness. But this does not necessarily provide you with satisfaction in doing things that naturally bring you a state of well-being, a satisfaction in overcoming a reputation, in cherishing and serving the art you have mastered early on.

The continuation of various forms of support in stimulating a passion for a scientific discipline in which creation is the main strength leads to an increase in the productivity of meaningful forces. Or, conversely, to a decline in the importance of different states of mind – such as happiness, joy, worry, and sadness, revealing the fragility of becoming, the internal conflicts the individual faces.

Art returns to you in an unexpected, almost miraculous way, only if you give up being the victim of the tastes of other people, because the origin of the tricky character of pretentious art (as is usually accentuated by the avant-garde of a generation with attitude) lies in the pleasure of knowing that your real merits will not spread against you.

An artist does not portray his art in order to appease someone, so as not to cause an adverse reaction, but by the way of the feelings that dominate him, that is, as it is most enjoyable to not lose the beauty of his own impressions of his works.

Leadership: Do you see yourself compelled to reduce the impact and meaningful forces of your creative demarches under the primordial impulse to be a causal agent, to experience the will of those who set the framework for a major change in mentality?

The meaningful forces of your creative demarches, based on certain probing of the area of representativeness, can represent those mutual relations between the signals of the type "support" received by others. No wonder the effect installed after the beginning of the stage of applying knowledge, comprised of the processes of stimulus-response, has as an option that of checking the exuberant state of mind of confidence and positivity that plays an important role in the freedom of creative thinking.

Leadership, directed towards the representation of authentic models of thinking, meets during the course of evolution that form of manifestation of a good mood that allows for a leap outside the value fed by the individual accumulation of knowledge.

The individual, enchanted by this unexpected series of inspiration induced in a pleasant ambient, through a creative stimulation accentuated through a different carrier of values, can act towards a growing trend of return value, uninhibited by the change of experience.

Freedom of creative thinking is the innate organic substance of temperament that guides based on the dictum "I organize, I win".

The exemplary echo of support actions of others is reflected on your TRUE value if you manage to understand your attitude towards what you practice, gaining more clarity on what you want to achieve.

Or it is reflected upon you in the FALSE value if you give up on the experience of a magical journey that opens before you towards a different type of "music", which doesn't fit into conventional patterns, whose finality must be your own reinvention.

To reduce impact forces and significance of your creative approaches under the primary impulse to experience the will of those who set a major change of mentality is to generate the idea that separates action from feeling.

And the idea that separates action from feeling, complemented by a harmonious and eloquent plastic expressiveness, is remarked by the artist's disposition to react contrary to the impressions and conceptions of others. The idea in art is not to be original or different, but to be reconciled with yourself and with what you do.

The Director's Amusement is the result of a synergy directed towards an essentialization of a style of thinking, of a state or of a situation, which can awaken the joy of being more effective in professional activity. Even if that means giving up what you think people want you to be.

The Director Struggles With The Material Of The Film That Has Not Even Been Born Yet

An artist's sketches are the seeds of future creation, just waiting for the right context to unfold in all their glory.

Sketches, drawings... Transcripts of thoughts, the attempt to capture and preserve the images that assault the imagination. Eisenstein frantically writes down these thoughts that flow disorderly, with the fear of losing them: on notebooks, on strips torn from envelopes, on the back of telegrams, announcements, invitations. His notes and drawings completely cover these sheets and pieces of paper. Eisenstein struggles with the material of the film that was not even born yet. These drawings record thoughts.

Sometimes it materializes an imprecise first impression, the intuition of a scene from the future scenario. Other times they try to predict the future behavior of a performer. Sometimes it represents the sensation that a scene must give birth to, other times it seeks the most effective way of interweaving the curve of a vault with a dark silhouette. Often embodied in scenes redone and changed as many as twenty times, they foreshadow the film through an idea of setting, movement, atmosphere, or perhaps even just an element of set or make-up.

"In intention, these drawings are no more (but no less) than those Japanese paper toys which, thrown into warm water, unfold into stems, leaves and flowers of fantastic and surprising shapes."

The materialization of first impressions and intuitions for future scenes involves a constant struggle with the material of the still unborn film, each sketch being a step towards the realization of the vision.

The creative process of a film often begins with vague intuitions, sketched on pieces of paper, which then evolve into scenes, frames and set elements.

A film director's sketches and drawings are like the intimate diary of an explorer mapping unknown lands of the imagination. These visual transcripts of thoughts represent the frantic attempt to capture and preserve the fleeting images that assail the creative consciousness before they dissipate into nothingness. Eisenstein, with the chill of a man possessed of visions, jots down these tumultuous and disordered thoughts on any available surface: worn notebooks, torn strips of envelopes, lines of telegrams, ephemeral announcements or mundane invitations. The disparate sheets and pieces of paper quickly become palimpsests completely covered with feverish notes and nervous sketches, testimonies of the titanic struggle the filmmaker has with the still-informative material of the film to be born.

In this case, Eisenstein's drawings are more than simple graphic exercises; they are a living record of his creative process. Sometimes they materialize a diffuse first impression, a vague intuition of a scene in the future scenario - like a seed that contains within itself the entire structure of the tree it will become. At other times, his sketches attempt to predict and shape the behavior of a performer, like a demiurge sculpting the character of his fictional characters. In certain cases, the drawing represents the sensation that a scene must create in the viewer, a kind of emotional score translated into lines and shadows. Or perhaps the director is obsessively searching for the most effective way to intersect the curve of an architectural vault with the dark silhouette of a character, orchestrating a visual dialogue between the set and the actors.

The artistic work of a filmmaker requires knowing how to transform sketches and rough drawings into concrete elements of the film, foreshadowing frames, movements and atmospheres.

Often these preliminary sketches turn into scenes redone and changed countless times in an iterative process of continuous refinement. They foreshadow the film through a multitude of ideas regarding the composition of the frame, the choreography of the movement, the texture of the atmosphere or even seemingly minor details of the set or make-up. Let's not forget that the creative process is a continuous struggle with the chaotic flow of ideas, and artists develop unique methods to capture and materialize these fleeting thoughts.

Each visual element is dissected, analyzed and reconfigured with the meticulousness of a Swiss watchmaker bent on the fine mechanisms of time. "In intention," reflects Eisenstein, "these drawings are no more (but no less) than those Japanese paper toys." The comparison with Japanese origami is revealing: thrown into the hot water of the creative process, his rudimentary sketches unravel and metamorphose into complex structures - robust narrative stems, leaves of rich symbolism and flowers with fantastic forms of cinematic expression, all intertwining in a work of art that defies expectations and surprises with its depth.

One who explores various aspects of the film, from the behavior of the performers to the intersection of architectural lines with the silhouettes of the characters, must first establish a clear vision of the narrative to ensure coherence and artistic unity.

A true director must create a detailed conceptual framework to integrate each element in order to emphasize the desired atmosphere and message, and also understand the emotional context of each scene so that they can steer all elements in the same artistic direction.

The director wrestles with the material of the not-yet-born film every time he imagines a scene or sequence, furthering the idea that imagination precedes artistic materialization, from which the authentic creative process flows. Preferring a certain visual approach, the director will know how to adapt his vision, considering that each element must support the desired atmosphere, in the form of an organic cinematic construction.

Analyze the connection between perception and reality, defining for yourself a style of leadership with continuous highlighting trends of the specific aspects of your personality.

It all started out as a joke. In 1928, the institute was located in the building of the former restaurant "Iar". The student classroom from the first class of directing was the former hall of mirrors. The bell had run and the students eagerly awaited their professor whom they knew only from photos. The door opened and the professor entered. The multiple mirrors reflected Eisenstein's close-up countless times. The professor smiled: "You are truly lucky: as you can see, you'll not have only one teacher, but a bunch ! "

Later, Eisenstein was called the "director with 20 heads". This time, however, it was not merely an allusion to the game of mirrors, but to his method of teaching: the professor thought his classes along with the minds of his 20 students. ***

Leadership: Must your transformation be understood as a lesson that your own self transmits to you in the equation of a superiority that decides how you convey a certain concept?

An artist who knows how to turn artistic creation into a self-transformation is a director who knows how to stage the episode of a spectacular intervention in the reality of the surrounding world, through an exciting story of courage, determination and compromise. The limits of performance development, respecting the share of experience points that influence how you present yourself to others, require to be overcome by the challenge of, at times, finding yourself in the position of being someone else, in the most exciting and uplifting dimensions of a multiplied reality.

This type of reality that occurs in leadership through a sort of broad introspection that allows you to see mistakes and errors, enabling approaches to personal identity from different angles, are taken at different levels, depending on the close-up you find yourself in.

The close-up represents the sum of partial identities, therefore, something that doesn't follow the patterns and current norms of representations, having the tendency of accentuating, of comparing and battling between themselves to obtain an indicator of measuring the degree of variability of professional ascension. It is perhaps the most widely used framework of voluntary relation to the essential element of your authority and, more specifically, to a new hierarchy of values that defines your relationships with others.

You can build the concept of becoming a totally different man presented in terms of a special teaching that encourages the rest of the world to practice it only if the idea of your value is an extension of one's own personality into a more widely used concept of the "close-up" term.

The close-up that validates you as a director-artist is the dimension of the theme called "memory" that you expose in front of a majority able to self-declare as belonging to a reality that continues to reinvent itself.

This memory should not be judged by the active manifestation of the personal freedom to think, feel and act according to individual needs, inclinations, interests, capabilities and possibilities, but by how you prove your added value – the fact of being more than an effect or a cause, but a whole of more manifestations, activities, phenomena and events meant to mark a certain superiority.

Memory is the ultimate term of a long evolution, of a vast experience of life, work, culture and creativity, which validates itself as a whole that has included within it an endless string of events and values.

Your transformation must be understood as a form of eliminating identities that disguise themselves or as a lesson your own self transmits to you to remind you of who you truly are in the field of a self-analysis, of self-credibility. Bot also in the field of a deep relationship with everything you do not yet know about yourself or with what you want to be going into resonance with others.

A leader constantly strengthens his capacity to value things, to be their measure.

Leadership is a vast field in which the man who imposes himself with authority in front of others must be very well understood. But individual perception is always different. Seeking to understand how your ideas are perceives by others, you get to imagine yourself in their place, relying on a good knowledge of human reason, in close correlation with each and everyone's education and way of thinking.

This helps you make a clear distinction between the way in which you are understood and the acceptance conditioned by the posture imposed by the authority recognized by others. It is a way of discovering yourself in the face of what is evident or in the face of what you make others believe.

The lesson your own self transmits to you in the equation of superiority is that you can become more than just a thinking entity, you can become a whole with more successes, on many levels, only if you realize that the opinions of others do not matter at all, or when you realize that what you have to offer them is more than what they are willing to offer you.

The Director With 20 Heads highlights how leadership is reflected in the consciousness of others, but also a way of self-control to keep your identity intact. Depending on the reality you discover in the thinking of others you will be able to construct new approaches of personal and professional development. And especially through an objective appreciation of your position of "monopoly" over other forms of leadership and training, not only through knowledge and reflection on human nature.

The Directorial Intervention

On December 30, 2015

Learn to express existence from the "core of the real", highlighting all those characteristics that can serve as an argument for a different approach of the researched subject.

"The Strike" would be a link of a chain, one of the movies from the series "Towards Dictatorship". The series was to comprise eight films, starting with the theme of introducing illegal literature over the border and up to that of deportations and then of escapes. The strike was to be the theme of the fifth film.

*Though it began with the making of this series, at Sergei Eisenstein's proposal, because it was the most out of all for the masses and the most fruitful. From the outset, the three characteristics of the future film were decided: to present the generalized image of a strike and not a specific historic strike. TO not have individual heroes, but rather to contain the confrontation of the collective of workers with the group of capitalists and their servants. To be a film composed after the method of the montage of attractions. **

Leadership: Can you present to the world the finished work of a particular reality through a painting that extends beyond the frame of analysis and evaluation of the expressive content of the character you play out in a unique way?

The director, the creative man, well knowing the extremely favorable conditions for the development of culture and art, especially focuses on certain aspects of real life that are sometimes related to the hidden part of the world, or of its representative part. But before displaying his achievements in a new way of making a film, for the world to know him and appreciate his depth and gift on making any image a memorable one, he stops and looks behind on what he accomplished.

The finished work of a particular reality is in fact an act of conscious preservation of the memory of a past event that the director experiences as a living reflection that characterizes his knowledge, thus taking over the role of the narrator-hero of his story. Adequate dosing of the content of ideas to the expressiveness of the image makes the character it uniquely renders acquire the meaning of a long-awaited fulfillment: to be himself a decision-maker in a world where the limit is only given by imagination.

What does existence from "the core of the real" actually express that he integrally played in his montage? Slowly, with a real reforming desire, he checks if he truly understood the real message and if he highlighted in consequence all those visions, special things, motives, characteristics, that can serve as an argument for a different approach of the researched theme. Is an eventual review and update of the respective argument necessary?

What justifies the decision, the claim to the right of intervention in the case of making the film, are the living descriptions the director inserts and condenses periodically in the script, and later in the montage. They are used to define the compositional trajectory in what concerns the credibility he gives to the sources of information on which the value of what he tried to highlight is founded upon.

The expressive content of the character that the director uniquely portrays defines the trajectory of an event experienced as a personal experience that must be shared and oriented in the direction of a new artistic philosophy, the one that produces long lasting effects in the consciousness of the world he imagines as being his.

The Directorial Intervention is exercised only at the level of identifying meanings yet unsaid or unfinished scenically, extracted from the support of additional information collected during all the steps of completing the work – offering a certain image over the relationship between time, facts, world, place and the surrounding reality.

Leadership is an effect of a context of reception. To present the image of a world by means of a painting that extends beyond the frame of analysis, actually means to put back the information you have in a context with modified priority in which people can find a familiarity and a feeling of belonging to a space they've mastered and from which they seem to have always been a part of.

The Distance In The Eyes That Seek Closeness

To outline a vision for yourself is to support a cross-perception: of a falsely perceived event, with the truth that you will only come to know later.

A dot appears in front of my eyes in the distance. It is a man at sea, of which I can't tell if he's swimming or drowning. And as I do not notice any lifeguard or any lifeboat, I would say that the most appropriate and wisest thing is for the man to move his arms and legs, otherwise no prayer will bring him back to shore. Unless he intends to swim to Bulgaria. You never know...

The intelligible character that this observation can have cannot deprive it at all of the following truth: when you look closely at what is happening around you, you realize that everything manifests as a whole, and the whole itself can be the prerogative of a single individual.

Wilhelm Hauff said it well, it is easier to write about what you see, than to imagine an interesting fact that you can then integrate into a story. But Wilhelm Hauff did not write about art, nor the sea.

For to speak of art and the sea means to capture their common element, the organic matter from which everything is born: the idea of infinity and the relation to destiny, by virtue of reality. Everything is matter in infinity, especially when we talk about the birth of a reality that involves relating to an idea entered the artistic field, by virtue of a vision plan that reveals a unique destiny.

For any destiny belongs, first of all to a symbolic framework, and in the other case to the whole figure. At other times, in art you have to capture the totality of the real by a corresponding modification of the particularity that an imaginary representation gives.

Leadership: Could your vision invite a clear perception of a causal relationship if it possessed a degree of coherence superior to reality?

When man reaches the sea, either swimming or being pushed by the sea currents, he is governed by the need to be in the center of attention, precisely in order to be saved in case of danger. It is no longer an ordinary element, but a very important fact. It is no longer a silent and contextual language, but a body of persuasion that almost ostentatiously reveals its presence.

In art, this can be translated as follows: where there is an empty space, nature fills it. Where we notice only the visible part of an action without perspective, the very deep expression of a great expectation suddenly appears. An excessive expectation, in nothing at all. This explains the fact that when we talk about causality, we are talking about a reality that cannot simply be stopped, but a reality that can transform man from any kind of circumstances.

So, in this case, we could have two parallel, intertwined lives trapped in each other: a professional swimmer and a man on the verge of drowning. We can also have two equivalent environments: an environment of courage in the fight against water, or an environment of despair and desolation. It depends on your claim to turn a relative into an absolute, which has a significant share in art.

Suddenly, an event becomes significant because deep at sea the "individual" who is becoming more and more noticeable, predominates by eluding everything that is vast and unlimited. So, in art, the surprising element is given by that point which becomes much more important than the whole. The finite becomes more important than the infinite.

Immediately, if you want to call yourself an artist, you have to find a way to symbolize one through the other.

And if you want to understand leadership through the prism of art, you need to develop a vision that contributes to a deeper understanding of a situation for which there is no spontaneous interest.

The Distance In The Eyes That Seek Closeness refers to that measure of sight that you usually expect from an artist who can approach any dimension of creation, merging the elements that animate the being, poetry and photography. Through this way of seeing, he has the possibility to look beyond matter, of what is believed to be "banality", highlighting a new form of expression – artistic creation.

Or, as the writer Mircea Opriță rightly said, for this you have to discover new meanings of the vague fragments of reality, with a consistency almost painfully denied by the fact that nothing is linked in a complete image or in a series of coherent representations.

The Distinct Horizons Of Transformative Understanding

On February 26, 2014

Fully assume the role of a mentor in the research project called "Myself", by using the prediction equation for a model of thinking comprised between curiosity and subtlety.

I was living the sensation of a vertical fall, into an extreme of relentless interpretations and deformations of personal reality. Unquestionably, I was put in a tight spot, represented by an unclear and incoherent prediction equation of a model of thinking, comprised between curiosity and subtlety. A sort of intangible invasion of my space of intellectual excellency produced by a novel stratagem, as of yet inexperienced. It was hard to imagine what the resort of resulting viewpoints was, for and against, which were to be undertaken wholly within the research project called "Myself".

Like characters from Hauff's work, immune to the real, reluctant to show themselves in the view of the entire world and start gaining significance only when they lose control over the management of everything inside and outside their area of origin. I somehow situated myself at the boundary between recognizing the way in which I could "travel" towards what is inside of me and connecting to the components of a reality inseparable from its very purpose.

The model of thinking contained between curiosity and subtlety feeds from the formation of a critical and self-critical spirit about the realities contained in the memories of a life that is repeated in other times and other dimensions.

Fiction is the reality perceived by a comparison with the characters of a world that is constantly changing. That was my great idea: to unify the horizon of a primary understanding, whose aspects emerge as being a trigger of originality for the metaphysical of a fictive character, beyond experience, in the realm of visionary constructions. Beyond the horizon of the rational understanding of my unmistakable, true nature, is projected the spiritual journey into the boundlessness of a story where anything can happen.

Definitely, it was what could be translated as "nothing is lost, everything is transformed". An excessive stress of assuming an uncertain responsibility, going beyond my power of understanding, as a sea of flames that drowned everything in smoke.

My life resembled Gulliver's trip to Laputa in certain places, everything was made up of a science detached from reality, far too bold visions, too chimeric plans, but where the light of a new beginning on the road to the phenomenology of thought was seen. Unprecedented. A partial melting of the living core was taking place, the inborn unconscious that had to be joined with consciousness in several elements, then joining them into a superior unity.

Leadership: Do you engage in a purely fictional adventure that breaks down the deep meaning of your being, detached from a story that keeps the vein of excellence as a subject of knowledge independent of any real or possible experience?

The indicator of the degree of understanding and mastering the way in which you perceive yourself is set when a "reading" operation of reality meets the beginning of a new model of thinking.

Leadership does not place you on field, firm and battered by a science that renounces imagination and the audacity to expand your horizons, through an experimental equation of discovering new interpretations of reality, through representations that substitutes the usual ones, and even toppling them. But rather gives you a great feeling of accomplishment and makes you become aware of those patterns of thinking that hold you back, in a stationary position in an unmarked intersection. In which the new elements of exploring a new area of evolution and forming of abilities, with the help of cognitive intelligence and perceptual experience, do not have right of way.

Leadership rests on a "transformation" type operation at a level of self-perception by relating to a model of thinking, comprised between curiosity and subtlety. What you represent in a challenging world is often hidden in the fiction of turning your life into a story, to let certain characters represent you, with the intention of abolishing the rules and conventions of a far too standardized society.

Often individuals who aspire to an extension of their area of intellectual excellence do not meet the "Yield" sign and have right of way over those who meet the "Stop" sign. Especially when trying to double its considerations over the elements of knowledge that complete their personality, image, style of leadership, experience, enhancing the baggage of understanding an assumed reality. And being aware of this in a broader context of perceptions and representations of objective nature.

Leadership is the image of a reality that can be made possible on the background of a fiction meant to represent the future, taking as a landmark a character that is built throughout the narrative as a metaphor of the change that is needed in life.

The writer with the broadest vision over the tendencies of man to relate to the constant elements of a future reality, forerunner of science fiction literature, Jules Verne, confessed: "If you have water and fire and your disposal you can prepare something other than what you'd usually eat."

Regarded as a metaphor, this statement reflects the willingness to link needs and consequences, producing a new composition, a reference point on the map of perceptions about yourself in relation to reality.

The harmony of certain elements of interpreting reality can have a strong effect of stimulating the production of landmarks and points of view that could contribute to changing the perception of leadership. The depth of a mind that thinks freely, sometimes in abstract schemes, which won through experience, through the process of the attempt of assimilating certain information and knowledge, can be accomplished when man tries to untangle the hidden background of his being.

Only by resorting to a purely explanatory science, which can define your guidelines, using the prediction equation of a model of thinking, comprised between curiosity and subtlety, only then will you be able to take on the role of a mentor in the research project called "Myself".

The knowledge that gives you the freedom to customize your vision is based on the comparison of the fiction of an inalienable identity to the perception of a reality that stubbornly stifles you, or on the contrary, that continues to bore you.

This knowledge lies on several levels: a metaphor that can be transformed into a face of truth, a meditation on the birth process of a literary work, and the intrigue of an outspoken existential experience.

The Distinct Horizons Of Transformational Understanding constitute the dividing line between the visible part of the sphere of thinking completely attached to life experience passed through a well-calculated narrative construction, and the invisible part of the sphere of thinking encapsulated in rules and rigorous norms, which always impose congruence of compatibility with objective reality.

As a leader, you must make use of that ability that allows you to adapt to the constantly changing reality. Which implies existence and the development of a flexible and malleable personality, anchored in a fiction that can control the future.

Myself is the character of a life story that impressed you and you want to share it through a unique experience of experiencing reality through a surrealness.

The Divine Breath in Human Creation

The true value of a creator is measured by his ability to breathe eternal life into his work.

Dusty Springfield – In private. Watch and listen to the video. You will notice what it means to be over 50 years old and have a superb voice, simplistic stage play and a lot of enthusiasm, completed with that timbre that seems to caress the air, lifting it into an invisible embrace. Her voice makes its way among the notes, like a golden thread woven among the shadows of an old canvas, each vibration illuminating a forgotten story. And with the grace of an eternal spirit, the artist's melody becomes testimony that there once was a living art, pulsating with what the ancients called "youth without age".

Perhaps, some people remain unforgettable in the soul of the world, others go and disappear, leaving nothing behind them, nothing beautiful, nothing lasting, nothing full of life. That's how things are. A world that ignores its past loses its compass for the future, becoming incapable of creating anything lasting.

Yes, there was a time when people put their soul into everything they did, good music was composed, and everything was full of life, full of the imperishable beauty of creation. Years have passed, not long, not an eternity, only about 25 years. But now, everything has changed. There is no longer that sacred vibration where human talent meets divine inspiration, an "Alithismail Ankh Onnavs", that deep mystery, the echo of a time when art was more than entertainment.

Leadership: Can you transform the imperfection of the raw material into a pure testimony of your dedication to that which reflects the essence of your soul?

Now everything seems counterfeit, not even reinvented, but just clumsily placed on the worn scales of the original. More than ever, people today expect everything to be handed to them, without the slightest initiative. They all claim to be great geniuses, they have graduated from 2 or 3 faculties, all are eminent, yet none of their real brilliance is visible. On every road you can find examples of packaging without content.

The truth is that people no longer create on a deep level, because they have lost the last bit of divinity, beyond the daily noise and superficiality.

And whoever does not fight for an ideal, and does not reveal a talent, becomes irrelevant to an entire world. This is what the past teaches us, which, with such negligence, we have failed to value. Unfortunately, the reality is much worse. The present is no longer the refuge of the soul, preserving the idea of "creation for God", with chances to achieve the perfection of a divine work. But only an empty, dry and cold echo, which the evening wind carries over the shadows of the past and never returns.

Leadership: How can the pursuit of artistic perfection become a form of active prayer, transforming creation into an uninterrupted dialogue with the divine?

Do you know what Michelangelo was doing a few days before he passed away? He was retouching, for the umpteenth time, a minor detail of the famous "Pietà Rondanini", to which he could not restore perfection. Even unfinished, as unfinished as it remained, this work can be admired today at the Castello Sforzesco in Milan, Italy. Well, this is how a masterpiece is created: working from morning to evening, days and even nights, just to retouch a few centimeters of marble that did not come out perfectly. A meticulousness that lasts until the last drop of sweat.

More than five hundred years have passed since then, many wars have shaken the world, many empires have collapsed. The result? His work remained intact, authentic, alive, preserved as a pure creation, dedicated entirely to God. I think that this is what spirituality actually means: only what you put your soul into is preserved forever in the world's memory as a sign of the talent to give yourself to that divine sparkle, received from God.

Leadership: Is the perfection of your creative act a harmony that reflects the sparkle of the divinity within you, when you put your entire being at the service of a higher ideal?

And us? We, those of a present hardened in superficiality, what have we learned from those times? Probably, almost nothing. You cannot learn permanent lessons from temporary people. The question is not rhetorical, but tragically current. Too few open their souls to creation anymore, too few struggle with the raw material of life to extract a masterpiece from it. Everything has become a shiny, but empty package. We have lost our taste for truth, for hard work, for total dedication.

And all the wars, which we classify as inevitable conflicts, are not a fruit of the accident of materialism, but a punishment from God, because people have sold their souls in exchange for superficiality, guided especially by the motto: "You only have one life, so live it to the fullest!".

But the spiritual side is more important than money, than ephemeral satisfactions. Only what you leave behind, in the name of eternity, is what the ancients faithfully transmitted beyond time, to the glory of God.

The sanctity of the work comes from the effort put in. And in a world where time measures everything in units of profit, there are still echoes of an era when art was a prayer, and creation - an act of communion with the divine. Those small proofs of authentic sacrifice, creations lost over the centuries, are immortal, for God has spared only what comes from the soul. I am sure that God makes his presence felt only where the soul deposits every drop of sweat.

Leadership is manifested by the ability to transform talent into a sacred mission, making each creative act a bridge between the temporal and the eternal.

The Divine Breath in Human Work reveals to us that true creation transcends time and ego, becoming a living prayer that connects the human with the divine, the temporal with the eternal. I ask you, man: is your passage through the world transfigured into a work dedicated to divinity, in these days when everything is done overnight, and prestige is achieved just as quickly?

I wonder, what remains, when the music dies down? What remains, however, is what Dusty, Michelangelo and others have shown us: only what we carry in our souls can withstand time. Only through a creation that has become a masterpiece will some of the persistent ones carry forward God's supreme law: "I am."

The Divine Interpreter

On October 23, 2010

Open the way towards fulfilling your role, by connecting yourself to the souls of the people through your own perception about leadership.

In that beautiful summer day, the master received me in his workshop with an inexpressible joy. He had in mind to make a very beautiful work, and along with it, to improve his image in the eyes of the finest brush lovers, and to raise his art to the highest peaks.

Bearing deep inside him the ideal image of beauty, the master wanted to achieve, by that time, a painting called "Nymph of Fontainebleau" which would embody simultaneously the beauty of the three goddesses – Ceres, Diana and Erigona. He inspired himself from the famous sculpture of Benvenuto Cellini, with the same title, but he wanted to render the ideal of feminine beauty in his vision and manner.

Observing how delicate, and with how much skill he polished every single detail, I asked him why that work was so important to him – because, he obviously had an unnatural passion, an enthusiasm that almost reached frenzy, he worked with an unreasonable eagerness, as if he was connected to a power generator, which hurried his pulse and accelerated his senses. He told me with his sweet and vigorous voice:

- Nicu, the thing that inspires and steels me is just my call to art, to the perfection of my work. My biggest wish is that by the work that I create, to fulfill what I feel that is my destiny.

Leadership: Do you feel the call to an ideal form of art that allows you to experience what is going on in shaping your destiny?

The master has connected to me through his own perceptions of art in which he believed, by planting in my heart that something unique and beautiful, that feeling of admiration and closeness to his ideas, his attitude towards his expectations, that special respect, honest, open, friendly for the well-done work, for the way he was using his talent. How do you connect to those around you?

A man who has learned the art of leadership feels the call to an ideal form of uplifting art, primarily associated with a particular way of seeing, creating and building a relationship between man and the support of art – to look, to understand and to create realities. He directs his spirit and all forces toward a new vision, towards a new perception of the world, of things, of life, expressing his openness to an original and creative thinking - which is the most valuable quality specific to a genuine artist - and consciously, with the admirable strength of spirit, he is dedicating with all his soul and mind to the work he performs, by putting permanent energy in order to be close to perfection.

An uplifting art is a way of finding yourself, of answers, of noble causes, of purpose searching, and of the desire to experience what is usually invisible to the common eye. It allows you to experience what is reflected in the shaping of destiny, the way your life flows in every moment of inspiration and commitment, when you help distinguish between the authentic value of your creation and the depth of your character.

The destiny of man is akin to the art made by a painter: it has a use in this world as long as it gives you a strong spiritual gratitude and for as long as someone remembers you.

Leadership: Your art feels good only when your work is complete?

The leader, just like a painter, puts his art into practice, considering always his duty: to do what is right and good, in such a way that his "work" would be perfect. He connects to people's souls through his "work", through his art that springs from within him and, which inspires respect and trust.

Not the leader's own interests urge him to fulfill what people expect from him, but that he is deeply aware that he lives for a noble cause that will be welcomed by people, certainly feeling that everything he does is unique, that nobody can do things more deeply and effectively than him.

Leadership is everything, art and creation. It means to merge with the soul of the world through your work. Even so, it is slippery, it is damn slippery. Because, paraphrasing the famous writer Stephen King, art comes from a creative imagination that works hard and feels good only when your work is complete. However, for your work to take shape, for your intentions to materialize, you must arrange yourself in an amazing way, in detail, winged by inspiration, everything related to your ability.

That is, in simple words, to do true wonders with the skill of your hands, through creative imagination, thoughts, feelings or actions. You must reproduce the splendor of your work with such precision and grace, so that people cannot stop showing their satisfaction. So, consider your mind and soul in order to achieve a high ideal of artistic manifestation.

The Great Work whose perfection you must find is a genuine increase in the value of things around you using an approach that goes beyond the present boundaries of reality.

The interpreter of divine is the one who, putting his art into practice, manages to give voice through his "work", his own soul, the feelings he lives, his own ideas, visions and concepts.

Many times, the leader plays the role of an artist who, using the skill he was endowed, possessed by a deep and strong passion for leadership, notifies the need for improvement, devoting himself whole-heartedly to its achievement.

This is the highest and the most real power of a leader.

The DNA Of Your Leadership

On March 14, 2009

Concentrate your attention to your own character structure for keeping in safe your own system of values and aspirations.

There was no danger than the evil which he caused by himself. When he realized this, Kevin Lomax was about to resign in the posture of a man tempted in every way. He was the main culprit of his moral and spiritual decay. He knew he was not able to master a situation in that he was in. The impact of sudden changes that he had suffered was so deeply, that he had no time to react in any way. Problems undermined his will to meet the challenges of his work and forced him to give up his personal life.

All he knew, was different now, all he felt, was questioned. Not everyday things, but important things, like the raison d'être. It was strange, how he had left himself so easily involved in the various complications of these people who ran the company that hired him. He felt like a mouse caught in a race with no chance of escape, in the race full of challenges and dangers that John Milton, the manager of the company, by himself, framed him. The interaction between the two realities - his, and Milton's, was harder to bear.

Although, the confidence in his own mind was shaken, Kevin still had a deep vision on his own "ego", which was the center of his existence. He was at the crossroads between two realities: one was of Milton's and his associates, the other, was his one. He had to free all by himself, and as quickly from the bondage imposed on him, he had to separate with all that was connected with them, by using his own internal mechanism of "self-defense".

Leadership: In order to weigh your Ego, do you have to experience the fact that yes, you can bear the consequences without suffering because of a leap forward for which you haven't taken responsibility beforehand?

Can you walk on high wire? If you remember the movie "The Devil's Advocate (1997)" then you know that the dropping of Kevin Lomax from the clutches of "evil" was due to his skill of understanding and overcoming all forms of coercion of Milton, who wanted at all costs to induce him to give up his values based on a solid foundation and to adopt his own rules of action or thinking.

Your power of leading starts and ends with what you think about yourself, and it is conditioned on how you approach and control the influence of others. Trying to fight with foreign influences, it is like walking on the high wire. If you have doubts about yourself, you can always unbalance both physically and emotionally, and to decay, first, in front of your own self, and of the principles by which you have guided your life. The "command line" that guides your leadership development will shrink so much, will become so fragile if you do not weigh well your forces and balance, that you will sabotage by yourself and will fail.

To suffer because of a leap forward for which you haven't taken responsibility beforehand actually involves acknowledging that you are an easy-to-manipulate person who, even if advancing toward a lofty goal desired by others, is not able to support himself as he should, and is unable to resist and completely clear his mind of foreign thoughts. Just as the human body has a defense mechanism against bacteria, so you must have a defense mechanism, well-formed, against the leadership based on a "dirty" ethic of those with corrupt interests.

Leadership is the result of an Ego devoid of plurality that does not jeopardize the status quo of man, taking into account the fact that what man is already in himself arises in his soul before he can be detached from his master.

The DNA Of Leadership emphasizes your ability to support your „internal" progress. It is the cornerstone that supports your moral and spiritual progress. As a leader, you will always have to fight with a negative force that can push you back, or if you know how to approach it, and if you get to master it, can push you forward.

Conclusion: It depends on your DNA, that is your personality structure to permanently maintain your inner balance, and to comply with external challenges and negative influences of others that want you as an instrument easy to handle in order to achieve illegally benefits. In leadership, any oscillation, any deviation from the normal accepted by society, at some point has adverse consequences.

The Dominating Voice Of The Living

On April 12, 2017

Explore your inner world under the slogan "Stay Alive", adding the "True" value to the underlying condition of your representation on the sinuous route of character formation and definition.

I'm Gerry Lane, a scientist and researcher on the biological side of life. I kept saying that the reason for my anxiety will at some point leave the thought of trying to define, with more or less successful logic, a "Stay Alive" function with predictive power, indirectly determined by countless variables of action given by hazard – between contestation and intuition.

However, during various varieties of conflicts between environmental challenges and threats to my safety, I cross the worlds of secrets to exceptional, endless and dangerous circumstances, such as time itself, upon which no certainty imposed itself as a just solution, at least where I went, I noticed a pattern of latency of the virus according to certain health parameters.

During this contest of chance, endured only by the heroes of Mike Hassel, moved by a mysterious grandeur of hope for the glory of a supreme danger, reflected the words of Mark Twain: "I can teach anyone to get what he wants from life. The problem is that I cannot find anyone who knows what he wants from life."

Words placed on a single level of understanding of the world that exists only in comparison with the golden glow of perspicacity under the causal relationship between the deed of the one obliged to repair and the reward of the one destined to endure. A shine that surely diminished as I turned my eyes to my own perception of the theory of maneuvering the appearance of reality – which could only be analyzed and described in a noetic way.

Leadership: Do you focus your attention on research into the appearance of reality that is a benchmark for equality between what defines you and what you expect to happen to you?

I thought that the crunchy reality I was living is just part of a nightmare. It just seemed like a bad dream, but the dream didn't end, unfortunately. Why did you cross my path, so much deception and error, when you could have spared me any psychotic touch in which, like a mystery in the discrete tab of madness, you find the harmful effects of despairing the mind about the very existence of the self in an obsessive guiding idea: "Am I no longer myself?"

Everywhere, infected people, transformed into zombies. Only me, no. How could I, fundamentally similar and yet different from other people, even though everything seemed to have passed through the filter of subjectivity or artistic sensitivity that organized the essential and primordial forms of nature's creation, how could I have dragged myself into such a sin of untangling complex situations?

What a terrible deception from the voice that, by breaking the silence of my heart, screamed in despair at me to be quiet, not to panic, that everything will be all right, the voice that has always remained alive within me, which comforted me, troubled me, ravished me.

The same ordinary and unknown voice, detached from a novel by Mesa Selimovic, which I had not even noticed before. "Perhaps because it was heard in dead silence, perhaps because she was not afraid, or because she feared, or because she addressed me with pity, with courage."

The experiment of adapting to the adversities of life is a test of the perspicacity of the causality between the deed of the one who is obliged to fix the trail of his own questions and the reward of the one destined to endure the answers.

Your position on the appearance of reality can be a reflection of what you have in the course of everything that happens to you, when everything that seems to you more important than you at a certain point, comes at a second level. The appearance that reality gives in the context of a pandemic is closely related to the position you take in the face of the ambiguous course of events, so during a moment attributed to chance, because what happens to you at a given time seems important in terms of recreating past events. You need to start from the first sign of people's pre-alert, then continue with the first sign of attention, to the minimal reaction generated by visualizing a new behavior.

Appearance, something that is different from what it seems at first glance, helps create that state in which you are degraded from the condition of fighter to a level of "despair". Or, on the contrary, where you are advanced to the hero condition if you turn unfavorable circumstances into an inspiration of the creator seemingly given by divinity.

In leadership, the definition of the value man can be derived from the cartesian product of the relationship between the impetus of his conscience (the voice of the soul) and the often-painful attempt to revise his beliefs that guide his actions towards greater openness to the future.

Leadership is the attempt to give a correct answer to a "pass or fail" test when life gives you the chance to be directly involved in a certain segment of events occasioned by a certain fact.

The Dominating Voice of the Living is the urge to victory and glory under the "Stay Alive" slogan to which is added the "True" value of the background condition of your representation in the full on the sinuous path of developing and defining character.

One of the most important leadership skills is to find those individuals who do not know what they want from life, then teach them to get a revealing picture of their condition of beings who can rise above destiny without you being elected in advance as a guide.

The Double Of A Look That Tries To Better See Itself

On February 15, 2022

The difference is there, alterity is built. This is the first postulate on which the science of enhanced, individualized expressiveness in art is based.

The approach of my creation starts from the premise that the optimal form of constituting an individuality with exponential function, which is at the intersection between symmetry and surrealism, could be satisfied only by recapitulating an experience worthy of a story, under the title "Fictitious Reality". It is about remembering who I really am so that I can continue to create my own life experience at a higher level of awareness of the contiguity between what is evoked and what is perceived.

After all, this is also a literary performance.

This can only happen when the form and the visual image appear completely changed in a timeless space of being "everywhere and nowhere", as an uninterrupted adventure in the private space of an artist who reveals himself as a glance thrown over the course of history and which claims to reach the level of omniscience through a long life experience.

Of course, such an artist would not want to leave an appearance that would change the whole course of his life, but would become a character with divine powers, full of virtue, as is Prospero (from Shakespeare's play), having the power to lead with a way of divinely experiencing the plot of a series of unforeseen events. He uses spells, schemes and manipulations that all work in tandem as part of his grand plan to achieve "Single Causality" status.

Leadership: Can you achieve greater self-acceptance by fulfilling an exceptional role expressed in a double sense, as a very important part of the process of creating a hero who tries the impossible without the need for presentation?

From the point of view of the change of form and image that characterizes me in the case of playing a character with a decisive attitude, a demiurgic court with a human appearance, so in a progressive rather than static sense, I managed to define myself as a set of behaviors, voices, costumes, acrobatics, feelings in which the natural often meets the supernatural, in various stage movements, appearances and disappearances in smoke and flames.

All this, defined as such, has often been transfigured by the personality of the Creator, being arranged in an articulated set of images giving connotations on subsequent interpretations.

Obviously, they all have the role of complex decoration in the presence of a famous creator of masks and costumes, to glorify an idea, an event, a legendary hero, keeping his distance throughout the show through a structural invisibility, a double character, neither visible nor invisible, or at the same time visible and invisible.

Let us not forget that a magician with the valence of a physicist categorizes reality by determining the set of all molecules that can factually react with it.

Who can establish an order here, if not the brilliant artist who defined his mission and vocation – that of awakening in himself and those around him the mystical notion of a hero touched by titanic status and hubris (the classical, wide-spread image of a superhuman-like hero), yet having the power to recognize his true identity hidden behind masks, behind his dual personality. The climax is reached when the magician begins to confuse his disguise with his true identity.

Leadership: Can you project your self-image into a state of remarkable stability, even when you begin to confuse your disguise with your true identity?

In the movie script I wrote years ago, I was saying that a magician is being trained under the pressure of events. He transforms, loses his true being, dissolves his identity, eliminates his own weaknesses, breaks any barriers – and then disappears completely, suddenly appearing in a new hypostasis – followed in turn by other hypostases. First, he's a chemist, then a healer, sometimes a sage, sometimes a physicist. Always involved in a process of actions and reactions, of rejections and attractions, of eliminations and coordination, in a world of magical symbols and filters created by himself. From all the elements thus associated, a new complex is formed, a completely different human type.

Whether it is my recognition in a double of mine, if we take into account a special force, Visergeranth(my presence in the "image of the other"), due to the experience of communication through false indexes, facial expressions, posture and gestures precisely coded, we have in front the process of recognizing a finely differentiating otherness on which the symbolic dimension of separate, distinct identity is based. Even if everything happens "in the mist", the magician accepts his divinity, claiming his consciousness as a means of artistic expression, thus gaining his position as a "miracle man".

I would not have expected the unfolding of the frames at the end, beyond which the aesthetic cannot go beyond the real, from the interweaving of some plans that I thought were already gone, to the reappearance of some characters that I felt were more important. But this is only true if I take into account a decisive power which accentuates the dynamism of the image, without it knowing the laws of motion and remodeling, as actus imperfecti.

A closer look at the image that makes you stand out from the crowd reveals the gap between the visual interpretation of an entertainment experience, and the reality that is gradually revealed through its chiaroscuro effects.

The Double Of A Look That Tries To Better See Itself is so familiar to the artist who creates two images in one, with the precise purpose of giving a style note to your performances. The difference is there, alterity is built. This is the first postulate on which the science of enhanced, individualized expressiveness in art is based.

The Double Vision Of The Eyes From Which Stems Inspiration

Try to paint a picture of the present you are in, knowing that what you see depends only on what you expect to see.

The sea taught me to look at the sand as part of its vastness. Applying this aspect to the case of science, generally presented as an expansion of the infinite into the finite, where the grains of sand cannot be counted, and where the waves cannot be reduced in number, I conclude that ideally the parts that connect to eternity, of what is truly whole, depend on the simultaneous existence, in absolute value, of all image elements arranged in the time interval allocated to an absolute frame of reference: the present.

Here, and only now, I have to use the FREEZE procedure (freezing the image), according to the chosen viewing angle, in order to distinguish the parts that are not presented separately from the whole and, thus, to avoid the conflict that the three-dimensional illusion produces in a flat surface, far too wide.

I am also often surprised that I am struck by a 3D augmented scene, I am pierced by a sensation coming from somewhere other than here, which I would like to retain on the retina of my memory for its unique and unrepeatable value. For whenever I look at the surface of the sea, this mystical space, suggesting the value of silence, I feel as if I am entering a world beyond my sphere of experience, unable to make any change in a reality that offers more than a virtual mirage. Yes, it is an incomplete reality. Nevertheless, it gives the viewer the opportunity to imagine various ways to complete a cyclical narrative, full of vigor and captivating, about visionaries whose zeal and imagination compete with the great discoveries of current science.

Leadership: Can you form a new model of reality when you reconstruct a single image from the perception of two flat and different images coming from each eye?

My eyes are still caught between the overlays of two transformative images: one called Syternathis (the manifestation of adoration for the miracle of reality) and the other called Terrsenauthis (the background of a memory that never forgets), each of them establishing the identity of another dimension of the creation that responds in a deeper way to the idea formulated by the writer Mario Vargas Llosa: "Fiction is not life lived, but another life invented with materials provided by the first life and without which real life would be more sordid and poorer than it is."

And I still know my eyes so well, and in my soul they scan my horizons, as in stories, with the effective intensity of a flashing light equal to the intensity of a fixed light, that I manage to support the maintenance of cognitive function and optimal vision. I am convinced of this, because in this way I can easily explore, in my own way, the deep truths of a world that seems to absorb me into it, but never sinks.

With the intensity of experiencing a moment of immersion in the unreal, expanding the sphere of light around a cosmic field of energy that interacts with everything that exists around, I assume an inspiration embroidered on the edge of the ultimate truth: "what I see depends on what I am expecting to see."

Leadership: Can you create a visual representation that communicates those emotions expressed by viewing two separate or superimposed images of the same moment of reflection?

And when I look at the sea, dreamily and nostalgically, I think about what would happen if the wind of a late autumn evening took the sand and carried it to serene distances where there is no life, and no death, but only immense chaos dark and cold. How could the dreamer be caught in the spell of the sea from the very first pages of his unfinished novel, how could he feel every emotion of the protagonist who seems to have known him for a lifetime, himself being his own creation?

I have no doubt that what further strengthens my claim to authenticity is precisely the "double vision", that is, the visualization of two separate or superimposed images of the same moment of reflection, when only one should be seen. Me and the creator, the director and the character-narrator of the same novel.

In this case, the images I encounter, the ones that strike me or move me, can be side by side, one above the other or a combination of the two. An image of the sea breaking its waves on the fine sand of a wonderful beach, the waves biting the beach sand, carrying it out to sea. And an image in which I am closely connected to nature, where the longing for a new world, in the sublime of a momentary demonstration, is personified by the flight of sand grains carried by the wind with the passage of time, the memories surrounding me like seagulls that take flight towards infinity.

Declaring leadership in the space of creation is achieved through an image in which you are emotionally involved, with the mention that what is seen in the image, and to which a source of memories is associated, is a description of what is in your power to reinvent.

Can you reinvent the story of your life by appealing to the suggestive power of an image?

The Double Vision Of The Eyes From Which Stems Inspiration is closely related to two images captured simultaneously, but perceived differently: one that makes you lose yourself for good minutes in a beautiful dream, and another that is achieved "here and now", in the conditions the action of stimuli and objects on the sense organs.

In the Quran, there is a paragraph that caught my attention recently: "God kept a man dead for a hundred years, then resurrected him and questioned him. How long did you lay there? And the man answered: A day, or even less."

I know just as well how it is with time and the space in which I spent my time. At one point I dreamed that I was running on the deserted sand, surrounded only by the sea, with a very vast horizon in front of me. I couldn't tell if the sea or the sand would end. Then I woke up from the dream. And even to this day I have not stopped remembering this dream in which I wandered for hours without waking up. A dream that sometimes an artist creates, and life crushes him a thousand times...

The Doubt Principle

Never doubt the leader's intentions if don't even know them yet.

Sometime, in a few years, I'll wish to remember the important things that I have learned over the years in my life. That is why I write these words very passionately. Because time and life erase a lot of things from one's memory, but what I write will always remain vivid here, on the World Wide Web. However, I don't write only for myself, but for you, my readers, who are eager to learn new information on leadership which you will apply, eager to improve your performances and abilities, as well. I hope from the bottom of my heart this will be useful for you, now and in the future.

A long time ago, I found a book which, first of all, I would consider it "necessary". It meant a lot for me, as it taught me a lot of things. It was also the first historical book that I ever read and, at the same time, a beautiful lesson of leadership. It is called "Hannibal ante portas" and the author, in case you haven't heard of him (I hadn't heard about him myself, at that time), is called Slavomir Nastasijevic. In this article, I shall focus on a certain paragraph of this splendid book.

Leadership: Is giving a sense of learning to the lessons that come from inside the experience of your personality an expression of the belief that everything that inspires you will happen?

The victory won in the battle at lake Trasimenus against the Roman consul Flaminius was total. The Carthaginian army, lead by Hannibal, got a lot of weapons and several Italic prisoners. According to war rules, they would be killed or turned into slaves. But, on this occasion, things were completely different.

For the first time, Hannibal addressed to the prisoners:

- Italic people, Hannibal didn't come to Italy to enslave you... You were made prisoners by my warriors in the battles in which the Romans pushed you, but I don't consider you as my enemies, I mean to do you no harm and I decided to give you freedom... Go to your homes and tell everyone: Hannibal didn't come to Italy to enslave it, but to free it from the reign of the Romans, hated all over the world !

Then he ordered that all slaves be released, their shackles removed and be given supplies for three days.

The slaves hustled, pushed each other aside, hugged one another, some cried of joy or laughed as if they were crazy. But Hannibal's decision confounded all the Carthaginian captains, who started to mumble and frown. It was unprecedented. "Only a madman could release more than three thousand prisoners", they all said to themselves.

Performance in leadership falls under the conditions of a "road in progress" adequately signaled with the priority indicator to what is coming from the opposite sense when peoples' reactions are siding with beliefs that must not be questioned.

Colontai, one of Hannibal's most valuable captains, gritting his teeth, asked him:

- Why would you offer them freedom?

And Sivas, another captain, added:

- What will we tell our warriors when they'll hear about this?

Hannibal laughed and told them:

- Be silent... In their lands, everyone will tell of our nobility, which is the real way of confusing the enemy. After we conquer Rome and all of Italy, you may take as many slaves you wish.

All the captains loudly agreed to Hannibal's decision.

Leadership: Must your vision of what you're able of carrying out comply with an experience of personal power that moves you closer to the tendency of believing yourself to be invincible?

Don't judge the leader's decisions if you don't know what his intentions are. Only a skillful leader can win one victory after another. And only a skillful leader can always muster up his men at a maximum, in order to achieve his proposed goals.

Hannibal was such a leader. All the battles he won were due to his ability not to oversee any detail. Cunning, very confident and studious, Hannibal studied in good time all the aspects related to battles, he thought in advance all the strategies, knowing that his ultimate goal, the conquest of Rome, is not easy at all to achieve. He knew from his father, Hamilcar Barcas, that the only way to avoid a fiasco was to conceive in advance all his opponents' moves, understanding their psychology and tactics - to annihilate their strong points and never act hazardously. His superiority in regard to applying military tactics saved him many times from defeats and any type of uprising of his soldiers.

At their turn, the Puns lead by Hannibal, tens of thousands of warriors, were never reticent, on the contrary, they recognized him as perfect leader and followed him to death, strictly obeying his orders. They always accepted his orders because they knew he was right, as he was tried in battle and very elevated, at the same time, he understood the aspects related to winning a battle much better and he knew what to do in any circumstance.

The crowning persuasiveness is the result of the final confrontation between what appears to others as hard to believe and what is believed through delineation from what constitutes a momentary impression.

Even if they don't know his intentions, people have no reasons to judge the actions of the one leading them, except if he previously proved to be unskilled or ignorant. And an excellent leader knows how to convince people not to judge his intentions. Doubt, suspicion, lack of trust in a leader are in his disadvantage. It is an alarm signal when people come to doubt his decisions, a signal that cannot be ignored and which can push him away from them.

The finnish writer, Mika Waltari, once said that people are like the water flowing from one vessel to another, passively taking the shape of the vessel in which it was poured. Generally, people comply with and openly admit to the righteousness of a leader who always leads them to victory. But if he doesn't prove decisiveness, trust in his own forces, competence, fortitude, will and courage it is almost a certainty that people will have some doubts in regard to his intentions.

P.S. If the leader is very skillful, always listen to him. Never doubt his intentions if you don't even know what they are, because you only spread doubt, dissension and insubordination. You should rather try and understand his strategy.

The Drawer Of Parallel Realities

On December 30, 2014

Assume yourself a realistic position to transmit revelations, based on your capacity of perceiving the added value of your own experience.

IT was undoubtedly a fruitful philosophy, a mysterious episode in the ambiguous game of the expanded imaginary, a cohesion between sense and nonsense through which I could think of another world. A universe built after the laws of a n extensive reason, determined by the enduring dependence between deformation and the deforming force of the contextual space in which objects and beings were placed. Enhancing the energies released from their interactions. Even if they appeared unreal, distant, artificial, colorless, lifeless.

The innovation of ineluctable thoughts, as a cut in the limits of reason that wanted to be the holder of irrefutable truths, was based primarily on the influences of the catalysts of refining self-standing matter. Strange. Everything gained a sort of dense materiality, which filled that void of significance called self-knowledge and created the entire chain of dependencies. Suggesting the liberating movement of a part of me that urged me to understand and get close to what the alchemists called "the total fusion of the spiritual with the material".

The order in which my hypotheses on the content of reference of scientific theories based on prediction were chained, due to the great complexity of the phenomena of cohesion between ideas and the way of transposing them into image, in which I found the living force of cosmic fraternity, could be modified only by balancing multiple levels of fiction. They overlapped and multiplied ingeniously like sunrays blend with those of distant sunsets, giving birth to a new perspective, a new reality.

I had that strange feeling that I was expecting something to happen to me. Implicitly, I was troubled by that part of self-worth that came from a high perception of the spiritual, or rather, from the dead end of a marginal perception of a new reality. I didn't even know how to best express myself. But of one thing I was completely sure: "Things existed. Their realization was within me, same as my own realization was within them."

Can you integrate within the sphere of leadership the differences and similarities between visions coming from two different fields: of the philosophy of science and of self-consciousness?

In leadership, very important for the investigation and understanding of the process of perceiving added value through a subjective representation of reality, is the art of exploring fictions and utopias – pertaining to the particular man. And a more correct appreciation of the complexity of the man focused on thinking up the future can be done by examining his philosophy, produced by the fusion between science and foresight.

The stimulating challenges are offered by the very backbone of imaginative thinking, to create a context of manifesting your own personality and ending with reflecting that personality in choosing future developments. The philosophy of science is based on the relationship between what you find relevant about a coherent set of notions, ideas, theories and doctrines, reflections specialized in thinking, and what you think of a certain reality above the world, or which is often ignored.

Authority in leadership can be usually attributed to a single "owner", creator of new theories and concepts, endowed with the ability of substantiating things and reality itself, in different contexts, based on his individual nature. Conscience urges you to accept a certain reality, you being its creator, when your Ego becomes the most exposed part of its definitive configuration.

We refer to the man who knows how to customize his science by the laws of an extended reason, capable of transforming living matter into an explanatory principle of all things – a scholar who has overcome any barriers in order to be himself, a man capable of filling this void of significance, called self-knowledge, and create an entire chain of dependencies between the rules of modeling reality, which we usually call experience.

Leadership: Can you develop your understanding of a particular thought by analyzing its formal features, without distinguishing between facts, rational data, and value interpretations?

Someone said in an article on the internet: "There is a science of an ordinary type, by the exact knowledge of things. And there is one of a higher type, by knowing them in their idea, meaning not only an exact knowledge, but also a true one."

The leader of the future will be shaped not only by surpassing a limit of knowledge, by collecting information directly from the area of the proposed objective, but rather by matching the probabilities of self-surpassing, attributed to the individual experience of forming, almost unlimited, giving a meaning to his life beyond existence itself.

He will want to reach a new understanding, a higher one, one of the revelations of consciousness, of the truths thought of by himself, through the subjective power of perceiving reality differently, of seizing alternatives at the nature of reality that he wants to experience and transmit boldly.

Things must be chained, compared, separate until they gain a new outline, they must be shaped and fitted with meanings that come to life. A life that signifies your own surpassing. This will be the essence of sustainable development.

And this development requires you to integrate within the sphere of leadership the differences and similarities between the visions stemming from two different fields: of the philosophy of science and of self-awareness. They are determined and act reciprocally through the relationships established by vision, by balancing multiple levels of fiction.

By gaining experience, conscience is able to align an art and a science that, together, can explore the spiritual horizon of the individual until observing a distinct reality – so that later on it can be assessed in terms of its dynamism and complexity, according to its requirements and its supporters.

A reflection from which stems a new reality regards the Ego's work of acquiring the highest knowledge specific to that experience of finding the meaning of an imaginative projection that is the revelation of a sublime world.

The Drawer Of Parallel Realities may be the leader who wants to reach a new understanding, a higher one, revelations of conscience, truths thought of by himself. Such a man, who uses the full power of experience to surpass himself, is always guided by the rule: "Things exist. Their realization is within me, same as my own realization is within them."

The idea is this: to distinguish yourself from others through a kind of magic, through a kind of code of hidden knowledge.

One night, Nicolas Flamel, creator of the Philosopher's Stone, had a dream. But was it a dream, or just an apparition seen when he was barely asleep, a palpable manifestation of destiny? The heavens had opened to let a luminous spirit descend to earth. An angel with a bright face was at the foot of the bed; its white wings filled the room and occupied all the space. The Seraphim opened his arms. He was holding a book with a shiny brass cover. His warm voice, with a sublime timbre, focused in a message with strong emotional impact:

- Look at this book, Nicolas. It seems unknown to you, like to all other people. But one day you will see in it what only you must see and you will know what no one else knows.

Nicolas reached out to take the enigmatic book, but the shape disappeared into a cloud that soon dissipated. A few days later, Nicolas Flamel was in his study, as usual bent over the work table. He was a poor copyist who sold copies of old books to kings and students. He had read many books in his life.

Suddenly, the copyist looked up and saw in front of him a man whom he had not heard enter. The visitor's face looked sunburned, his clothes were dusty from the road, and he looked exhausted. Nicolas looked at him kindly. It was obvious that the man did not understand French at all. He looked fearfully around him and then, calmly, he opened his bag and took out, very carefully, a rectangular object, wrapped in strips of cloth, made of a fine and rare papyrus. He slowly opened the strips of cloth and revealed a book, which he wanted to sell to anyone who would give him two guilders.

Nicolas felt like passing out with emotion. The book... and this connection... he had seen them before... Everything had been shown to him in the dream he had the night before. The angel had handed him the same book !

Leadership: Can the image that captures your mind in search of faith in God transform into a satisfying and stable sense of self, capable of escaping the tyrannical orbit of social determinism?

And from that moment, everything changed. A poor copyist became one of the greatest alchemists of all time. And the richest of all. And the most famous of all. This, because those born under a lucky sign have real esoteric experiences, from another world, revelations and moments in which they feel special. It is not just about some isolated material discoveries that arouse their interest and the need to know more about the field of some science. But it is about a revelation that brings them the opportunity to get closer to spirituality and to perceive life from another, much higher angle.

Practically, Nicolas Flamel also benefited from another help, a lucky mystical sign, with the appearance of the angel, who unexpectedly communicated to him the motto of spirituality: "Holier, more precious, brighter". Probably, Nicolas Flamel then asked himself the most urgent question: if even the angels, who are so pure and clean, want to become even better, and more wonderful, and are continually perfecting themselves, then what am I waiting for?

Certainly, the circumstances, the events we encounter are a revelation of being, a confirmation of our way of thinking. And the appearance of the angel denotes the whole essence of a man's spirit and his way of judging a cause or a certain undertaking, only in that situation in which he discovers his divine side (which he never imagined he had). Sometimes man does not have enough clarity and skill to carry forward a dream, a relationship with the divine nature, and then he cannot gain a new existence or find the way to pass into another dimension or state of the world.

The idea is this: to distinguish yourself from others through a kind of magic, through a kind of code of hidden knowledge.

In spirituality, the dream is the only way to communicate with God, a kind of overestimation of the importance of energies, experiences, sensations, perceptions that the creative part (talent and erudition) marked by a certain predestination, by a certain inevitability, denies the danger of "going astray" and accepts the position of intermediary between earth and sky, or as a kind of intermediary between an unavoidable unconscious and a confessed awareness. One thing is certain: the spirit accepts your position as "God's messenger" on the basis of supreme intimacy.

Leadership is equivalent to discovering small things that can become very important. What you don't think is possible to fulfill, becomes possible when you develop a great sense of spiritual fulfillment.

The Dream Of Nicolas Flamel And The Prophetic Message Of The Angel say one and the same thing: that the religious feeling, derived from an esoteric dream, is a feeling capable of developing a "holistic" intelligence. Someone said it well, that the dream is an inner crossroads where all the commotion of life resounds.

Spiritually mature people would be said to have grown up in environments where they were allowed to explore and express their natural drive toward the divine, long enough to develop a strong sense of self and a mature identity, distinct from other people. Of course, it is rare to meet a mystic who reveals his secrets by means of a metaphor-symbol of the artistic imaginary, as a kind of work of the divine spirit, because as a rule they keep silent about things that should not be said.

The Dream, Producer Of A Narrative Feature Film

The narrative that guides your vision can take shape when the logic of the dream stemming from the painting meets the logic of the dream stemming from the word.

I placed my being in an unusual narrative context, in order to metaphorically capture the creative process of a true artistic image: the reproduction of real life in a dimension of omnipotent illusion and the mirage of the high towards which the evolution of a new form of consciousness tends. This fact is associated with the emergence of a new mentality, more attentive to the aspects related to the rendering of reality beyond illusion, beyond the visual horizon, beyond the dimensions measured in space-time.

It's as if I had taken refuge in a dream in which the protagonist is an artist of the brush, taken out of oblivion, able to reproduce that contrast between "life" and "lifeless" in a colorful picture.

Whereas the placing of my being "outside" the visible field of diurnal consciousness, its rational projection in a dream and its dissipation in the infinite imaginary, as a metaphysics capable of meeting a certainty similar to that of science, totally changed my conception of the truth of deceptive appearances. It is clear that my whole being, its correspondent in terms of a spiritual consciousness of change, goes into more detail in the analysis of a process of otherness called Uphasetsirah(the realization of the *Oneness*of the Self in that part of the invisible world).

Leadership: Can the image from your depth become a space of transformation, where the contrast between life and non-life takes on new expressive valences?

Exactly. Thus took place that revelation which changed my life, and whose light shines in the depths of a soul caught in the snares of art, determined to seek its way on that area of the image which is constantly nourished by the constituted structures of the visible world and the invisible world. And, realizing the dream state in which the world is magical, especially after an unseen force hardly allowed me to achieve the transcendence beyond physical space, I placed my being in an absolute, unlimited measure of the brightness of the image which I project unto the outside world.

Indeed, the dream is an incentive for the mind of an insightful artist who wants to take advantage of an effect identical to that of the chiaroscuro, which only literature or painting can reveal. So, I take refuge in a dream transposed on the canvas while neglecting the rest...

Leadership: Does the image you generate according to determining the perspectives of approaching reality strictly depend on the suggestiveness of a visionary manifestation of the imagination that you can assume in the form of a narrative?

My creation is the very dream that I share with you as a secret, or as a certainty. And the fabulous story of an ontological vision is the creation of a dreamer who gives up reality to follow a fantastic, but extremely spectacular world, because it is the world of his own Self.

What I mean is that my dream, as it is: small in description, but fascinating in its extent and diversity, seems to be part of the content of another dream, of which awakening is nothing but a reserve option. The dream urges me to set in motion the imaginary, and eventually, to achieve the impossible.

And in the dream appeared to me a man who dreamed himself part of a dream that was repeated continuously, and repeated, and repeated until the man decided to draw or paint a representation of what is happening in his soul. As a kind of Hocus Pocus in which death defeats life by creating a powerful virtual self, by activating a "narrative self" that does not respect the real chronology.

I think this is what the writer Jorge Luis Borges was referring to when he ended his story about a famous magician:

"At the dawn of a morning devoid of birds' chirping, the magician saw a concentric fire heating up along the walls. For a moment he thought of taking refuge in the waters of the river, but then he realized that death was coming to crown his old age and save him from the turmoil of life. He headed for the flames. But they did not tear his body, but comforted and covered him, without heat or burning. With relief, humility, horror, he understood that he, too, was a mere appearance, as it was another that had created him in his dreams."

Leadership: Does the narrative that gives meaning to your creation gain its primacy over the classical and impersonal exposure of the work of art, highlighting the relationship between what actually happens and the suggestiveness of an image that can improve your vision?

When it comes to reality, one thing is certain: we cannot ask for material accomplishments unless we consider what is revealed to us through dreams, through symbols, through synchronicities and coincidences. And what appears to be a mere appearance in the world of reality may actually be the magic spark of a dream from which you can never wake up.

Obvious. I could easily continue my monologue in a dream that could last indefinitely. and no less to assume a certain kind of knowledge and initiation into the adventure of seeking the Self. Just as the artist manages through abstract painting to convey certain messages to the viewers, to create different emotional states, in the same way I could give shape to a splendid narrative content in a frame of memory, thus activating almost incomparably some forgotten contents of life.

Have you noticed that my narrative can take shape when the logic of the dream in the painting meets the logic of the dream in the word?

In a space where certain anxieties are expressed, here the artist manages to suggest the density of matter without resorting to pasty loads, aggressive scratches or excessive accumulations of opposition to reality, but successfully combining the delicate tones of watercolor with real explosions of color. So, the dream attracts the world's attention by the way I reflect my intellectual dynamics in the mirror of spaces that induce that touch of art and culture in the intimate setting of a flow of symbolic images.

One more thing. The dream in which I immerse my soul, thoughts and emotions, is not a meaningless set of fantastic images that appear in connection with the weakening of the role of consciousness, but rather is a means of transcending the limits of my rational thinking, appreciated as an intellectual act that captures the relationship between what is seen and what is hidden from the gaze that is completely ignorant of art.

From the perspective of a creator, the narrative is a temporal-spatial way of exposing a work of art on a private land: of a dream that is hidden by its manifest content. Or, rather, the narrative is the exposition of an artistic image within a reality that transcends the known area of time and space.

The Dream, Producer Of A Narrative Feature Film is the means of an artist to highlight on the canvas the vibrations of the feeling of "Deja-Vu" that reflects the combination of what he experiences and what he feels as lasting memories.

Don't forget that the fabulous image that improves your vision is the very image of an artist who can assimilate dozens of personalities in terms of several overlapping realities.

The Dreams Of An Old Man Trapped In The Fight With The Destiny

On September 24, 2012

Learn to adopt that attitude of the type "I woke up" based on a major responsibility to the effects of the states you experience before an implacable destiny.

Ed Tom Bell. He wanted to escape from that oppressive, dark and nameless feeling from his depth, to take away the dense and endless mist of despair due to the events of the last period, which surrounded him like a cocoon that delayed to open up.

He felt locked in a tight and empty space, the dramatic center of a life lived like a total defeat. And that desert, completely foreign, so black, so authoritarian, harmful in dealing with life, characteristic only to the man that throws himself with all enthusiasm in front of the unknown, waiting for his denouement, retained him more and more strongly.

He seemed to feel the need for a place to retire, where to rest ... forever and ever.

Someone said old age was an expression of destiny, because when you are old you realize whether or not you had any purpose.

Leadership: Can you fulfill your purpose by counteracting the effects of a destiny that constantly shouts "Faster"?

At the end of the movie "No Country for Old Men (2007)", the main character, Sheriff Ed Tom Bell (played by Tommy Lee Jones), is having a short conversation with his wife, Loretta.

It seemed to him that he fully entered the vague delirium preceding the other unknown called death. His whole being, it seemed, for the first time, a shadow. He does not look at all with the man who embodied the ideal contained in the word "brave". He becomes vulnerable to life, in front of the human condition, as the last redoubt of fighting with himself. A grapple with destiny, the Jacob's brawl with the angel, the first contact of a simple person along with another dimension.

"I had two dreams, he said to Loretta. Both of them with my father. Weird. I'm older now than he ever was by 20 years. So, in a sense, he's the younger man.

Anyway, the first one I don't remember too well, but it was about meeting my father in town, somewhere, and he give me some money. I think I lost it.

Second one, it was like we was both back in older times. And I was a-horseback, going through the mountains of a night. Going through this pass in the mountains. It was cold, and there was snow on the ground. And he rode past me and kept on going, never said nothing going by, just rode on past. He had his blanket wrapped around him and his head down. When he rode past, I seen he was carrying fire in a horn, the way people used to do, and I... I could see the horn from the light inside of it, 'bout the color of the moon. And, in the dream, I knew that he was...going on ahead. He was fixin' to make a fire somewhere out there in all that dark and cold. And I knew that whenever I got there, he'd be there.

And then I woke up."

Leadership: Are you ready to experience the effects of taking decisions to adapt to changing the product life on an affective background dimmed by a vulnerable destiny?

It is natural and absolutely necessary to look with interest and curiosity every interpretation given to leadership, to have a vision of perspective upon it, and to measure our forces when we get involved in its "game" because the future is uncertain and sometimes not outlined.

An emotional background blurred by a vulnerable destiny produces a distancing from oneself, not accepting as a premise of success any compromise between what your character pushes you to do and what you have to do to avoid total defeat. A "YES" you must pay to destiny represents a "No" that you say to life without any expectation of exhaustivity.

Leadership must spring from us, to be convincing, requiring a form of returning to virtue, and to strengthen from our own convictions. And, we must keep critical lucidity on us in relation to acceptance (transformed into beliefs) of our own model of evaluation and development.

How do you manage your perceptions of leadership? By the will of the vulnerable destiny or by the self-esteem contained in the word "courageous"? By analyzing a dream with an unpleasant prediction in which you find out that someone else will get ahead of you? Or through a special form of sensitivity that you can liken to a spiritual awakening?

The purpose that evolution predestines you for in the gear of a complicated psychological determinism is a manifestation of the attitude between the moment of experiencing a close to the limit situation and the frozen atmosphere of dreaming.

To protect yourself from the Ed Tom Bel syndrome, you need to adopt that "I woke up" attitude based on a major responsibility for the effects produced by the states we feel in the face of an implacable destiny.

This is the individual attitude underlying the composition of leadership, to everything that happens to us, to what we see as a great challenge, the chain of events, to which we ourselves are the protagonists.

Leadership: Is the main purpose of your existence to become aware of how you use your time as a survival resource so that your goal will be that definition and persistence of character that excludes external influences?

Few leaders, passed by the age of youth, manage to keep afloat when the ship of their own Ego, of their ally or their silent enemy, is swinging on the huge, insecure and boundless open sea of a new identity.

Most people increasingly forward towards sunset. And when this "ship of the constancy of to be" is sinking nobody wants them, nobody longer accepts them. They repel by themselves. And refuses to wear the diving suit, to prepare for an unforgettable adventure, arguing for a genuine solidarity towards more stable values. They are not concerned anymore for their own development, shaping the raw material left in them, just as the artist shapes his painting using the color for it to gain volume.

But they annihilate their leader role strengthening that union between "old age" and "depression", this being the only factor that can bring them closer to the reality of dreams left somewhat far.

Leadership: How do you take care of a being that you do not have to hurt, when destiny closes the door in your face and you do not have the strength to open it?

A leader can always raise stakes if he copes with events. If he protects his vulnerability in front of life, before his condition of "to be" as a last redoubt of fighting with himself. Continuing to swim, swim, and swim even during storms is a sine qua non condition to achieve greatness in leadership, and to protect your image as man of character.

To maintain your "constancy of to be" is like a being responsible for someone that you do not have to hurt, of an old man found out at the moment when he needs to put order into his life, into his thoughts, fears and to take courage, to continue the good course, to move towards other horizons, to some well-defined targets.

Do you have the will to get rid of that obscure and nameless feeling from your depth? How do you overcome your feeling of guilt, oppressive, surrounding you on all sides? Do you throw yourself with all the enthusiasm in front of the unknown struggling to have a dignified status? Do you see yourself in the position of the man, who embodies the ideal included in the word "brave"? Do you let yourself beaten in front of life, in front of the human condition, as a last redoubt of fighting with yourself?

Leadership is the answer you give to life when destiny gives you less than you can offer back.

The Dreams Of An Old Man Trapped In The Fight With The Destiny means the result of a thorough and realistic approach of the leader's human nature put into disorienting situations of life. Live your life going forward and you will start to better understand it by looking behind. Face up to the last moment the waves created by your powers.

The reliable performance and the true performer are born from victories obtained in times of trial, when you emerge victorious despite the obstacles appeared or raised by others in your way, when you can say, like a skilled shooter "hit point, shoot point."

And when you reach the sunset - inherent to everyone, you can say to you and to others "mission accomplished"

The Dynamism Of Becoming, In Opposition With The Static

On April 05, 2008

The final effect of Creation is the secret fund of an artist's soul in a continuous evolution.

Sergei Eisenstein had never learned drawing. He had begun to draw from a childhood impression: while waiting for the game to begin, engineer Afrosimov drew animal outlines with chalk on the dark blue canvas of the game table. Eisenstein was fascinated by the white arabesque of the line that was born before his eyes and that in its movement made dogs, deer, cats appear. The line moved along the invisible contour of an object which, by a miracle, thus gave existence on the table cloth. The dynamism of the line was a sensation that had fascinated him for years.

Engineer Afrosimov had inoculated him with the pleasure of drawing. Later, at the Polytechnic, the arid matter of analytical geometry acquired a special charm for the young student because it translated into the mysterious algebraic formulas precisely the movement of lines. The dynamism of "becoming", in opposition to the static, will fascinate him all his life, whether it is the movement of the line or the phenomena. It was a fascination with the genesis of things that has its origins here, in this early impression of drawing.

He drew, as we know, a lot in his youth. Much and badly, because, abandoning the primary inspiration, he loaded the drawing with details under the influence of the Russian school of genre painting. School calligraphy by model never succeeded. His manner was that of linear drawing. Then, abandoning drawing, he remained passionate, in his first films, for the mathematical purity of editing in his movement. The taste for sequence appears later, and explains the strangeness of this delay, by the logic of Engels' thought: "movement first attracts attention, and only afterwards do you think about what is moving." *

Leadership: Is the whole aesthetic and comparative conception of the creator in you formulated at the intersection of irreducible oppositions?

Man's confrontation with the universe of creation continues in the pleasure of giving rise to new aspects of a technical nature, and these seem to "freeze" in an illusion, especially in terms of fascination with the genesis of things that originate in the case of editing. In fact, the montage brings together certain pictorial, graphic, photographic (independent) images to obtain a set of visual effects, scenography, especially situations meant to delight the eyes and brain of each spectator, in a special style.

If only that were the case, then the artist would avoid the tragic condition of not having a history, of not being able to develop his personality, of not seeing his ideas transposed into a reality that is as true as possible, but at the same time progressive. His soul and artistic dynamism, combining ideas and visions in an authentic and overwhelming approach, must respond to the laws of a world beyond the horizon imposed by the shortcomings of a responsible profession (or the shortcomings of an era in which only creation could fill some gaps in the body of society).

Leadership: Can you create visions full of artistic substratum that have practical and spiritual utility at the same time, harnessing the ability to bring to life a deep soul reaction?

But the creation of a director the size of Sergei Eisenstein is not made up of ideas that need words to be published in a regular weekly column in "Time News", but is itself a movement of a certain kind, in which ideas and the visions, technical elements, and purely rational elements of the spiritual reaction seem to be struck by the temperature of the environment, falling in a fantastic manner, under the regime of a number of different variants of concept, joints, and chiaroscuro effects.

Taken into account, through analysis and comparison, these visions full of artistic substratum are theoretical or practical, meaning they assume a practical and spiritual utility at the same time. Ideas, whether theoretical or practical, even poetic, are ignored by critics because they involve the active intellect.

Or the whole aesthetic and comparative conception of the creator in you is formulated at the intersection of irreducible oppositions: first you have to open a subject that interests you, and only then you have to think about why and how it attracts the attention of others.

The secret fund of an artist's soul in a continuous evolution relates to the pleasure of creation to generate forms of expression in the field of art, but especially to the spiritual pleasure of opening new horizons of creation from which we can extract the essence of a directorial conception (only by force of interpretation and directing act).

The Dynamism Of Becoming, In Opposition With The Static brings into question that need for total change, which begins with the way the artist thinks, feels and performs (in images, sounds, emotions) the creative act of a work of art.

And for a director, the change starts from the way he makes a story out of images, and his becoming as a total artist must take into account the force of action that must be exerted to change a mood that generates cultural creativity.

The Echo Of A Dream That Strictly Imitates Reality

The fabulous story of a vision is the creation of a dreamer who gives up reality to follow a fantastic, but extremely spectacular world, because it is the world of his own Self.

I close my eyes and go to bed, with the mention that nothing but a beautiful dream can wake me, able to be repeated in reality. It is a moment of lucid thinking, but also cold in a certain way, because I feel like a prisoner of a space where value judgments cannot be restricted. Or the outer world is not consumed in this space, only I consume my chimeras in the space I have available in another present, from a parallel universe.

And precisely in completing this progressive dream, with the repetition of real-life experiences, I fall into a valuable summary of the subject that can trigger a rupture of relationship with the Simvehebrew phenomenon, a new determination of something that exists outside of thinking, more chosen if thought is described and defined from the silent angles of the universe.

I know that only through the act of falling asleep, thinking of a thing springing from a duality of the self reflected in reality, will I be able to cross that space of vision that asserts its value regardless of its material, metaphysical or comparative support. And in my meaningful dream, so well hidden in myself, it seemed that I woke up to reality, but something told me that I was still sleeping soundly, but I was sleeping without being manipulated by a possible reflection in the consciousness of a destiny emanated from eternity.

Leadership: Does the image in which you find yourself best give the impression of a dream that takes you in many directions, but in reality, does not yield even for a moment to the separation from the outside world?

The mind still seems to be focused on recognizing the main moment when materiality asserts itself fully and in art, through which the transition from message to emotion, from emotion to the fragile fabric of a personal life story takes place. While the message of the dream, enveloping me in the velvety mantle of deep sleep, focuses on recognizing art as the main bridge to fulfilling the ideal of a mind capable of triggering the emotions of an authentic discovery in literary or artistic creation.

However, in this deep, restful, regenerating sleep, something happens. It rather resembles a confusion. For I feel myself as being someone other than who I usually am, perceiving myself only in the echo of a life of which, perhaps, only the memory will remain. However, I feel calm inside of me. I don't feel any anxiety for anyone to come to my aid. Everything is quiet here. The image I made here is an escape of the self into someone else identical to me, but from a parallel universe.

"Who am I? I don't know who I am. In the hollow of my hands I gather the shadow that drips from people's eyelids to enhance the night with it, but now I have no hands, and people no longer have eyelids where darkness and dream gather. I'm always awake..."

Leadership: Can your identity image be built according to the relationship that is established between the outside world and the inner world, with the mention that what can wake you from the dream is the appropriation of a creation that belongs to someone else?

And what do you know? Night after night I start dreaming about how I sleep in reality, more than what I could experience in reality with the help of the dream. The same happens with the lucidity of a painter who paints very well with his involvement in the course of the Universe. His creation produces changes in the energy field of a spirit that gradually takes control of its being. Somehow, he sees himself from a point on the side or above his bed, and that means that he is above the plane of reality, and that the dream is his own creation.

Deep down, it hurts that I will have to part with the dream in which reality seemed to me just an illusion I had learned to live with. Sometimes I am disturbed by the impression that all this has happened with the agreement of a Deja-Vu metamorphosed into an Einsteinian cosmos, full of gigantic sources of energy, which can only be understood in terms of relativity.

Rather, I seem to be an illustration of a great act of hypnosis and visual seduction, loving more the resting space between two separate planes of existence, just as a writer's labyrinthine memory rests in the space between those words that make up his memories.

Let's imagine that my awakening happened suddenly, canceling out any story dreamed of by an artist who attaches himself to a representation of reality in which he seems to manifest with a kind of narrative instinct, as a reflection of the brain mechanism, or as a personal product of intelligence directly related to a spiritual, ductile and prospective background. To not be human, but just to project another man's dream. What a mind-boggling discovery !

The creation of an artist is the vision of the authentic and fulfilled human being in the plane of a world that he finds only by dreaming himself as being part of a dream from which he wakes up to be completely different, as another person.

So, my creation is the alternative way of approaching the plan of a world in which I take refuge whenever the exterior intersects the interior in the mirror of a life that cannot be matched in literature by other writers. And this, due to the authenticity with which they manage to render the perspective of the depth of the self as part of a huge whole.

The Echo Of A Dream That Strictly Imitates Reality suggests the true strength of an artist: to translate the reality of the world (perceived in a refined symbolism) into the form of a dream in which you can get lost if you are not willing to be one with your true self.

The Echo Of A Virtue Lost In A Metaphor Of Human Destiny

Every great deed has the taste of a distance you would like to reach. And not just to get to a place unseen by anyone, but to make it worthy of being perceived as an act of great faith.

The Magellan Strait has become completely superfluous. Its fate is definitely sealed. It has only a historical significance. It is reduced to a simple geographical notion. The much sought after pass has not become the crossing for thousands and thousands of ships. The shortest and fastest way to India and Spain did not increase its wealth, nor did Europe become stronger as a result of this discovery. Of all the living parts of the world, the coasts between Patagonia and Tierra del Fuego are still among the poorest and most deserted corners of the earth.

But in the light of history, practical utility never determines the moral value of an act. Only he who enhances mankind's knowledge of itself, who develops his consciousness and his creative powers, is the only one who truly enriches him, for all ages. In this sense, however, Magellan's deed surpasses all the great deeds of his day. And what is a special glory to us, which adds a new radiance to Magellan's glory, is that – unlike most leaders – he did not sacrifice thousands and hundreds of thousands of people for his idea, but only his own life. Through this truly heroic self-sacrifice, the splendid audacity of the five ships so small, so weak and lonely in the vastness of the seas, and yet daring to embark on the sacred war of mankind against the Unknown, will forever be forgotten.

Leadership: Can you grow under the guidance of a "forward coming from afar", but not from the indefinable space of a distance, but from the unfathomable depths of a fabulous yet real time?

And he will remain unforgettable himself, he who was the first to dare turn this idea into action, the most daring of all: around the world – the final stage of which is accomplished by the last of his ships. For, finally knowing the measure of the circumference of the earth, in vain sought for a millennium, all mankind acquires for the first time a new measure of its powers. Conquering more and more space, penetrating further and further into the infinity of the Universe, it increases its courage and joy in fighting, thus becoming aware of its own greatness.

A man always achieves the maximum possible only when his deed becomes exemplary. And in this respect Magellan's example — his almost forgotten deed — has proved for all time that an idea, if carried by the wings of genius, if always carried and determined before a passion, is ultimately stronger than all elements of nature. His great deed showed that one man, with his short and fleeting life, could turn into a reality and an immortal truth what had been only a desire, only a dream for hundreds of generations.

Leadership: Can you convey the image of a distance towards which you will probably go without interruption, looking for an absolute that you thought was hidden in an "invisible reality"?

Like a divine work, Magellan's great deed revealed another face of secular thought, orienting his valid and enduring endeavor toward the fulfillment of a unique dream, of great spiritual resolution, but seen not as a reason to replace known reality – so as whole generations have regarded it — but as the language of a hermeneutics of the divine message. But for this language to become the target of other great doers, the dream should not be interpreted as a "metaphor" of a path full of obstacles and suffering towards salvation, synonymous with Moses' journey through the wilderness, but is meant to strike a balance between a committed commitment and the goal pursued, giving back to the world the fullness of a divine plan.

So we must not see the great deed as an implicit metaphor. For this balance between the basis of an assumed commitment and the goal pursued must be deciphered in the deep plane of the great fulfillments of human dreams, in which this language of a hermeneutics of the divine message is an original phenomenon of creative expression and outlining a way of life capable of reflecting the true nature of the leader.

An invisible reality is the de facto representation of a dream that goes on, with small but sure steps, thanks to God. Only in the great deeds of creation or revelation can one read the "praise" of the Lord. Suggestions for supporting the interpretation of this divine "praise" are provided by the symbolic philosophy of moral self-improvement, which, arguing that the relationship between self and divine is the prototype of the symbolic relationship between what you think is important to you and what God thinks is important to take the world to another level. So let's look at the great deed as a new intellectual and spiritual relationship of man to the space of a new way of thinking about excellence.

And, to paraphrase someone: It does not matter to advance in the world of metaphysics, in a world that is built primarily through, or dominated by, the notion of substantiality and causality. But only the retreat into the original phenomenon of the expression "I have come to be someone" gives us here the key to faith strengthened by deeds.

Leadership is the image of a distance that few will probably ever go to, on the grounds that what binds faith and the very ambitious goal, on both sides, is represented in the form of a promise made by God only to those previously chosen to fulfill a holy work.

The Echo Of A Virtue Lost In A Metaphor Of Human Destiny is a shortening effect to a very long regular delay, especially if that virtue is called "honor". No doubt we can meet and know God only from the depths of a soul thirsting for success and miracles. From this level of approach to Magellan's history, we can imagine his deed as a long and endless confirmation of God's relentless destiny.

The Echo Of Influence

On October 29, 2010

A skilful leader takes over the foreign influences and incorporates them into a whole new vision.

The famous writer Stephen King recalls in his book, "On Writing: A Memoir of the Craft", something that happened many years ago, about the English director Sir Alfred Hitchcock.

Not long after he finished the movie " Psycho ", Alfred Hitchcock held a screening for some friends. They were very impressed and declared him an ace of suspense. Alma Reville, the director's wife, remained silent until they all said their opinion, then she said firmly: "You can't send it in the world as it is."

A staggering silence spread, except Hitchcock himself, who only asked her why not. "Because, the wife replied, Janet Leight swallows when she was supposed to be dead."

Leadership: Is your idea a challenge whose response is an authentic message when you try to send a link to a misleading news story in the world?

Alma Reville was absolutely right in her observation. Hitchcock did not resist, because his wife showed him one of the flaws that he had committed. In fact, his main support was Alma, who was not only a critic with keen eyes that was not impressed at all with her husband's reputation of "master of suspense", but she was also a very good advisor and an excellent collaborator, also endowed with an amazing creative capacity and a remarkable sense of observation. When Hitchcock said he wanted to fly, Alma, always attentive to details and more inclined to concrete and practical things, or better said to reality, brought him down to earth every time: "First, eat your food."

It is said that art is an endless recycling process. You create, rebuild, throw, and this cycle repeats itself endlessly. However, for you to evolve in your undertaking, to cultivate your talent and fructify it at a higher level and, especially, to be able to create your unique style, absolutely out of the box, you need a lot more than perseverance, effort and dedication to your job, you need more than great desire to learn new things.

You must have an open and attentive mind to all possibilities. You must have a kind heart that would always see beyond its own prejudices, perceptions and beliefs. You need to be flexible, to adopt the opinions of those around you, as well. Do you accepts influences of those around him with an open mind?

A news story with deceptive content is a demonstration of the causal connection between the connoisseur and the known subject that amazes through originality but does not give all the answers to your questions.

Hitchcock restored several scenarios and corrected many mistakes that he missed at first, thanks to the healthy suggestions that he received from his wife, Alma, and perhaps from other of his collaborators working in television. Moreover, only so, he could visibly cultivate his mastery. Being a strong personality, gifted with clarity and an open heart, he joined others in the process of concretion of his ideas, to make the change for better and very good. Here is what it means a leadership of quality.

A flexible mind it is a mind ready to build the future. How much and how well you use the help of others will influence your level of success. In other words, your success is largely attributable to the influence of others, because you cannot increase your value if you trust only in your vision and if you are not open to opinions and suggestions of those around you.

Leadership: Is the idea you create in your mind when watching a film the story itself or the way it is formulated and referred to the term of "precedent" that captures the essential?

Remember the old saying: "If you always look under the same rocks, you always see the same thing." In leadership, if you do not stay open to a diversity of points of view and perspectives, you cannot evolve in your career, achieve mastery and, consequently, you will always be at a lower level. If you are a skilled leader, sometimes you will be able to separate yourself from your own opinions, to free your mind in order for it to see and accept the alternatives.

I hope with all my heart that you are not one of those people that exude a friendly and smiling air, but, which hide their pride smoldering in their souls, who see only one reality and form their own visions of truth, but which can be completely distorted.

A skilful leader takes over and incorporates foreign influences into a whole new vision, while a weak leader deliberately keeps his abhorrent opinions, his illusions, his mistaken beliefs deeply rooted in his own being, and does not show the slightest sign that he wants to change. Such a man is condemned to always make mistakes because, often, despite his friendly and helpful air, he does not admit any influence on his professional activities from anyone. So, he will never have anyone to tell him: "you are unzipped", before coming that way into the public eye."

Early co-optation and consulting are bringing long-term benefits. And early involvement of other individuals in your work will make them feel that they have also invested something personal in that idea, that they have contributed to a successful future source, which will give them a feeling of friendship for you and will increase their confidence in your company.

The precedent that captures the essence to be conveyed to greatly differentiate a perceived idea of a forced or less inspired idea has the sphere of detail that, taken together, have an important role in restoring the image of a world that plays a decisive role in the process of total transformation at the big "picture" level.

Leadership means to surprise the suspense in a greater proportion, through the intrusion of the miracle or the unexpected into the destiny of the characters.

Conclusion: The idea of progress also presumes to take over and process the opinions and suggestions of others (of course, the positive and beneficial ones), the result materializing in a "finished product", greatly superior, with outstanding performance. This product is actually the echo of betaken foreign influences. The influence of other people reflects in the leader's personality, in his ideas and way of thinking, and respectively in the quality of the "finished product".

P.S. Inaccessibility, denial of various opinions, other trends, most often equates with persevering in error.

The Echo Of The Voice That Cries Mercy

Find a ratio between authority and vulnerability, in order to determine easier the character constant of someone.

God isn't present when your heart's not into it. A connection with the divinity is eternal, but the possibility of a saving intervention doesn't seem valid in the case of a man who is overwhelmed by the sheer force of the blows the intense faith has given him, of worries and terrible tensions same as a deep wound that never seems to close. And the healing time of an injury can be reduced only if it continuously pours sensibility and sincerity as a result of solemn prayers.

The words of Alexandre Dumas: "Humane mercifulness knows no limits, but humane forgiveness knows its measure." can be easily applied in the case of Senator Ruth Martin, in the demo stage of her vulnerability. Everyone follows closely, live on TV, her request to free her daughter, on the grounds of the indisputable right to live. A unique experience of an affectionate being, supported by refined thought. Maternal protection directed against the risks, a protection that the assassin feels, but does he have the power to quench his tendencies?

Leadership is about letting go of control to discover true power through compassion and sacrifice.

The shallow heartbeats transmit vibrations in the sound box of voice. The voice is a center of irradiation for the deepest, most ardent of feelings. And if we try to set a ratio between accentuating our inner noise and the variations of "exit pressure", which we sense in the inflexions of the voice, we can establish the character constancy of someone.

"My daughter, Catherine is very kind and good. Talk to her and you will see. Have the strength. You can do it. I know you can feel love and compassion. You have a chance to show the whole world that you can be as merciful as you are strong, that you are better than to treat Catherine as the world has treated you. Have the strength. Please.

The heartbeats are associated with the amplifications of the waves of generosity on the curve of psychical pressures. Sublime yet also disturbing, this shaky voice takes emotions to a higher level, towards the top of the pyramid of worries, favoring the loss of self-control and the inner void. And this resignation gesture, the significant step towards rediscovering spiritual value by removing the weapon of authority under the influence of a broken heart that trembles and shivers more and more, becomes the check point of her whole being. A self-abandonment, an intellectual and emotional representation of a strategy unimagined by any leader.

Leadership: Can you put your soul in restoring the future of others in the demo stage of your vulnerability, without becoming a prisoner of a horizon of beliefs that only belongs to initiatives to accept extreme compassion and self-sacrifice?

Only thought a hyper-protective attitude made up of obligation and restraint that prepares the outbreak of a personality crisis, can we prove the uniqueness of someone, given by the configuration of all the aspects of "internal control". This process of combining and harmonizing reason with faith, beyond the competencies and the experience accumulated in a leading position, it has a fundamental importance for leadership based on improving the decision-making process.

Beyond the experience of suffering that determines a silent withdrawal in one's own shell, but not in a creative way, there's always a transformation. A refinement of critical thinking that generated the fundamental question that someone haunted by worries always asks himself: "Where is redemption?" arising as a powerful prayer meant to help him in his future trials. And that leads to identifying a new action approach, to developing new possibilities of understanding our own capacities and limits.

Moments of loss of self-control and inner emptiness can lead to the rediscovery of deep spiritual values.

The demo stage of your vulnerability is the moment you are about to take an important step by abandonment in the face of a moral dilemma, hesitating between committing an injustice (the constraint of another's will that denies your will) and doing a stunning act, as great as possible, but at the cost of altering self-image.

You can become a prisoner of a horizon of beliefs that belongs exclusively to initiatives to accept extreme compassion and self-sacrifice when your image no longer presents an evolution, but is rather a simple presentation of the various possible connections between good and hard. When beliefs like "everything revolves around me" decrease in intensity and are replaced by others like "I am not smart enough to figure out what's going on" means that leadership is projecting inward, turning into a kind of feeling of lack of personal value.

The wisdom behind leadership can be summarized as follows: Learn to change what you think about yourself when you are firmly convinced that what is happening to you is part of what you have never thought could happen to you.

Someone confessed on a webpage: "It's very easy to throw stones, especially when you took them from the edifice that you have built. It's harder to take these living stones and place them back into the walls so that the edifice starts growing."

By applying it to leadership, this well put observation points to the authenticity of man by his refusal to accept what he's living. The edifice means a new restrictive approach in the chaos of life, in the most significant transformation moments, marking the entrance in the extremely interesting scene of giving new dimensions to inner reality. And the stones meaning the most negative effect, creating the possibility of a chain reaction of panic and confusion, work as an impediment for the man to station in that area of full trust that can spread a mobilizing influence over the others.

Trying to put your heart into rebuilding the future of others in the demo state of your vulnerability is the touchstone that unmasks the useable, the highest self, the true inner man, the gift of God that communicates directly with the compartments of the heart. A self-abandonment, an intellectual and emotional representation of a strategy any leader won't be able to imagine.

Leadership: Are you demoted from the rank of first sergeant for the platoon called "Authority" because of what you feel when you come into contact with the version of a sacrifice that becomes your own reason later?

Fight with the most horrible events and have the strength to go through the drama of losing your own identity brings critics to the sincerity of one's own mirroring in the deepest creases of the conscience. An echo spread as a wave, tranquilized with a lot of pessimism that repeats itself endlessly in your mind producing a constant unrest. If it could only stop !

And falling in the extreme in which you are unable to objectively judge the situations and you are no longer the first sergeant of the platoon called "Authority" has a fundamental meaning through the fact that it destroys your renown and separates you from the efficiency you want to achieve by placing yourself in the rows of chance and random encounters.

The version of a sacrifice that becomes your very own reason later is based on the personality traits gained by a voluntary renunciation of something precious to you for the benefit of someone who allows you to assume that conscience of belonging to a common fate.

The Echo Of The Voice That Cries Mercy points out the "ricochet" of this inner transformation in the conditions in which you prove the objective impossibility of achieving an authentic evaluation in the dynamic sphere of major events in your life. Also, it means not to ask for mercy as long as you're not willing to grant mercy. You can't ask without giving. And you give only when you reconsider your position towards people and towards yourself.

The Effect Of Scientific Construction

Manifest your intentions of adopting a new line of performance by integrating leadership in that creation of added value that wants itself permanently anchored in the present.

In a lesser known article, published in June 1926 in Berlin, director Eisenstein wrote: "My artistic principle was and continues to be: not intuitive creation, but rather rationalist construction, constructivism of active elements. The effect needs to be calculated and analyzed beforehand, this is the most important... I myself am neither sentimental, nor bloody, nor too lyrical, as I am reproached in Germany.

*But all these elements are well known to me and I know you must only amplify them with enough skill in order to obtain the necessary effect and create maximum tension. This is, I believe, a strictly mathematical thing and has nothing in common with the revelation of the creative genius. Nor do you need more spirit for this than for designing a steel construction. **

Leadership: Have your intentions of escaping the "superficial" trap of practicing a creation that proclaims its autonomy by rejecting the revelation of the creative genius been achieved?

Leadership easily integrates itself in the context of identity construction, receiving from art – from its subtle reality – a certain dose of order and structure, an increase of added value, but also a certainty for the owner of its novelty elements. Only he who reaches the spontaneous-creative fullness of his being, leaving the calling of uniting art with scientific revolution, tangent with the domain of thought, has the possibility of saving himself, as an artist, from the dissolving influence of the "superficial."

The superficial, as a means of shrinking and closing your position of supporting art, prevents you from penetrating the mystery of higher knowledge, forcing you to give up on intuitive creation, on rationalist construction, constructivism of active elements that guarantee peak scientific results. The superficial is a powerful force of self insufficiency, born from the misunderstanding of the investigated art phenomenon, relying on a certain amount of compromise of the effects of perspective of various forms of creation.

A creation proclaims its autonomy by rejecting the revelation of the creative genius when its effect reaches the maximum tension of a broad vision based on feelings that do not subdue you.

By isolating the superficial, the two factors of scientific production – research and construction of the active elements of the process of assimilation, setting and reinforcing of knowledge, of the relations of knowing truths, of the techniques of intellectual labor, become more powerful and more favorable for your manifestations of independence. In practicing creation, these manifestations include both the intentions of adopting a new line of performance, as well as the intentions of reorganizing the compositional elements that enhance the understanding of the model of construction of leadership and the methods of applying it thereof.

In the creation process, the effect has to be calculated and analyzed before obtaining a result, this being the most important step in providing a visually attractive content. But in order to obtain the effect, all elements of novelty and actuality in the field must be well known to you and amplified with enough skill. We refer here to the effect of the creative act, merging art with the revolutionary reality hidden within the momentum for progress, individualization and promotion of personal science.

Leadership should not act as an independent entity, but rather as a dynamic entity fully integrated in that creation of added value that wills itself be permanently anchored in the present.

A creation of added value that is constantly anchored in the present is a form of expressing yourself and making yourself understood through the production of revelations that are wanted through the direct experience of reality.

The Effect Of Scientific Construction targets that efficiency of the creative act by taking into account the elements of novelty and actuality in the field that are factors of support for a potential rise in performance. The creation of a leadership based on solid principles and scientific constitutive elements, continuously anchored in the realizations of the present, is a means of enhancing personal value.

The Elements Merge Into A Coherent Image

On November 6, 2011

An exceptional artist sifts through the fragmented sensations to create a connection between what is factual and what becomes symbolic.

The Russian director, Sergei Eisenstein, digs hard in his memory to bring back to the surface the string of elements characteristic of the street. But the perception of the street does not yet exist, because the elements remain disparate, not forming a unity. Only in the second phase do they merge into a complete image. Only then, says Eisenstein, does he remember the street. By carefully observing this process in your own consciousness, the association of elements starts spontaneously. He notes that the phenomenon is identical in the case of artistic creation. The evocation of the street follows the same mechanism by which, in the creative process, the unique, whole and meaningful image is born from its disparate elements. In both cases, the same law governs how the particular reaches, through the whole, our consciousness and feelings.

Every detail is preserved in memory and sensations, as part of a whole. Eisenstein continues his reflection: in practical life, but also in the process of remembering, it is important to get over the first phase as quickly as possible in order to reach the evocation of the whole. In art, however, the emphasis changes. In order to achieve its goal, the work of art follows exactly this process of sedimentation of images in the consciousness of the viewers.

Thus, the method of image elaboration must re-create that process by which, in life, new images are formed in the consciousness and senses of man. As a conclusion, Eisenstein believes that an artist who wants to express an image through factual representations should follow the same process, similar to how memorizing the streets of New York makes the transition from fragments to the whole.

Leadership: What impact does fragmented perception have on the formation of a unified image, when the artistic process becomes a catalyst for fusing them into a meaningful expression?

Eisenstein rummages hard in his memory, trying to gradually extract the characteristic details of the street, a process similar to the stage of sensory perception, in which the brain initially stores information piecemeal. At first, the elements of the street remain disparate, without forming a unitary image. Only in the second phase, they merge, gradually rebuilding into a coherent whole. At this moment, says Eisenstein, he remembers the street, carefully observing how the whole picture is born from its individual elements. As in the process of recall in neuroscience, every detail contributes to the formation of a complex and sedimented memory in consciousness.

Eisenstein extends this observation to artistic creation: in art, this process of sedimentation of images must be deliberately recreated in order to influence the consciousness of the viewers. In practical life, the goal is to get to the big picture quickly, but in art, fragmentary details play an essential role, allowing the viewer to experience the process by which an image is formed and fixed in memory. Thus, Eisenstein claims that an artist who wants to express a powerful image should proceed as in recalling the streets of New York, aiming to create a sedimented experience, where the details come together to form a memorable whole.

The process of artistic creation begins with disparate elements floating in the medium of memory, like particles in the water of a lake. Gradually, they sediment in successive layers of consciousness, under the action of the creative process. Initially, the representations remain separate in perception, but through processes of artistic fusion, they consolidate into a meaningful and whole image. In practical life this sedimentation must be rapid, but in art, as in the formation of sedimentary rocks, the process is deliberately slowed down. The artist digs through the layers of sensations, aiming to re-create in the viewer's consciousness that gradual transformation from disparate factual elements into a new unitary structure. This artistic sedimentation thus becomes fundamental in the formation of images, where the particular and the whole merge into a distinct evocation, just as individual particles transform into the solid rock of creative expression.

Leadership facilitates the transition from speculative separation to experiential unity, promoting a dynamic synthesis between abstraction and emotional vitality.

Elements merge into a coherent and expressive image when disparate particularities are integrated into a unitary whole. This process reflects the natural mechanism of perception and memory, in that the whole acquires meaning only through the organic connection of the details. I say this because Eisenstein emphasizes the importance of the process of sedimentation and synthesis of images in the consciousness of the viewers, every time he creates a work of art that seeks to evoke authentic experiences. Starting from the belief that art must recreate the natural processes of image formation in the human mind, Eisenstein offers a model by which art becomes profound and effective, capturing the essence of transforming fragments into memorable symbols.

The Elite Of Evolved Minds

Learn to give your thinking the depth of the experience of centuries, borrowing the essence of your chosen traits to those that are deprived of them.

I consistently walked towards an unknown world, without a landmark, as Columbus would head straight towards an undiscovered continent, but I was far less equipped than the famous conquistador, without a compass, without a rudder, and without a divider, feeling that everything would end in a shipwreck. I very much wanted to know a different culture, to give a different color to the mind, an introduction to what I was about to become: an extension of the infinite.

Daydreaming about the amazing proximity to something softer, less hardened by time and fixed ideas, as competent painters constantly seek new models through researching mystical revelations, not through the comparison with what others already managed to do, I could open the story of a short madness. Same as how Salvador Dali did it. I was a man of broad mind.

Plunged towards the virtuality of a self-renewal, towards an existence easily justified in terms of the consciousness that showed itself as being a divine grace, I sought to acquire an uplifting intelligence that was not subscribed to that dogma belonging to minds vulnerable to the condition of searching the world far and wide. I knew that I always had to seek within me the answers to the questions I didn't know, but all that was inspiration came from the old conquistadors.

Columbus represented the courage of opening new doors to a world through posterity, not a pale imitation of a useless action of sustaining and promoting an amusing idea. Salvador Dali represented the art of imagining to see beyond the mirror of reality.

In the equation of the reaction between the aspiration to the absolute and the possibility of surpassing your actual condition, where that continuous and constant form of communication between the two resounds, a new function of access to the representation of a new wave of avant-garde is established, called "the degree of membership to the elite of evolved minds".

Leadership: How do you relate to the experience of transforming the reality with which you come into contact and capitalizing on those discovered, so as to give your thoughts the depth of centuries-old experience?

In his old age, when the health of Prince Tyllerand never improved due to painful inflammation of the eyes, his sole concern remained that of knowledge. Although the illness prevented him from browsing the books in his library, the Lady of Coigny would tell us the following about him: "He would touch the books, put them back, he would leave them only to take them again, he would investigate them as if they were alive and this exercise, giving his thinking the depth of the experience of centuries, borrowed the writings and elegance of which their authors were often deprived."

Sometimes, everything related to the conditions of validating a form of exercising the ability of serving as a model of inspiration results from the way in which you manifest your discretion – this is the best part of the courage of surpassing yourself through education. To give your thinking the depth of the centuries-old experience means to relate your thinking to the acts of greatness of the forefathers who have shown a spirit of sacrifice, courage, ability to dream with open eyes, qualities that can be taken as examples to follow. It means closing in on the story of a question: how can you live a life that can be the scene of a discussion between Christopher Columbus and Salvador Dali?

Often, I myself was referring to the experience of transforming reality into a process of revelation, to see beyond the immediate of an inauthentic subjectivity, beyond exploring a jumble of confused choices, through a kind of exercise of admiration for precursors of new ways of approaching the artistic vision.

Leadership: Do you get involved in creating a revelation that transforms aspirations into reality, as a way of illustrating the depth of feeling that is not easy to understand in your inspirational model?

The role of men of genius, often perceived as being inactive or incapable of externalizing, uniting us around some ideal that transcends the concrete, is that of being the main landmark of an intellectual tension that puts at its center of attention not so much the inclination to increasing pluralism in thought as much as obtaining the revelation of a phenomenon of relevance.

You resonate with others not through your actions, not through creation or its messages transmitted directly or indirectly, not through the means of a character you highlight. But through the induction of a state of mind to a certain frequency of reflection, through your very nature – offering a vaster experience of self-realization at a level of mastery, constructing a unique, seductive identity.

Greatness in leadership, originating in establishing a revelation that transforms aspirations into reality, is an illustration of the depth of feeling what is not easily understood in your model of inspiration, but rather guessed, interpreting the message of its actions. Revelation is the promise of what you become in a synchronicity of your life with someone else, at the level of inspiration in grabbing a chiseled form of thought.

Just as an established literary historian, when facts are rare, strives to supplement them with cautious assumptions and legitimate inductions of a wise criticism, so too does the man who follows a certain model of inspiration must borrow from him those subtle traits that only show up in time, and which will supplement his lack of experience.

Such a model of inspiration incorporates everything in one, everything that is best within you, everything you accumulate at a certain level of thinking.

Leadership: Can you establish the priority of running a program of the type "I find myself in a past-future story", in order to create a unique originality in the midst of all banal imitations revolving around your personality?

The program of the type "I find myself in a moment of alternate past-future story" addresses especially to the minds that give their thinking the depth of the experience of centuries, borrowing the essence of their traits to those that are deprived of them. Even through the memories left behind by them, through their experiences and stories, the essence always has something to say.

On the other hand, imitation is a form of sincere appreciation of someone, but which doesn't show the tendency of progress, doesn't show the tendency of placing yourself higher than that initial model or even of aligning yourself to its essence. The only trivial imitation that can be done around a striking personality, very educated and so well anchored in the chosen culture sphere, is that form of flattery attributed to the well-trained professional artist, but who is never seduced by the variant of a new reality.

Imitation is a superficial form of evaluation of an individual, not taking into account those discrete portions from his existence that frames his greatness. It highlights its ideas, but not their benefits. Imitation re-highlights man's past, without linking to it those feelings you cherish.

Leadership is the history of your presence in a certain place, in a certain time, in a certain environment, when life began to seem to you a discovery of a hard, fantastic, difficult to manage reality that you had to manage that you had to assume on your own and overcome it through penetrating intelligence.

The Elite of Evolved Minds includes all of those individuals who identify with the old pioneers, having the same worldly impact, functioning in the same style of thinking and action – as a tribute to the phenomenon of resonance, but also as a launching pad towards other unexplored corners of the world.

The Emergency Procedure

On April 23, 2010

Maximize Your level of self-acceptance and motivation in playing a key role through what makes you suffer if you do not live up to your role.

As a medical practitioner, a profession which requires many obligations and a high level of training, you can never be certain what the future holds for you. Many problems can suddenly appear, making you go beyond your standard thinking, to adapt to very different and complex situations. And to think like a man of action who, with the whole ardor of his heart, with a particular enthusiasm, but also relying on his intuition and profound knowledge, hurries to fulfill his appointed objectives.

As a general practitioner, you must be certain that your abilities, your attitude, will, ability of quick reaction, wit spirit towards yourself and others will be put to the test in very tricky situations, in truly extraordinary circumstances.

Leadership: Does the way in which you serve a goal of unity between consciousness and commitment to social responsibility, come to demonstrate the greatness that you are experiencing by cultivating the feeling of guilt?

Let's take the example of a poolside, where there are several swimming pools for kids and adults. You're one of the three doctors from the Emergency Health Service (which, obviously, must fulfill working conditions), within the Ambulance Service. You mustn't always be alert at the activity within the swimming pools, because this comes within the purview of the lifeguards, but it's imperative for you to act when accidents happen. Toy must be a responsible person, capable to make quick and firm decisions.

And let's suppose that, one day, when your other two work fellows are out for lunch, you're notified that something terrible happened at the last swimming pool. While you're quickly moving towards the appointed place, you hear screams and you notice there is a livid and lifeless child lying on the sand and everybody stares at him and does nothing. You immediately arrive at the place of the accident. What do you do next?

The greatness you experience by cultivating your feeling of guilt can be seen in the way you react when you are accused of certain things or deeds: you feel your soul shatter from what happened but consider with all your being that you have done everything you could do to correct the situation.

Indeed, it would be normal for you to intervene with cardiopulmonary resuscitation procedures, and only afterwards to examine the causes that lead to the induction of the tragedy. The causes can be multiple: cardiac arrest, hypoglycemia, spasmophilia, stroke, etc. But it would be a terrible mistake which can cost the life of the patient for you not to quickly intervene with cardiopulmonary resuscitation procedures and to lose precious time with your doubts. First of all, you must intervene and do your best, with temerity and a lot of attention, and you must understand that the life of the patient is in your hands. But, and this is where I wanted to get at, the most important thing is for you to respect the specific procedure set up for these cases.

Your ability as a doctor can be proved only in such cases, when a critical accident takes place and you have to intervene. You try in vain to cure a patient if you don't know and observe the procedure you have to follow in case of an emergency, and if you don't display a lot of alertness, intelligence and audacity.

When you know the procedure, you do what you have to do in such a critical circumstance. As for the patient's fortune, it lies in your own hands.

Leadership: Do you follow your own story that conquers everyone's hearts in an episode of "The Power of Destiny" that astonishes the intensity of your feelings towards the person you have chosen a different path for?

It is critical that every medical unit clearly specifies the procedure in case of receiving medical emergencies, so that the doctors can promptly step in and immediately take the appropriate measures. First of all, the emergency procedure involves the therapy needed to support vital functions (respiratory, circulation, neuro-vegetative tonus, nervous system activities, excretion, etc). Subsequently, after the vital functions of the patient have been stabilized, investigations can be requested in order to orient the doctor to a diagnosis and etiological therapy.

Introduction and compliance to an emergency procedure in medical units. When the doctor on duty receives a medical emergency, such as a patient with cardiac arrest, he must previously know the respective specific emergency procedure in order to apply it. What would be imperative: for the doctor to take a specimen for the test or to apply the measures necessary for the patient to get back his cardiac function?

And so I take the liberty to ask another question: the doctor should act on his own account or he should call for other doctors' help? The responses to these questions must be included into the emergency procedure that any hospital should set up for itself. And I find it important to mention the fact that any emergency procedure first of all needs to have defined the term of medical emergency.

Leadership: Does your desire to be necessary in a key situation outweigh the consequences of your willingness to accept taking an important role from the perspective of what you are willing to lose in case of failure?

Once the emergency procedure is set up, it must absolutely be known by all the doctors on duty. In case of failure, if the patient dies, by considering every situation apart, the causes which brought down this unhappy ending, causes which can depend on the patient, the doctor or the flaws of the procedure itself can be concluded. And the analysis is indispensable in order to constantly improve the medical activity.

In leadership a logical sequence of activities and actions must exist, according to the importance of their effects. There is a gradual importance of the actions you must undertake, you cannot act only by following your instinct and relying upon the confidence in yourself. You must follow a certain regulation, you cannot go your own way and do what you think it's best. And, above all, as a leader, you must have prodigious organizational skills, a well-aimed decisional ability, in order to achieve the intended effects.

To be responsible for someone's fate is like relishing a much too cold ice-cream: you do not have to take responsibility yourself in the event of health problems, but you have to be able to endure the cause and intensity of the pain that will affect your entire life.

P.S. When confronted with a critical situation, you don't have the time to think and ask yourself: "What do I do now?", but you must establish your priorities, as well as the logical sequence of the activities indispensable for removing this unwanted situation. Indeed, written procedures are recommended in critical situations.

The Empirical Part Of Knowledge

Try to achieve a delimitation of the "unwritten" norms of the use of technology, extending the notion of "credible" to past events that have a meaning beyond their act of adoption.

Yesterday I was looking for some applications like "mp3 Cutter". Of course, I looked it up on GooglePlay first. And while testing different applications, I remember accessing a free trial application with ads. And at one point there was an advertisement on some electronic circuits, an interesting way of promotion, but without any connection with music. And, because I used to be passionate about the field, I clicked. Nothing happened, it was a blind page. The application abruptly closed.

And that's how I got to the story on Facebook with a Romanian song, with a Balkan rhythm, where the artist gave to the whole world his immeasurable "talent". I just noticed that it popped up in my story feed. I deleted the post immediately, even though it was too late. People had already seen what I had in the story. Indeed, it would be very reassuring to listen to a Balkan song, if you were to like the genre... But I prefer a Haddaway.

And here's what I want to say, to better put it:

The distinction between what is seen and what is credible is made according to two main criteria: the source of information and the way the brain processes information – moving from one idea to another instead of thinking linearly.

No, you are not fooled by technology, but you must be prepared to know it even when it has a minor role in your life. This is a lesson the past has taught me countless times.

Leadership: What happened to you unexpectedly is what you will be able to use in terms of knowledge, so that you know how to approach the things that happen to you from a different perspective?

Really. I don't know how a meaningless, rhythmless song came to be in my story feed, just because I clicked on an advertisement. This is what it means to have your phone driven by technology, while you're still unaware of the danger behind said technology. Maybe Facebook doesn't know how many "miracles" can be done with its help, without i9t realizing, without being able to prevent certain outside influences.

In this context, it is not necessary to follow the normal landmarks of the Internet, meaning the landmarks of a change that keeps the background of the old rules of normalcy. But I have to pay attention to the clever, unwritten rules that are generally valid when it comes to evaluating and testing an information system, and which are still legislated. And my few landmarks, but each of enormous weight, will always be tolerance, reason, morality and conscience.

However, that feeling of superiority is probably maintained even when you are fooled by technology. In fact, many people who are fooled by technology are becoming more and more confident in their technological capabilities, hoping that they, in turn, can use any "trick" for the benefit of science that they must learn more and more – the way it can do certain hard to accept things.

I say all this because it is not the first time that technology takes precedence over the knowledge I have, but each time I have tried to learn the mechanism behind the technology and use it to gain a better understanding of the stages of the evolution of the method of scientific knowledge.

The superiority of the man who embraces science lies in the fact that what he is entitled to approve or reject at the level of novelty includes his previous experience in managing challenges such as "keep only those things that carry meaning beyond their sheer enactment".

The Empirical Part Of Knowledge refers to the actual activity of research and manipulation of information (which can be extracted from various web tools) so that for the adoption of decisions related to measuring personal performance to be considered only significant data of the process coordinated and led by the ability to resist disappointment.

This is what a man who loves technology thinks, even when he has been fooled by it: "What has happened to me without my expecting it is what I will be able to use at a level of knowledge, in order to know how to approach things that happen to me from a different perspective."

The Endless Story Of An Artist In An Astral Projection

Try to think of a pure aesthetic of personal experience, transforming yourself through a visual message into a universal consciousness.

I feel dragged by the flow of a high energy hidden in a dream of possible eternity, a world completely different from the world of mortals, and I cannot do anything to make time stand still for too long. The most valuable thing I have at hand is the end of a lifetime, or something close to it, caused by the plastic creation of an image that is meant to be able to incorporate and conjugate universal matter with memory and self-consciousness.

It is a certain end, a means to relate to the horizon of time as a temporal suspension of divine laws, the basis of the work of a mysterious universe that does not allow the luxury of letting mortals have full understanding of it.

Eternity is the re-living of life from other hypostases. The gods have decided to rewrite the plot of my story with other illustrations and other destinations, as in a literary fiction masterpiece, beyond the dimension of a nostalgic assumption. Beyond the momentum of the feelings of finesse, the unexpected thrill and the passing beauty experienced by an artist who thinks tall and feels profound.

Most actions and reactions, led by the primordial element called "feeling", far above reason, could have caused a crack in the monolithic structure of the narrative that always appears to me at another age. There has been no change in the rationale of the universe.

The great chance to understand the universe can be achieved by putting in writing a fantastic world by my temporary fitting in the uninterrupted imagination of a real world. Of course, this is all an illusion, an acceptance of the challenge to be part of a unique experiment, to tour the labyrinth of an extended dream that puts you ahead of a sublime expressiveness.

Leadership: Can you be a creation eased by a spiritual alibi that emerges from the impact with an ephemeral existence, opened to the time of providing a customization of image that takes the form of a determination of fate?

The year 1567. The moon could barely be glimpsed, as through a fog. The room was filled with a penetrating oil smell. Titian s painting was supposed to perform a reversal of the words in the picture. Self-Portrait seemed imagined from the words "old age full of dignity". The presence of the brush was the element that gave legitimacy to its status as the fundamental landmark of painting without artificiality.

What makes a painting a true poetry is the very angelic image of a man passed though the context of a belief system inaccessible to ordinary mortals, worthy by the revelation of eternal life through the incarnation in temporality.

It would have been truly sad to be in the place of Titian, to touch the perfection of the nostalgia of an impossible world, but I wanted to spend a moment with him only to convey my greetings, the congratulations of the universe. A poetic ingenuity can dominate the act of communication with the spiritual powers of the universe only if the atmosphere and expressiveness of the painting meet the requirements of a literary work.

His imagination was a living tissue that constantly rebuilt itself from every part of the whole called "My World", accidentally decided at the core of the composition, ensuring the dimensions of creation with the subjectivism of a certainty assumed by the use of knowledge coming from another Universe.

With great admiration, I watched him as a privileged example of glory that reflected upon the whole world, so much warmth and emotional sensation was between him and his self-portrait, sincere and closer to my soul than the unhealthy and untold aspirations of the beauties of life.

I looked not only at Self-Portrait, but also at the sketches and ruptures of previous attempts. There was such bitterness in them, disgusted with the inability to achieve perfection. The subject was well embedded in the formula of a poetic prose experienced only in the first person, yet seemed to reveal the meaning of an art open to interpretation.

The destiny of the artist, immortalized by the means of art in strenuous colors, in a space filled with historical and emotional load, seemed to be a predestination to salvation, not to perdition.

Leadership: Can you think of yourself as a double of yourself by emphasizing the effect of multiplying the self-image in a time and space appropriate to the preferences of thinking of a pure aesthetic?

With great joy, I gave him my opinion about the moralizing interpretation translated by the visual of a static viewer. I had no way of knowing what decisive effect my small intervention in his space of reflection would have. The visual certainty themed by him contained a state of immense satisfaction, as when you accept your advanced age and allow yourself to render the charisma of an existence that results in a particular prestige in the face of the ineluctable forces of time.

Titian was surprised by my point of view, all the more so as I realized he perceived me as a loosening of an enigma he had not been able to solve in his time. An unknown in the great equation of a freedom of expression that takes into account holy unwritten rules and which was offered as a privilege to the sacrifice to consider old age only chronologically as an empty variable.

Old age, in the midst of sadness, is a rarity of great value, having its charm springing out of the vitality of a faith-conditioned art from the stinging heat of an ageless story traversed by the explosive force of the profound nuances of black and rich brown. From this we conclude that it is not enough to imagine art only as a model of an exemplary man, but it is more important to go through the great adventure of releasing the individual from the context that is burdening him.

Thinking up a pure aesthetic means to transform yourself with colors, shapes and the relationships between them, so through visual message, a story, a dream, a universal consciousness.

Leadership: Can you change the intense impression of an episode already experienced in terms of a "contributing effect" without being forced by certain deadlines to be stopped in your tracks in an existential pattern that means only survival?

The face of his portrait, illuminated by pale colors, radiates a certain inner warmth with the challenges of the teachings of life, forming the harmony of the soul of an artist who has achieved the purpose of his endeavors. But there is still a certain rigor in his apparent gentleness that seems to indicate a certain priority in the use of time, a certain inclination to compromise, to loneliness, to the dark colors of life.

His words, remaining in history, will save him from any appearances: "It is not bright colors but good drawing that makes figures beautiful."

I asked for a moment lasting as a dream, and the universe gave me an eternity. With a contributory effect, I entered a world that revealed its secrets to immortality as I advanced into the game of suggestions of reality framed in a painting that carries its viewers through the labyrinths of a mind free of the "sin" of exclusive entertainment.

Far from regret, I understood and admired the splendor of the art of a perfect man. It is the calm before death, provided in terms of reference to a boundless universe.

The Triumph of Leadership is the praise of a remarkable personality that lasts only a moment, but remains forever.

The Endless Story Of An Artist In An Astral Projection captures the artist's peaceful silence that has overcome the passage of time through the measure of a space traversed from depth to grandeur.

Before leaving his studio, Titian told me something that will go down in history: "Painting done under pressure by artists without the necessary talent can only give rise to formlessness, as painting is a profession that requires peace of mind."

The Enigma Of A Destiny That Repeats Itself In Another Version

Learn to look at things of the present time by embracing with a clearer and more ready look the wide view that a certain distance opens for the eye.

The image of the rose in the forefront of characterizing a controversial character arose from an artistic need. It was an attempt to defy the reality overlaid with the symbols of the daily that the short history of my life began to become the expression of the composition of a work whose spectacular equation could have summed up the formation of an aesthetic ideal, such as "mimesis", the imitation of nature.

The deepest need to make art occasionally serves the service of a worthy model of worship. It was a strong desire I had for a long time, a great way of cultivating a cult language, full of images and color, a sort of next level in the dynamic reports between the author and the receiver, which the aesthetically relevant elements in a dipinto soprattutto enigmatico were at the disposal of time, forever.

In relation to nature, the character I imagined through the feeling of amazement, as in front of a picture exhibited in an international art exhibition, seemed to sneak away from the secrets of a well-grounded land, a mixture of reality and illusion, passable and eternal.

The experience of endearing an alterity is part of the magical world of the rose, just as the mirror imagined by writer Almeida Faria gives the Portuguese king Dom Sebastiao a portrait opposite to the one that was already imagined by historians, but connected to a repeating destiny. As for me, whenever I am in the presence of the rose, the creation of nature that pushes the artistic initiative to the idea of formulating an expression of the perfection of the spirit, I feel like caught in the dream world of a Borges character composed of two twisted images of the same history, between Martin Fierro and Tadeo Isidoro Cruz.

Leadership: Does the creation that elevates you above the self possess a narrative thread and identity that is discovered as the sources of inspiration of an author who always reveals another face are assimilated?

When you try to paint a picture from scattered words, through comparisons and metaphors that send to other worlds and other realities, it often happens that you recognize in yourself the testimonies of an enigmatic influence of other times, as if in another life you were someone else, more worthy to remember. Thus, in order to understand the nature of the rose, it must be based on the psychology of other characters and other authors, such as Daniel Quinn, and continued with the profound ego of his author, Paul Auster, who questioned the experience of living by resemblance, through space-time contiguity:

"For whatever is seen or said, even the most vague, the most trivial thing may be related to the unfolding of a storyline in which you are captured by the greatness of facts, decorations and experiences that have the splendor of pages from 1001 nights, but organized in a pattern known to the readers of detective novels."

Okay, but why is it important to reveal another face to another character, if the same thinking and the same being is in the middle? Probably for the same reason that roses bloom more than once in the same summer, they change their nuances, they often lose their buds, but they do not lose their qualities, beauty and supremacy among the other flowers, and they do not diminish their manifestation of will, to perpetuate through adaptation.

Therefore, the creative test I propose this time consists in reproducing a character that faithfully corresponds to the reference provided by a reality that penetrates the reader's soul as a comparison between what you see to someone else or something and what you expect from yourself to get through a revealing experience that will make you acquainted with a new You.

The creation that raises above your self resembles the opportunity to find yourself in a literary description when you indulge in a series of different hypostases, of which only one is used as an occasion to reflect everything in the nature of your personality.

Thus, the rose is the object of personal epoch reminders that arose from a small dose of naivety to dream with eyes wide opened of the world experienced and told by a character who is mistaken with his author. Memories of another reality, another place and time, the possibility of returning to a previous version of existence, are saving refuge in the face of the danger of losing yourself in your own image when you decided to join an experience transformation induced by an emotional state or a subjective attitude.

If I were to enclose the significance of the rose in a general picture, being helped by that inclination of a painter who highlights the character portraited by projecting him in a uniform monochrome background, I would probably be able to portray the outline of a person who lives simultaneously with a double identity: one that wants to be separate and unique in relation to the others, and one that is woven by rediscovering the mysteries of a labyrinth in the "palaces of the word".

It is not the time to pass your spirit and thought through the effort of symbolic treatment of the reasons to turn the rose into the key character of my life as a special sign of the effort to build an imaginary reality. What I want to convey to you, leading to the plasticity of the idea of interactivity in artistic creation, is that the only way to illustrate the image of an immutable identity is to find yourself in a reality that rarely lets you lose from memory where you are and who you are, in a description worthy of an epic of the spirit of a writer who does not stop the narrative thread and does not conflict with it.

A writer's self, described by the symbol of the rose, must be regarded as a story whose authenticity can be proved by several protagonists, each of whom committed to writing their part of experience to an odyssey of spirit and wisdom in seeking and learning of their own purpose in the world.

In this context, here is the role of the rose: to highlight the existence of an artist who knows how to exceptionally express a creative and suggestive mood and make it singular in the way that Daniel Quinn reserves the right to conceal his assumed condition of an exceptional writer under the appearance of a mysterious character that jumps from one role to another, in other times, other voices and other echoes. At some point he confessed his confused thoughts:

"Of course, I have for a long time stopped thinking of myself as a real being. If I still live in the world, I only do it from a certain distance through an imaginary person. The very nature of my books implies this."

Although Quinn had allowed himself to disappear between the boundaries of a strange and hermetic life, his character (Max Work) continued to live in the world of others, and the more Quinn appeared to dissolve, the more persistent became Work's presence in that world.

The rose, viewed from the perspective of a well-hidden secret, adds to the play of my words the meaning of putting you in the place of someone living through oneself, through spirit, by image and symbol, an existence always in a ciclo continuo, made up of two turned images of the same reality.

It is the symbol of a part of my soul that always reaches someone who resembles me, but it can also be the symbol of many individuals who manifest themselves as one, as Don Quixote, who was destined for the great dangers and deeds to revive the knights of "the Round Table".

Leadership must be recognized by man's ability to perpetuate himself by multiplication just as from a single high stem of a rose always flourishes other buds, each with its own elegance and nuances.

But this multiplication is not to be conceived in just any way, but in the form of an original model of existence and growth, subtracted by unwavering spiritual principles. This model is also to be provided with a number of features designed to make it to perpetuate the image that everything that is thriving is based on a memory capable of constantly updating significant moments of human time.

The Enigma Of A Destiny That Repeats Itself In Another Version captures the area of manifestation of alterity that cultivates the idea of fulfilling the individual in his relationship with someone else, equally passionate about art, but from other times and other places. The true enigma of human durability and value can be elucidated only by looking back into the past, to the experiences and achievements of artists who have subjectively perceived the important events of their lives.

Last but not least, I think my rose is attributed to Alexandru Vlahuță's statement regarding the painter Nicolae Grigorescu:

"What was for the other world, what news he said to universal art and how he said them, and because he said it in a different way than others – this will be fully explained by those who, looking back, to the things of our time, will be able to embrace a clearer look, in any case more prepared, the wide view that a certain distance opens for the eye."

The Equal Reins Of The Two Stallions

Try to assimilate a thought that can be applied in the transformation experience of the "whole", by going the reverse way of natural creation.

An authentic artist, Sergei Eisenstein, however, throws himself into the subject's experience, trying to acquire it, to go the reverse way of natural creation. He approaches the subject with effort, but with the sincerity of the artist, with artistic probity, that is. He accepts the situation and seeks to cope with it. We are witnessing insane torment; we know the usual way of his creation. Now, things are the other way around: "the enunciation of the imperative has preceded the natural development of the scene, usually routinely initiated by the inner necessity, the inner impulse which, avoiding the formula, immediately tends to the ready-made imaging form."

The usual method of creation must therefore be abandoned. Hence that extreme difficulty, unique to his creation so far. The solution? You have to feel it out, to try it (the way tailors do) to play this gamble of supply and demand that you gain by yourself when you keep the equal weight of the two stallions – logical thinking and imagination – that you allow to sprint together towards the same common goal: the proper figurative representation of the whole. *****

Leadership: Can you get out of the monotony of imperfection by developing the ability to communicate a certain philosophy of thinking?

The backwards road of creation, according to the professional skills of a director, annihilates the feeling of his own insufficiency, of impotence, and limitation, paving the way for the acquisition of a higher virtue: that of giving meaning to an "intelligence capable of learning from experience".

The one born with predispositions for art, to be able to perceive a new sensation of clarity and motivation, calls out to the figurative representation of reality, predicting the expression of the essence of things, of the dynamism of form, thus uniting the sensible with the spiritual.

More precisely, the reverse way of creation designates the process of building a new philosophy placed in the midst of art's evolution, from which progressively transpire reflexivity and perfection, being regarded as a source of inspiration in discovering new patterns of thought. It refers to the artist's role of escaping the monotony of imperfection which is a state of waiting, a sort of stopping in an area in which imagination tires and reality loses its outlines more and more, becoming evanescent, confusing.

Leadership: Do you follow the usual way of creation by assigning a new formula to its previous existence?

The ability to communicate through art a certain philosophy of thought through originality, depth, but also through a certain emotional load cannot lead to the neglect of what we know by common methods of creation. But, compared to other forms of art practice that leaves no freedom of expression and improvisation, it brings changes to the skillful means of articulating the power of seeing the perfect in the imperfect, which is not based on either the senses or the reason, but rather exclusively on logic and imagination.

A kind of prolongation of the state of mind that leads to the testing of the requirements of style, quality and tendencies, without neglecting the specific object of crafty knowledge that implies convincing the excellence that in order to really get value from what you create, a certain autonomy is required, even if relative, of a certain finesse in representing the model of thought.

For a harmonious blending between the knowledge, interpretation and presentation of art in a more comprehensible but also compelling form, for a varied audience in which natural and realism combines in a universe of very rich imagination, is still based on a sense of logic and of preparation.

To follow the typical path of creation by assigning a new formula to its former existence is to move away from the point where you can no longer provide a major value by fixing your personal footprint in the memory of the world. Thus, we are dealing with a revival of our own spirit, a primordial criterion in activating a model of art as an unlimited repetition of certain patterns belonging to the past, as a natural continuation of accumulated experience.

Leadership: Are you reluctant to use an "input resistance" of high or low value?

Concerning the connection of art to leadership, focusing only on that more comprehensive concept of logic that contributes to ensuring the objectivity and correctness of the results obtained by the act of creation, we directly support the existence of a reciprocal relationship between two objects: one of thinking, the other of experiences, used concurrently.

But used in such a way that the conclusion drawn by the evaluators, depending on the effect of what can be considered significant and aesthetic, confirms the creator's orientation towards the culture of quality, naturalness in the expression of ideas, perhaps even transparency, but especially towards a culture of innovation and perfection.

"The entry resistance" of high or low input used in leadership in the complex process of renewal of creation corresponds to the form of judging any aspect from the perspective of the science located between rational and imaginary, preventing you from producing an authentic transmission of art, and from the perspective of interiority located beyond the limits of others' understanding, which makes it difficult to transmit your own teachings.

Resistance is a measure of the interaction forces between elements of conception and sense attributed to creation that can occur during the remodeling process of your own thinking, integrating in a stable way in the configuration of a new model of what you want to transmit.

To attribute a thinking to yourself that can be applied in the transformation experience of "the whole" means to dispose not only of a sum of ideas and reference values with which to make comparisons and positions in relation to the self and the world through creation. But it means that they have a practical applicability in real life.

Art is the path from philosophy to creation to the very roots of the phenomenon called "gamble of supply and demand" in the sense of creating an attitude of the spirit that projects its own glow upon the world.

The Equal Reins Of The Two Stallions concern both operations of maintaining the ability to create: logical thinking and imagination.

Leadership is not a projection of the imaginary that stimulates the evolution that the mind of man creates to escape from self-imposed reality. It requires a certain logic in those judgments that generate actions directed to the restoration, maintenance, or development of a certain mentality, of a certain aspect of personality. It gives you some coordinates and guides you to a new experience of self-expression.

The Equation Of Superiority

Learn to control the main elements of the leadership's construction, so that your complex science doesn't trigger fissures in the man's functional structure.

Unfortunately, it's impenetrable, too sophisticated to react to standardized tests. It gives the impression of a rigid thought structure of great dimensions, immobilized in the forked chains of a massive conglomeration of strange elements that discontinuously travel in the abstract reality surrounding them. We would take this man as a dark and mysterious mixture of qualities, but the composition is a cold one made of the material of a merciless judgment, but to which any logic from the field of psychology would give credence.

Dr. Hannibal Lecter reaches high enough levels of human understanding. The highly concentrated and well-oriented energy he absorbs from those around him, from the information he skillfully extracts from their life, is big enough to trigger a Big Bang. Similar to an electric shock, it interrupts their normal performance and evolution rhythm, influencing them and bowing their will on a closed axis that only he can connect and reconnect to.

The chained reactions of this active process of settling chaos in people's minds, through a dissociation of each one's personality dimension, by performing a 180 degrees turn of their capacity to perceive complexity – they present certain particularities based on the structure, model and material each one of them is made from.

Leadership: Is the maximum measure of your competencies based on the experiences of participating in a new stage of enhancing the relevance of the "impenetrable" concept in a context of the complexity of personal identity?

In this entire equation of superiority, the first place is granted to doctor Hannibal Lecter. He controls all the possibilities to calculate and change moves in an order that creates discontinuity between thought and feeling, in the hierarchy of physical and emotional closeness to the human being and their rupture from themselves.

A locomotive mechanic must signal with the locomotive's whistle any time he starts moving the wagons. But Hannibal doesn't give any warning. He manipulates the locomotive of persuasion without telling his companions where he's heading, and he intentionally causes derailments.

Two concurrent forces unite through a delicate connection, then repel by different intentions. On one hand, the man that seems to possess the highest science, who seems to have reached the peak of human knowledge. On the other hand, there's his opposite, the man that possesses the necessary qualities to endow that complex knowledge and reaching the peak. In both cases there are more or less hidden thoughts, motivations and purposes.

The strong contrast between the two concurrent forces shows that it's never too late to see life differently and rediscover yourself. You never find out more about yourself, than when someone gives your life another meaning by means of a set of triggering factors.

Leadership: Can you counteract the negative effects of superiority in the coordinates of a philosophy that strives to advance up to the limits of human reason?

In order to have a more conclusive picture regarding the leadership's expansion possibilities in the future, which means it should be selectable and easily maneuverable as form of adaptation and development, starting from the new leader's realities, with his horizon created by accumulating silence, it is necessary to proceed to a retrial of the relationship between Ego and the limits of human reason. These limits are attained when you no longer distinguish between good and evil, believing that both contribute to the continuing transformations of science, life, and society.

Such a leader, able to possess the highest science, able to exert his control, fueled by the temptation to be unique and to reach the peak of human knowledge, will confront, first of all, himself. Any element used in building and expanding the control territory will be deemed disappointing, similar to a black ball, if he's not perfectly opposable and if he doesn't occasion an ample incursion in the human universe. This incursion can limit the supporters' options and block them in a state of inertia, which makes up the ideal stand for supporting the leader's superiority.

It's hard to say how and by what means the negative effects of "superiority" will be counteracted in the future, or those of the complex science of persuasion related with leadership through objectives, tactics and methods of action. It's certain that no measures, no relation between the two parts: leader-supporters, sometimes criticized by various specialists, won't contribute to diminishing the leader's desire to truly prove his potential and to thank his strong and active Ego.

That is why accomplishing a profile, a psychological portrait that would allow an in depth analysis of the leader's personality becomes useless in these conditions. Because his ego and the relation to "superiority" practically cross paths and combine until they reach an exceptional fusion. A whole, which comprises the absolute value of leadership, adding up, by favorable simplifications, any type of gain. But especially, proportional accomplishment.

Does the strength of your leadership depend on the position of the supporting force of your limits, while you continue to move the shadow of life forwards and backwards?

The shadow of life, encompassing the consequences of your hidden thoughts, can be customized by the talent you manage, unnoticed, to provoke a contradiction between your own perceptions and the signals you receive from others.

Your ego, becoming safer and more thirsty for power and laurels, succumbs to the development of your personality? The leader takes control over all the possibilities to calculate and change the intimidation moves, in an order that creates a discontinuity between thought and feeling, which could have as result a division of the values and ideals of the human being, which could be hard to mend.

We could recognize in the leader, in a friendly, just and realistic attitude, aside the direct echoes of the reality of his limitations and approaches, values and orientations, some indirect echoes. These remind us of the gain funds and opportunities that he could accomplish if he manages to take advantage, in a constructive way, of the involvement of people in common actions, setting your superiority by adopting a set of well defined factors that don't stand in the way of your development and evolution.

If you want to qualify in the final stage of excellence, learn to control the main elements of the leadership's construction so that your complex science doesn't trigger fissures in the man's functional structure.

The position of the supportive force of your limits is given by what you are able to face in terms of consciousness when putting science into the benefit of psychoanalysis and theologies very sensitive to the existentialist dimension.

The Equation of Superiority includes the two types of leaders. A positive one who uses his science, knowledge and actions to bring benefits to everyone, his thoughts being in agreement with his actions. And the other one, who uses his knowledge and methods in order to disorient and create a true chaos in people's minds. If the latter is attentively scrutinized, his hidden thoughts, which serve his Ego and intentions, are discovered.

The Essence Of Leadership

On August 23, 2010

Not everything that is around you can give contour and a bright shade to your leadership.

I will always carry in my soul and in my mind that unique moment that I spent in the company of the master. I carried a great affection for him, as usually reserved for a parent. In turn, the master carried a boundless love for me ever since I was a child.

It was evening. After a frugal dinner, the master has retired in his "sanctuary", the holy shrine – as he liked to name his room of creation. I followed him with a sense of excitement. I knew what was going to happen: a new lesson.

Through his passion, the master painted many paintings – and all reflected his talent, wealth of knowledge, wisdom and experience. It seemed to me that only he could give me the inspiration and creativity I needed in order to become a great artist.

The master turned his attention to one of his paintings, remained unmoved for a moment, admiring it with a special sensitivity, as if he wanted to distinguish something strange, or as if some memories suddenly invaded his mind. A moment of silence followed, while he meditated to put his thoughts in order. I was observing his gestures. He seemed calm, and his eyes were clear. Then, smiling with nostalgia, said to me:

- Nicu, the artist is a man who sees, who forwards his vision. He is able to graft in the minds of others the most compelling images transposed on canvas with such finesse and precision that they seem alive. It is impossible to doubt of them.

Leadership: Do you practice enforcing your own leading part in the intrinsic-extrinsic alternation?

Leadership finds support in that complementary option of the creation process whose parameters correspond to the management requirements of own resources, so that the results would be significantly improved. It also finds meaning in the importance you grant to your own leading part, to your soul, and to your mind, with respect to what is beyond of what could be directly seen or experimented.

What you are trying to achieve is a certainty you can't doubt, a direct manifestation of your own thoughts and inspirations, enhancing the acknowledgement of those sides of you that you neglect, you enhance, or you repress. Parallel sides that you never thought you had, originate at the top of your imaginative thinking, with the gift of modifying some aspects connected to your individual activity in a new context.

Personal and professional evolution achieved as a direct manifestation of a creative individuality, framed by the combinations rational-irrational and objective-subjective, doesn't focus only on the intent of achieving a broader intellectual autonomy, nor does it constitute an extension of a good practice model. Evolution gives estimation for your approach in a changing reality. And this evolution can be seen as a parameter of the function "value" that never loses its intrinsic or extrinsic determinism, becoming more able to extend through constructive particularities.

Practicing the enforcement of your own leading side in the intrinsic-extrinsic alternation means to see what you achieve with the help of self-conscience. It means connecting to the reality beyond you, namely to everything that you perceive through the power of your creative intention related to the divine, a possibility of communicating with the Intellect of the Creation Spirit.

In these circumstances the leader could be considered the result of a hard self-analyze work, of introspection and finding one's self, accompanied by a leap towards the future, towards what it means to be an illuminated man, not only a creator. That is a man that manages to venture outside his own interior dimension, towards a superior reason.

The leader does not "paint"what he sees, but what he thinks

Unlike a great painter, who can reproduce an image that he imprinted in his mind with an extraordinary skill, reproducing so accurately the finest details, a leader, although he resembles an artist in many ways, never reproduces in his "work" what he sees, but, above all, what he thinks. A skilled leader knows that all that glitters is not gold; that not everything which is projected it is also attainable. In leadership, you must think, analyze and assess everything very carefully.

A leader cannot get himself caught of what he sees like a painter, because reality can be quite different, can be changing, and that is why it cannot be expressed or captured in a "painting". If the leader does not form a complex picture of everything around him well-grounded into reality, then he could never propose himself any attainable objectives.

Leadership: Is the integrating vision of contents of reality you access adequate for the image of a whole that you cannot control called "destination"?

Do you capture just the landscape? Leaders have the problem of deformation. They do not exactly reproduce in their plans what they see, they sometimes impovise, because everything can change. However, they neither distort reality; otherwise they overlook what is really important.

I remember the statement once made by the motivational author, Stephen Covey: "A leader is the person who climbs the highest tree, he carefully studies the landscape, and screams at the top of his lungs: "This is not our jungle."

This statement reinforces my point of view. Often, the way you perceive things around you separates success from failure. As a leader, if you do not focus your efforts in the right direction, you will not be able to make any progress; moreover, you will fail in any of your endeavors. For your performances to be better, concentrate on what matters the most, not capturing only the "landscape". Because not everything around you can give contour and a bright shade to your leadership.

Do you focus your visions and efforts towards achieving the proposed goals? To whom is favorable your vision? Do people notice and appreciate your vision? Trying to achieve something without moving in the right direction is like making a painting with a magnificent image, but which will never be sold.

The destination to which a leader usually stops is formed when he begins to see everything only in the present through the perspective of the aesthetic, of the beauty he finds in skilled performances. The same happens when he overlooks an important part of what is happening to him because he is largely stuck in a high level of diversity. Or when immersed in a virtual universe trying to "produce" something that has wide search.

In leadership, the vision that has to reflect the image of reality must not be suggestive and according to the destination set by the evolution of your artistic sensibility.

The essence of leadership is much like the essence of art and a painting which impresses through its used technique, imagination and innovative ideas, accessibility and profitability. The same way and in leadership, beginning from an existent background, the plan, the ways and the means for action must „impress", so that they would be accepted and possible to realize with as low investment as possible, and to ensure maximum benefits.

The Essence Of The Work Of Art

Only if you know how to look at the unseen can you reveal the hidden secrets of reality.

For an artist, painting is not only a form of expression, but also a form of freedom dedicated to the vision thirsty for beauty and depth. I say this while admiring the fairy-tale landscape, full of light and warmth, which prompts me to dream, an act of pure imagination, the most important activity of the mind, as long as it brings into reality useful ideas, popularizing my creation .

The things around me do not mean much if they are not filtered through the ability of the eyes to focus on the retina the delightful image of a palette of varied, vivid and lasting colors that transform a blank canvas into a masterpiece full of life and expression. That white canvas of the sea, the sand and the island on which I am, becomes a real work of art within the painting that I cultivate with great talent and skill, in images drawn from the depths of the brush with the gift of creative work. Process so rare nowadays, continuous and complex process that requires passion and dedication.

And there is no painter in the world who does not pay a price for this vision capable of moving hearts and souls, located on the fragile boundary between observation and invention. This price being conditioned by every second of waiting for the dream moment that, piercing reality like a ray of light, makes every kind of memory blossom, as in a paradise of all freedoms.

Leadership: Can you resize a perceived image in the absence of an artistic process, yet suggestively portray the spirit of a living subject of creative metamorphosis?

I look around. The eyes capture an endless palette of colors, each shade, each pattern, each meaning representing a window into the inner world of the artist who represents me, where feelings and thoughts come to life on a canvas full of evocative force through color and composition, giving birth to a universe vibrant and full of hidden meanings. Even in this case, the merit of painting exactly after nature, putting on the color palette the most enigmatic view of a state of fragility, with which I receive every small change that appears, belongs entirely to the practiced vision that knows how to capture the beauty of the world in -a color palette and turn every moment into a work of art.

I look, but cannot think of that which cannot be known. There is no artistic process here, just a form of feeding my ego through this honest confession.

Obvious. To give my confession a certain meaning, as if it would produce a chain reaction that can change the course of my entire life, now that the eyes succeed in the performance of integrating their gaze into the vast landscape of the outside world, and to idealize a masterful moment as a light step on the foot in a universe of imagination, this is what the act of developing visual perception teaches me springing from the absolute height of a cloudless sky to which I devote my entire attention.

And the present answers me with the voice of a John Fowles hero:

"I look at everything around me, while I think about tomorrow, about the future. And, yes, I can make quite realistic assumptions. Especially about God, because the supreme creator is very intelligent, he is everywhere, no I see it, but how do I know it, because I don't understand it, who it is, or what it's like. So I think God must be very intelligent be much more intelligent than I. He gives me no hints, no certainty, no reasons. In fact, if I were to pray to God, I would never show myself. Let him avoid my gaze. And if he did show himself, I would know that he is not God, but only a liar."

Leadership: How do you evaluate the relevance of your creation if you are represented by an image that roots in your meditative mind the connection with the divine and with your own being?

When an artist gazes at the horizon line, meditatively and spiritually, he often sees himself with the eyes of an unknown but perfect God, who penetrates deep into the mystery of his inner being, revealing the meaning of a stop frame in time: "all that I live is influenced, perceived and fulfilled by an image that provokes the feeling of communion between the known and the unknown".

And art, in this sense, denotes a kind of impersonal construction, because you feel that you are the creator of what transcends reality and reveals beauty beyond words. But in fact, someone else guides your hands when you draw with the brush on the canvas, giving life to a new and unexplored world.

And if I use an image that meditatively merges my presence with the divine dimension, to reveal the essence of the work of art, Atinsphorn Upyserabbas Onyoirtus , the depth of reality obtained by striving for an authentic experience that reveals the will of the hidden Divinities, this happens because in painting I must reveal and bring to light the hidden divinity in every shade and form.

There are often layers of meanings and meanings well hidden beneath the visible surface. Moreover, if both God and the painter are involved in the process of revelation and expression, I ask myself the question: the things around me exist for me to grasp them with my gaze and find new meanings, or in fact my vision embodies the contemplative Self which explores the divine mystery in the colors and forms brought to life through art?

Even if it is not always obvious at first sight, a transcendent manifestation is present in every element pierced by the artistic sphere by a grace, by a voice, by a miracle that has no equal in all Creation. And even if I feel that my brush is guided by something higher, without my will being able to oppose an infinite force, I still manage to reach a real depth in my creation because I connect with my own emotions, experiences and authentic thoughts.

The essence of the work of art must be understood as the identity between the plane of the Ego and that of the mystery in the "substance of creation" from which springs life beyond death. Man lives eternally through the creation that God instilled in his time.

An artist can feel connected to a higher source of creativity only when creating works of art. In this perspective, the artist is not only a creator of art, but becomes a divine, God-like figure through his creation.

The essence of the work of art is related to the connection with the divinity, when the depth of your thoughts and experiences becomes a window to the mystery and sacredness of existence. Or when you become, by grace and virtue, like God whose creations, revealing themselves as transcendent works of art, find their unique place in the harmonious whole of the universe.

And the creative metamorphosis, which I mentioned earlier, refers to a kind of likeness of the artist to God, who confesses his experiences through creation. The artist himself becomes God if he has the potential to touch and express deep and universal truths through his ability to create and express himself. In fact, the artist, by expressing his unique feelings, emotions and vision, transcends his own humanity and attains a level of consciousness and expression that is almost divine.

The Essence Of What Is Seen Beyond The Seen

The focus of the gaze on the distant horizon oscillates between the effort of will and the deterministic vision of triumph, beyond the immediate obstacles.

For a runner, every race becomes a test of initiation into the mysteries of existence, where perseverance guides him to fulfillment, even when the road seems lost. Better said, in the pursuit of performance we become artists of our own destiny, painting the picture of our life with every step we take. And here, the eyes, having nothing to cling to, allow the gaze to peer into the interior of this thrilling, inner and transformative game, so that the race becomes twofold: an exercise in observing reality on a mountain route, not easy, and a transcendent flight into the realm of imagination to each one.

Today, August 4, 2024, I witnessed a "Xenthoria Ulmivent", a fusion between physical reality and spiritual transcendence, at the Teioasa marathon, an experience that will remain engraved in the fiber of my being as a kind of revelation of the truth hidden in the effort . A symbiosis of emotions, perseverance and unexpected surprises accompanied me throughout the whole race, like a composition by Kandinsky, where every element found its place in a game of colors and shapes. Each step of the race painted a new shade on the canvas of personal experience.

Leadership: Does your reaction at the moment of victory reflect inner enlightenment, between seemingly random events and the ecstatic vision of triumph?

As I ran, and I ran like an artist in search of pure inspiration, I felt each step bring me closer to my goal, but the Great Architect of the Universe had some challenges in store for me. At some point, caught in my rhythm, I realized that I had lost my way, straying from the right path, according to a revelation hidden in the effort: "The path to victory is not always linear" . For almost a kilometer, more than I would have imagined, I ran the wrong way, like a modern Odysseus in search of his own Ithaca. In that moment, like a beacon in the night, I heard a voice that became the pivot of my understanding of the race: "Hey, you're going the wrong way!" It was Elena, a mentor of knowledge on the trails, a leading runner, able to get me back on track.

The unexpected surprises of the race reflect the unpredictability of life itself. With my heart beating to the frenetic pace of existence and adrenaline fueling my determination, I got back on track, back with that unwavering determination, thinking that every obstacle is an opportunity for growth. Even though the lost time could have been a millstone, I didn't give in to despair, I didn't get demoralized, no, I didn't try to give up. On the contrary, a mysterious energy, comme une force qui va , propelled me forward with that unbridled passion of an artist whose vision transcends boundaries, beyond any physical obstacle.

Revelations gained through intense effort reshape self-perception. However, the surprise was overwhelming as I began to overtake competitor after competitor, each additional step becoming a victory over self-imposed limitations. Visual clarity intensifies with the deepening of the flow state. In that moment, despite any obstacle, I understood that running is not just a physical competition, but a metaphor for life itself, where every obstacle becomes an opportunity for growth. In this case, the visual perception of colors and shapes in nature is intensified, reminiscent of Kandinsky's art.

Leadership: How do you experience the congruence between intense physical effort, spiritual quest and perception of your own existence, exploring the subtle interconnections between visual experience and the wonder of self-transcendence?

The main character in the novel "The Geographer's Library", written by Jon Fashman, was none other than an anonymous alchemy seeker named Omar Iblis. At night, Omar Iblis trained his memory: he gathered a handful of stones and a handful of dry beans behind the house, stretched his arms in front of him, let the stones and beans fall, stared at them for a while, prepared dinner and , after eating, he drew the pattern made up of the fallen stones and grains.

Both Omar Iblis, in his solitude, conquering chaos by creating patterns, and I, in my exhaustion, conquering the finnish line, shared the same desire to discover an underlying order in the seemingly randomness of life, a meaning capable of transcending chaos everyday and provide a sense of unity and fulfillment. We both seemed to be searching for a connection between our actions and a larger meaning of existence. Of course, the finish line loomed on the horizon like a promise of fulfillment, simultaneously distant and tangible.

The inner and outer gaze merge to create a unifying visual experience. In the final moments of the race, I felt the universe align in perfect synchronicity, like a Dali painting where time and space merge. With one last effort, I crossed the threshold between effort and triumph, and euphoria washed over me like a purifying wave.

Leadership has, in this sense, only one direction to follow: "The inner and the outer look converge in a unifying vision of reality, when the intense experience of the marathon crystallizes the essence of the search for meaning of personal evolution."

The finish line symbolizes reaching a higher understanding of existence. And individual actions gain meaning in the larger context of personal experience of self-transcendence.

The essence of what is seen beyond the seen captures the patterns of perfection hidden in effort and movement. And if I became Omar Iblis, it is because I discovered in running that personal alchemy that transforms physical effort into spiritual wisdom and artistic experience

Like Omar, who found order in the random patterns of stones and grains, I found meaning in the rhythm of my steps and the ever-changing landscape of the race. This experience has become my own "Geographer's Library", an inner map of self-discovery and transcendence, drawn on the sinuous curve of life, where every kilometer traveled is a new page in the story of my personal evolution.

And, indeed, the artist in me came to life in the midst of physical effort. After all, I am an artist because I managed to turn the experience of running into a living canvas of existence, where each step became a brushstroke on the canvas of my life.

The Evolutionary Path Of An Artist’s Soul

Get involved in the very substance of your creation as a sign of a fierce struggle to assert those values of existence that turn you into a sensational talent.

The man who leaves the blacksmith's trade in order to get into the guild of talented artists, working with the brush, is the restricted version of an astral treatise called "meeting with destiny".

I believe that this is the essence of the life of the one who had a longer dialogue with the universe, even before he became the shine of a star. Perhaps, however, this is also the message of the book "The Book of Painters" by Mander, from which I printed this short fragment:

Quinten Matsijs, painter from Antwerp, says:

Leadership: Have you learned to consider a creation that does not cease to renew its perspective of development through the composition of an ordinary image in time to look at what exists beyond it?

This explanation of Quinten's art, or the moment of the passing of an ordinary worker to the exercise of a distinguished profession, by the fact that it is worthy of a man to rise above his condition, makes art exert a beneficial influence on the importance the artist's devotion must have to that reminder of his beginnings. Supported by the memory of his past, so well reflected in the substance of his creation, the artist must rise above the social conventions of the century in which he lives, above his humble condition, to win the devotion of an art dedicated to human dignity under all its facets.

A man devoted first and foremost to art, in the same mind, enhances me by the possibility of his passing from one environment to another, or from one status to another, finds his inspiration piece not in his profession, but in the heart of his art, which is nothing more than a strong desire to discover the importance of aesthetics in the beauty of another person, spiritually identical to him.

You may be wondering, where does this idyll full of candor and beauty begin to evolve slowly, in proportion to its adaptation to a new world that opens its doors to art?

It starts from his inclination towards art and his aesthetic sense, basically, starting from an analysis of how he relates to the beauty of the being to whom he can entrust the mysteries of his soul, for preservation. Thus, the artist's talent is not just justified in the power to overcome his humble condition, because many have experienced the same kind of situation and have failed to change, but in the strong desire to please the heart that radiates beauty.

Leadership, from the perspective of the human being from one condition to another, is the example of a life freed from the pain of her past, insofar as life acquires the meaning of a creation that never ceases to amaze.

In this regard, let's not forget what Adriana Ivonne Marinescu said: "The image of a creation takes the form of the leader, the nation, the unity and the ideal order, usually put under the protection of Providence."

The Evolutionary Path Of An Artist's Soul opens in front of the man who knows how to turn his condition into a launching ramp to the peaks of art, to the fusion of aesthetics and values, through the prism of the price needed to be paid: abandoning old beliefs, old activities, old customs, towards a great ideal.

The ideal of identifying with the ideal profile of another person who can complement your personality.

The Exhausting Odyssey Of The Man Who Hastens His Transformation

On December 22, 2012

Keep your strong position towards "the claims" of your own transformation without diverting your attention from its effects.

A sort of serious and almost alienating severity seized me at certain times, and it was unusually frustrating to come to terms with the idea that it will always be the same. Was I following to be punished by my own pain, so open and intense, always directed toward other searches?

What a horror ! Darkness, then the sudden flash of an artificial light in the place where I asked myself all sorts of questions, was significantly hindering my vision towards my own being. Sometimes I thought that if I loaded myself with innumerable forms of thinking, with which my life intersected all my beliefs, endeavors and values, at least in the appearance I had to respond to the lamentations and repeated requests to formulate an individual view of any situation in which I was involved, I will be able to define a new direction for action.

I was pleading in favor of the existence of an absolute separation, the forced transition from one medium form of knowledge into another, much superior, marking the final stage of my maturation that occurred subtly, almost without realizing it. I was involved in a continuous learning activity and acquirement of the most advanced and efficient features, mechanisms of knowledge. Fine adjustments, but complicated, imposed by the changes that occurred in my own being.

As a vehicle able to increase for five, for ten times the speed known and accepted by science, I was hoping to reach instantly the desired destination, where everything was accelerating as long as I pressed the clutch pedal of my own transformation, through the controlled development of the science that I acquired for myself.

There where the questions without answer ceased to repeat endlessly. In their place, coming out those grand ideas that do not rust in the dust of time. But which, as the waves of during and after the storm, were crashing angry by the unclear side of my being, causing even more confusion.

Leadership: Is your position on the complex reality of life that of the observer who sees from a great distance the detail of the differentiating piece meant to indicate a new direction of knowledge?

An observer, who would be studied me carefully, would be seen unhooking from me, beyond this limit of unauthorized knowledge that diligently was trying me, of the thinking that was supposed to remain anchored in reality – the invincible tendency towards perfection. My pad towards success, the strong need to be more than a simple man, more than an odd numbers of destiny.

To become free, powerful, as a testimony over time, worthy to take part among the great illustrious in the alchemy, such as Bötger, Philaletes, Trevisan and Paracelsus.

But for that I have to activate that*modus operandi*, to move to a different medium, to risk immersing into another reality, through a review of the consequences and effects caused by my transformation. Without knowing that alchemy is not a cryptography for deciphering, but a gift from God, an infinitely complex thing which is not limited to learning, but to transform what you have acquired through learning.

It was evident, indeed, that I could not sit idly by trying by all means, to ensure my uplifting transformation. I had to maintain my strong position towards "the claims" of my own transformation. To see the fire of limitation extinguishing so quickly, and the success replacing it, without any denial. Probably, the only differentiating piece that could indicate a new direction of my knowledge, so that I would give a positively highlighted meaning to life was the tendency to position myself, generally, at a level far superior to what was happening around me.

Leadership: Do you ensure your personal transformation of life from the angle of what is lost through depth, or from the perspective of what develops through generalization?

Leadership development involves transformation, une renaissance dans la vérité, being a spontaneous process, but also controlled of those components that help you reach maturity, and avoid critical situations. But this transformation process can pull you down like a wreck at the bottom of the ocean, if you do not understand its meaning, if you do not dedicate yourself with the devotion of your own "awakening".

Just as in chess, the knight can jump two squares at once, and even in two opposite directions, but cannot move forward twice at the same time, so defeating any limits, any automatisms of thinking that are not favorable to you, or that do not go anywhere, inhibiting or blocking your development, may create a "two-step jump" over the cap.

But this leap towards the great performance cannot occur more than once, vital and decisive. For the man who does not rely on both wings of his transformation, could never fly towards new destinations, in the best case he will arrive late in the place where the desire to be someone else will not favor him anymore.

This development that can accelerate or paralyze your transformation can be seen as a return to your own identity, meaning to finally find yourself. It is a possibility of receiving situations that do not meet your expectations, or that are not fully understood, in order not to complicate your mechanisms and complexities of your new becoming.

To look at life from the angle of what is lost through depth means to forget about what presses and troubles you, connected to everything around you, and to return to what you left behind before the change took place. On the other hand, looking at life from the perspective of what develops through generalization means seeing a single negative event as an endless model of success. Can you?

Transformation in leadership is accomplished under the sign of intellect, consciousness and personal values resulting from the interaction with the whole that you cannot change but can capture its meanings knowing that they can sometimes be lost, unable to fully reach anyone.

The Exhausting Odyssey Of The Man Who Hastens His Transformation highlights the lack of human capacity to manage voluntarily his resources and actions into a useful direction, bringing coherence to his existence, and at the same time, excellence in leadership.

Are you developing in a controlled way the science that you assimilate? Are your efforts to hasten your transformation always directed towards other searches? What are the questions that you face during your transformation? Do they cause more confusion? Do you keep your thinking anchored into reality? Are you dealing with the idea that it will always be the same?

Keep your strong position towards "the claims" of your own transformation without diverting your attention from its effects.

The Experience Of The Divine Mystery

On February 19, 2012

The fight with the inner adversary that shackles you all your life becomes the goal of the creation that keeps the imprint of its owner over time and periods.

Any decent child, Serghei Eisenstein paradoxically remarked, destroys objects, opens the bellies of dolls or dismantles watches to see what is inside them. Unlike these "good" kids, I was a bad kid, precisely because I didn't do any of this. This is probably why I had to become a director.

And that's because the so-called good children exhaust their insatiable curiosity, primitive cruelty and aggressive assertion during that period. Unconsummated then, these tendencies erupt later. In place of the dismantled clock appears the passion for researching the mechanism of creation, the destruction of objects is replaced by irreverence for authority.

The question then arose: "How am I inferior to others?" And the unconfessed assertion: "not everything is done by the gods". But this rebellion that gave rise to the need to assert oneself did not come together with youth. It accompanied him all his life. It is not surprising that, once he became a director, the entire period of creation of the film "Ivan" is a period of struggle, more precisely "the fight with the ghost", as he himself testified, the struggle to free himself from a phenomenon that once aroused him, springing from an outside force. The fight with the inner adversary that shackles Eisenstein all his life often becomes the goal of creation, born from personal inner calculation.

Leadership: Can you function in the relative form of creation that you experience in the "hiddenness" of a world that depicts vicarious reality, by capturing the non-material essence of a perfect creator?

The divine essential is the result of the fight with the "ghost", symbolizing the extent of a conflict we have with ourselves in the field of a science that seeks the essence of man, and the way we deal with it. It is man's struggle against nature that becomes a symbol of knowledge, a metaphysical symbol. In other words, the essential divine is the force outside you that you must submit to your own control, under the guidance of a Rayahuas Esqueryo Usharphys, assumption of creation in your own divine being, in no case mixing with the particular elements of a destiny perceived as insignificant.

Envied by many, Eisenstein was trying to penetrate the secrets of a science that pursues truth and justice, that is, a science that, taking shape especially towards the end of the century that has just ended, still has a lot to say for the understanding of the complex world that surrounds us. Being a director does not only mean discovering life and putting it on the screen, but must be relevant in inventing new artistic currents, causing a reaction of determinism among people and the society we live in, a reaction of revolt against the formalism of commercial shows.

The divine essential is the inner fulfillment due to an act of shaping an archetypal, magical consciousness that "wakes up from the sleep of death." Undoubtedly, man's influence on the world arises from the contact of a receiver of messages from the unknown dimensions of the Universe – with that sublime action of controlling matter, a fact that does not contradict the views of a creator whose divine nature is suggested by the noun "magician".

At the visible end of the decision process is the triple seal of a magician who, achieving the impossible, suddenly sees himself doubled by the consequence of a causal chain of which he was predestined to be a part.

The non-material essence of a perfect creator is the reflection of one's own life experience in a vision that firmly dominates the whole. Traversing the presence-absence of the all-encompassing performance space of being authentic in whatever role you tackle. With certainty, the life story of the director Eisenstein, becoming a testimony of the achievement of a Promethean activity, corresponding to unexpected objectives, had to pass the temporary barricade of a superficial society to meet the basis of a lasting victory.

Of course, the creation you experience in the "hiddenness" of a world that depicts indirect reality depends on the circumstances in which chance intervened to hide the refusal of causes, a fact that allows you to have your own autonomy. Where you've never had any inclinations, that's exactly where your talent might be hiding. Your weakness could be your strength, which in Eisenstein's case proved to be the job of the magician from which the bunny emerges.

And let's not forget one thing. The one who performs miracles is the magician who aspires to the highest perfection in a certain science. And this magician, symbolizing enlightenment, intellect, endless knowledge, knows how to make full use of the "Keys of Enoch", having at the same time the power to provoke or control certain natural phenomena, just like Prospero, the Duke of Milan, the protagonist of the play "The Tempest" by Shakespeare. And the magician always carries a triple seal: that of an actor, screenwriter and also a director.

Leadership: Do you direct your energies towards the assumption of a creation in your own divine being, making the reality that surrounds you the perspective of a consciousness that has traveled the road to the level of the concept of "Cause of Causes"?

Some of those people who had no inclination to study end up being the staunchest defenders of science, but also aces in various fields. And most of those who studied like crazy all the time (even as small children), continuing with studies abroad, they do not manage to move their thinking in the light of science. It simply bypasses its divine essence, the relationship between intellectual pursuits and spiritual experience.

More precisely, what is the divine essence? It is the limited space available to you for any "remedial" intervention in the course of the world, in the context of the union between a vision centered on the past, because "everything comes from there", and the perspective centered on a divine-human spiritual communion, which transcends time and space.

All the more likely, the divine space designates the mystical state that influences the perception of a reality whose only meaning is the vivid and convincing image of a possible new beginning, an own creation starting from the image of a life that embodies a call to keep hope and faith.

And look, that's the way things have always been, and they'll never change. According to this consideration, the greatest influence on which all the virtues are built, all the parties involved in the process of change, usually remains hidden. And not only that. In leadership, the "Cause of Mystical Causes", Mystica Mysterium do Santosis, is constituted as a reaction to the pressure of external influence, constraints, limits or circumstances that no one can foresee.

Leadership goes beyond the intention phase, visible in an artistic creation, and asserts itself as the structure of a life experience that clearly shows that people grow and are formed among people, but only some of them, those who step discreetly between the fantastic and the magical, they end up being transformers of reality.

At least one of them, Sergei Eisenstein, was a translator of the divine plan into earthly human reality.

The Experience Of The Divine Mystery permeates the work of a creator of new worlds, seen through the projection screen of fascinating images that, forming a coherent whole, come to life, enrich the soul and invite you to rediscover a world full of color.

The question arises: how does one get from the status of a completely ordinary man to the status of a titan of cinema? Here is the divine secret, an unwritten law that governs the life of those who soar towards the blue heights of the sky, dotted here and there by a few white clouds.

Can you bravely soar to the heights of the pure, inspiring, beneficent air of noble ideas, like an eagle that rightfully claims its crests as its own?

The Expression Of Leadership

On October 18, 2010

Explore well the deeper side of your leadership, for his final expression to reveal your true quality.

The French painter Henri Matisse once said in one of his older articles: "What I aim, above all, is expression. For me expression does not arise in the passion that explodes in a face, or that affirm itself in a violent gesture. It is in the entire disposition of my painting. The place that bodies occupy, the empty spaces around them, the proportions, all these play their parts ... For this I need to put order in my ideas. The relation between the tones will be set so that will sustain them instead of alleviating them. A new color combination would follow the first and will summarize the whole my representation."

Leadership: Is the way you understand the connection between art and creation a reflection of your qualities measured by a deepening of the sense of usefulness and fulfillment at the level of "consequence of discipleship"?

An artist of great value, a skillful painter pays attention to the gaps that he finds in certain areas of concentration of increasingly important resources for creative activity, constantly concerning of those "gaps" from his system of thinking that cannot be filled only with a better understanding of the principles on which are based his ideas. He bases his relationship with other people through an efficient regulation of his own inner mechanism of functioning, based on an event, a story, a memory, an apprenticeship that eventually led him to become a master painter.

Just like a painter, a leader establishes his relationship between the "tones" that stimulate creativity and his own inspiration, which marks his change and evolution - so that they would support his vision, objectives and strategies - those tones that, also fit with his own qualifications, performance, internal vibration, and his own intentions. The tones that stimulate a leader's creativity are: imagination, the ability to improvise, the ability to look for alternatives, the ability to think logically and anticipatively, the ability to coordinate, intuition, the ability to represent the surrounding reality, etc.

The apprenticeship you receive, as well as the apprenticeship you offer to other aspirants to the status of great performers, is a form of learning through practice whose ultimate goal is to achieve very precise individual and collective skills, derived from the profile of personality formation. to each. Or, in order for a disciple to be ready to surpass his master, he must be thirsty for learning and not know what the fear of error is, especially in a context of sedimentation and decantation of impressions, analyzes, evaluations, good practices, etc.

Leadership: Can you record the last touches of your creation in the memory of a present that keeps pace with the future and leaves no one behind, so that the nature of your art is perceived as a trend of innovation of its time?

A leader distinguishes from the other aspirants at greatness by accomplishing things that very few are capable, he distinguishes by the leadership based on a sound judgment, on a correct assessment of his own activities and responsibilities (which he freely accepted and unrestricted by anyone) of which he is needed to give proof. And in his spirit of discipline, research and initiative, which tends towards what we call professionalism, to what represents him, and to what is unlimited in terms of his own evolution - always manifests something original which shapes and highlights his personality.

In football, a coach must mostly have what is commonly called "the clinical eye". That is, he must know what it is the effort-limit of his players, consequently what and how much he must require from them.

For your leadership not to lose value over time, you must develop by your own that "clinical eye" in order to allow establishing precisely the limit that you can achieve. The expression of your leadership is given on the way in which you calibrate your efforts, without being influenced by any tendency from outside, in order to keep your performances. In your sense of balance and harmony are recognized your temperament and behavioral characteristics.

The last retouching of your creation must sum up the totality of your representation, as an artist, on the path of a high aesthetic exigency, on the path of a continuous improvement of the working conditions. In fact, the final retouching of your creation must include the description of your personality during a period of exposure, conservation and preservation of the artistic heritage of the modern world.

The Expression Of Leadership is measured by the results obtained in order to achieve the ultimate goal (perfection) and relies largely on the coordination of the team activity, on the establishment of some limits of performance and action, on interpersonal cooperation, etc.., elements largely related, firstly, on the leader, and in the second place of those from his team.

Conclusion: The expression of leadership is like a painting displayed in an exhibition – as a final work is admired by all, is impressive by its harmony, color and perspective. Is the painting where the author has managed to harmoniously combine the component elements, by the means of those whom he selected as "producers" of canvas, paints and brushes, of solvents and emulsifiers, frame, etc.., and even of those who admitted his work to be exposed.

The Expression Of The Quality Of Being A Learned Person

Try to see teachings as a thing that must always be improved so that you fit into that category of leaders who interweave their existence with all of its resulting values.

Writer Thomas Cleary, says the following in Zen Lessons:

Many monks I know do not regard teachings as something that must always be improved. I'm afraid the monasteries will diminish the importance of this. My late teacher Yangqi used to say that when those above and those below are not concerned with this, the greatest misfortune befalls the assimilation of knowledge.

In the past, while I was living alone in the library of the Guizong Monastery and studying scriptures and history, many of these careless men passed by my eyes. The books were very old, they were worn out, but every time I opened a book I had the feeling of making a new discovery.

If I take these things into account, then deepening my knowledge without moving away from people resembles my account.

Leadership: Are you ready to capitalize on your self-transformation through an unmistakable tendency towards perfection that makes designing a new route to follow an indispensable teaching of life?

An indispensable teaching of life, trying to express your state of being useful to a cause that embraces everything and involves all your fellow men, connected with practicing a meditation that helps you get your mind out of trouble, is an overlapping of philosophical concepts with the beliefs of one's own conscience. Or this overlap justifies that giving up everything that is not indispensable to good development must be done in terms of a discovery that cancels out the old understandings or rules that you have built your motivation for change.

Your transformation takes place when they "share fists and feet" the science of being someone else, and the science to know how to rise to the claims of your new becoming. Your ability to become a better leader depends on the balance between the two sciences, and on the way you configure your vision on the reality that you have acquired in search of the meaning and the nonsense of life.

The resulting values of life are: the ability to understand its price, the power to withstand its attempts and your ability to interpret its experiences.

The obligations, needs, interests, plans, rules, preferences that ceaselessly renew your striving for perfection, all this clutter of variables that decide your functioning, all this tangle of constants that appear in the equation of your transformation, should be considered only under their positive aspect.

Because they can become as strong as the bars of a cage in which you get to feel trapped, defeated and miserable. And thus, may cause a transformation in your way of being, but a difficult separation, an alienation of which really characterizes you, and which you considered until then the certainty of your life.

Transforming your perception of anything can lead to a change of reality, continuously fed from different experiences of understanding, is only achieved if you withdraw your attention from what you do not want to manifest through prejudice, attitude, conformance, exaggerated morality, taboos, and choose to remain an observer of the smallest inflections around the totality that allows you to explain the necessity of existence.

The teaching that influences leadership is the authority you exercise on what it means to live through the power of the feeling that you have made a discovery capable of changing perceptions of what is happening to you, of what surrounds you, of what is good and what is bad.

The Expression Of The Quality Of Being A Learned Person is based on the modeling effect of meditation and uninterrupted contemplation on ordinary or forgotten things in order to address the relevant aspects of reality based on pluralism and diversity that gives you the opportunity to broaden your perceptions of what a learning event can bring you.

The Expressiveness Of Montage

On October 18, 2015

Give new values and new qualities to your creative operations by extending them from the sphere of action into that of significance.

American director D. W. Griffith seems to have been the first to understand the way in which certain film techniques could be used to create an expressive language, enhancing mood and tension. Griffith used, for the first time, consciously and wisely, the parallel montage of two converging actions. This, he had discovered the expressiveness of montage. But he stopped at this point.

*Eisenstein, however, will go further. He will understand that, through their confrontation, two images give birth to a new notion. And we will meet, for instance, the altered image of the repression of a strike and that of the slaughter of cattle in a slaughterhouse, which together, thus joined, will express not two disparate facts, but the idea of tsarist police savagery. Eisenstein will broaden the scope of parallel montage found in Griffith's works, giving it new values, new qualities through, what he would say, extending it from the sphere of action into that of significance.

Leadership: Are you able to capture a new nuance of expressiveness by producing a new product that express the idea of the identity of your own creation?

Leadership can capture that valuable spark of artistic intelligence (specific to brilliance), the power of realizing what research means, the strive to achieve something with difficulty and tenacity. It can be calculated to the extent to which a certain performance is achieved in using several different procedures of comparison between notions, real phenomena and the harmonization with different principles.

We use genius as a leverage appropriate not only to fulfill the duty of showing a powerful ambition, but rather, to the extent in which science and technique gain daily unprecedented victories, like a magic wand that, if it touches you, it is as if you suddenly know everything. Images that give rise to different notions must capture the truths of some facts or moments that have taken place, revealed by putting together the most relevant details and leaving the rest at the discretion of the viewers.

Expressiveness is the essence of a creation inspired by reality, fueled with the ease with which you communicate an idea by penetrating into the heart of an action meant to cause the interlocutor not only to imagine or to construct a mental image in the mind, but to translate it into practice, to find the means and resources of translation in fact.

And a new nuance of expressiveness is achieved when the image that you render by idea, or metaphorically revealed, becomes more credible than reality. The mastery of a director is included in the sum of the frames he captures in a series of moments that enrich the personal experience of the spectators.

Leadership: Are you able to experience a new meaning of concepts that you assimilate by confronting two or more images of the same subject expressing separate facts?

Leaders always go further in their search for new scientific conquests, carrying in their own manner of interpreting an image a divided lot of expansive elements (facts or hypotheses).

These elements, made off of the convergence of several sources of information, broaden the sphere of knowledge and, through this it reveals the basic characteristic of directorial individuality: the interest in giving a new quality to the relationship between reality and artistic representation.

The new meaning attributed to notions or to certain aspects of reality (wished to be highlighted through language), gives the outline of a certain style, of a certain structure of interest. This outline is obtained following an intervention of an individualizing order. You will only be able to experience a new meaning of concepts only by confronting two or more images of the same subject that expresses separate facts.

Any director treats reality as a mass of parallel universes in continuous multiplication, so that the images to which he gives life through the fine fabric of the individual make reference to evolution in rendering an effect of montage (shifting from one frame to another).

By confronting two or more images, a new notion is obtained that artistically highlights the hidden essence of a certain phenomenon of magnitude (as is the case of the clinical death metaphor that opens the vision of "plays of shadows" that hit the window of the mind designed to split reality from dream).

An image projected by the filming camera can be credible if it focuses on a series of moments and frames representing the unique experiences you are trying to experience at maximum intensity, with the specification that the effects are deeper and lasting due to what they manage to trigger in your brain.

The Expressiveness Of Montage captures the essence of creation that artists "direct". To grow in what you transmit is to manage to capture a new nuance of expressiveness, through producing a producing that expresses the idea of identity of your own creation. Leadership often leaves its mark on the way in which you dose what you transmit.

This product, which your informational culture must finalize, must be revealed through its extension from the sphere of action into that of significance. Meaning to admit a certain interaction with reality and, at the same time, an idealized intervention upon it.

The External Manifestation Of An Awakening To Life (II)

Learn to take into account what benefits you towards a rapid ascension, freeing yourself of what brings you down and move on to that fulfillment that tells you that what you do is good.

After completing the mission God had entrusted to him, after the revenge – this little divine lever had allowed him to overcome all the obstacles, the count began to doubt himself for the first time. Had he the right to make so much justice, more unexpected than befitting of a well-thought-out judgment? Had he the right to wear the mask of a higher being and see beyond it?

Returning home, Monte Cristo met Maximilien walking through the Champs-Elysees dwelling, silent as a shadow waiting for the moment fixed by God to re-enter the grave.

- Get ready, Maximilien – he said with a smile. Tomorrow we leave Paris.

- You have nothing else to do here? Morrel asked.

- No, replied Monte Cristo. And God willing, let what I have done not be too much.

Leadership: Do you diligently adhere to what adds value to your steps without assuming the wisdom of distinguishing the highest power of God from that vibrant whisper of consciousness that will continue to vibrate for a long time in your soul?

If fate diverges from the initially set plan, generating unsuspected detours, then man can gradually regain his defining elements only if he's touched by the grace that gives a soul to truth, only by emblazoning character, in hopes of extending his inner strength over him and the others.

In this case, leadership can be compared to an eagle flying high, to a rediscovery of the winner within man himself, who had the magical power to make a journey full of lessons and attempts into the unknown world. This world can be extrapolated only by the spiritually strong ones, willing to take the chances of searching themselves.

Leadership has as its main pillar an inner world an inner world governed by the heights of science and wisdom, built on pillars whose structure tests the limits of being, thought, patience and imagination. Power and authority. They mustn't become some instruments in the hands of a performer, or a play around the central axis fixed at both ends: to be equal to God or to be only His tool.

Leadership: Can you consolidate your knowledge without pain and remorse, so that the destiny God has prepared for you will resonate with the ability of consciousness to discover the essence of a world that experiences a single event simultaneously?

You can't reach the peak if you lack inner vitality. Destroying the resistance wall on two parallel directions: the moral compass and spiritual map, floating in that sphere of pain he didn't understand, but that seemingly was part of a divine play, determined Edmond Dantes, alias the Count of Monte Cristo, to strictly redirect his long-term strength and strategy to other, higher targets.

Sincerely living the conflict between two identities, two different personalities, between two ways of looking at the world and life situations, he places leadership under an only guiding star: depth and sincerity. They form the characteristic of a mature mentality, directed towards involvement, responsibility and openness.

If you want to understand leadership, you have to first go through the unexpected twists of fate. And to find, on your own, the path of "awakening" to life. You can't climb to the top if you lack inner vitality, if the interaction between positive and negative elements doesn't act on a fixed point: change. Rebirth. The final break between successive accumulation of pain, exhaustion, compromise, sacrifice and hardship.

Turn yourself into a strong model of faith, by readjusting your life around the wounds which you must accept as existential realities contained in an unseen plan, even if they are hard to understand and often difficult to accept. Relate to a moment of "being" based on the reconstruction of the inner relation of values and feelings that have in their center the reflection of a deep and profound knowledge.

Through the essence of a world that simultaneously experiences a single event is understood the moral under whose empire the human nature seeks to preserve the vitality of consciousness, without this being changed by the remembrance of certain episodes from past experiences.

The whole sphere of consciousness hangs on trying to spot a precise moment in your evolution that can be fatal if it does not become a premise of forgiveness.

The External Manifestation Of An Awakening To Life is the chance you get to start over again, even if you have to bear remorse and pain, being hopeful that everything that happened to you was part of the divine plan you did not foresee and from which you could not deviate.

The External Manifestation Of An Awakening To Life (I)

Turn yourself into a strong model of faith, by readjusting your life around the wounds you acknowledge as bridges to leadership.

Tell the angel who will watch over your future destiny, Morrel, to pray sometimes for a man, who like Satan thought himself for an instant equal to God, but who now acknowledges with Christian humility that God alone possesses supreme power and infinite wisdom. Perhaps those prayers may soften the remorse he feels in his heart.

As for you, Morrel, this is the secret of my conduct towards you. There is neither happiness nor misery in the world; there is only the comparison of one state with another, nothing more. He who has felt the deepest grief is best able to experience supreme happiness. We must have felt what it is to die, Morrel, that we may appreciate the enjoyments of living.

Live, then, and be happy, beloved children of my heart, and never forget that until the day when God shall deign to reveal the future to man, all human wisdom is summed up in these two words, - "Wait and hope ! "

Leadership: Do you diligently adhere to what you add to your experience in a non-honest way so as to bring about the beginning of a new world from the perspective of what makes you relinquish the regrets of the past?

Such experience appeared as if from nowhere, tiring repentance, remembering the unforgettable voice of desperation, must surely acquire the value of an instructive example. Man adds value and understands his experience in a non-genuine manner when he feels morally responsible to the world, to all that surrounds him, knowing exactly what he has to do in the virtue of this responsibility. He becomes involved in abandoning the past for one reason: to impose the superiority of maturity on youth.

The man who weighed everything in the dark, by a fierce blow of fate, the man inside whom tensions generating strong despairs, waves of disbelief, holes in identity were born, had the power to move on. This way he could appreciate true happiness. Everything he experienced, everything he carried with that stubbornness that nothing can dissolve and that you don't see anywhere else, was triggered for the first time as a reaction to the demands of the soul. The man revealed his undying pain, uncovering the values and qualities he acquired from it.

The soul of the man who was robbed and devoid of every feeling, like a tomb covered with a hard gravestone, opened through a rotation movement of destiny. And once with caressing the first ray of sun, this man discovered his power. He was reborn and ascended towards the heights of the absolute.

Only a sharp mind and a measured instinctual force could have distinguished the positive values of this soul whose essence is reflected in the lines of poet Robert Service: "He had the heart of a Viking and the faith of a child."

This image, of a man passed his youth, but vested by God with great insight (by breaking contact with external reality and by excessively living an internal life), makes us think about an eagle whose painful wounds were healed, who soars on the highest skies.

Leadership: Can you assure a guarantee of your authenticity when approaching the destiny of an artist that turns out to be a series of enumerations of facts and reflective attitudes to life's questions?

An artist does not take into account the intrinsic condition of art, namely the experiencing and understanding of suffering. It is revealed as a series of enumerations of reflective facts and attitudes to the questions of life, such as:

How can you love yourself more? What do you want to embody? What do you run the most from in life? On which limitative beliefs do you cling to? Are you satisfied with less than you deserve? Where do you live now – in the past, in the future or in the present? Can you become a different person for others?

Edmond Dantes' wish to reach a superior existence level determined an increased resistance against despair, doubling hope. The main ingredients for the total inner change reaction, the number of moles for each mental and spiritual substance that contained the acceleration agent of development processes, gave birth to a new guiding light. To an endless, newly found spiritual strength. As a counterweight for the pain, pessimism and deaf resignation that invaded his soul - typical to self-knowledge and acquiring wisdom.

Evaluating man's personality and the spiritual structure it's made of, placed in a circle of attraction forcers that extends its diameter through a consistent focalization over silent senses and thoughts, doesn't ensure a meaningful recognition of its value or its responsibility in case of failure.

From this point of view leadership loses its glow, it gets a faded tone; it becomes a weak investigation factor of man's authority. It can no longer provide major clues regarding the existence of some values that would favor man's total transformation in a superior entity that can work autonomously.

The image shaped by your inner change is revealed as a set of similarities, analogies between the real-life phenomena and their emotional correspondence. It is included in the plan of an intelligent being who exercises his will not according to the beliefs and experiences of the past, but according to the ease with which he forgives his mistakes, his wounds and his soul.

The External Manifestation Of An Awakening To Life brings forward that self-definition, which gives a different meaning to life. But also coming back to the initial flagpoles set whenever fate doesn't comply with the original plan.

Just like a Phoenix, can you be reborn from your own ashes?

The Eye Follows The Purity Reflected In The Representations Of Nature

On August 14, 2022

What you feel in the particular form of the pleasure of admiring depends on how you contemplate a simple product of nature until it becomes a work of art.

One day I will finish writing the "Treatise on the Eye", a volume of over 2,000 pages containing just as many ways of seeing a single blade of grass. Yes, a common blade of grass. And if in the modern world this subject of the distinct look is highlighted less and less, having its own individuality, so that almost any possibility of highlighting the idea of "fragility in temporality", excluding the subjective interpretation, has been lost, I will add a good part of reflection and imaginary restlessness as to reinvent a whole science – such as that part of optics about the propagation of light in interaction with material media.

On this favorable ground of vision not direct, but mediated by the work of divine grace, spread in all parts and belonging in a way and form to each individual, but especially to the chosen spirits, only the manifestation of an artist's soul that aspires to communicate nel linguaggio della pittura naturalistica, can reconstruct the pattern of meaning of a single blade of grass like a labyrinth in which you get lost at your pleasure, without fear of getting lost.

Revelatory and directly responsible for ensuring a meticulous view, joining the artistic emotion with the current feeling of a metaphysical fullness, the artistic eye always asks itself the question: how to contemplate a minor photographic detail, so as to widen the space of sensitivity? Let's take this into account in order to understand the vision of the artist's eye.

The blade of grass in front of me, such a body that is in complete identity with the light, with the heat and with the moisture in the atmosphere, cannot be reduced to indifference, because otherwise the pictorial landscapes would be devoid of soulful content. The very greenish color of the blade of grass appears as a force of attraction to the eye, as an amplification of vision in the direction of an inner psychology, and even if it does not reflect the light like a concave mirror, at least it allows the light to pass through it like through a unique stained glass window, remaining alive and active in the image of a heterogeneous optical environment.

Leadership: Are you able to assert your passion for uniqueness in a large figurative composition whose "dominant chromatic" captures the vastness of feeling through the expressive intensity of a derisory element?

At this very moment the artist in me relies on the fact that he has in front of him a double image reflected in the field of a visual symmetry: between the shapes and the colors that beautify the space. At the same time, the artist in me sees both the light and the blade of grass, two distinct presences that merge perfectly, framed in an anticipated, comparative space, expressed through meanings arranged simultaneously in a Zavisforsys Ulttras (the force of the spirit integrated into the very style of the drawing). Only he who has cultivated within himself the sense of analogy, only he who has successfully combined the logical sense of image with form, will reach the ultimate beauty.

In one far superior respect, both inseparable sides of the artistic vision – ideal and real – even if we see them given separately, yet they coexist in the same image, in the same two bodies: one earthly, the other heavenly. The blade of grass and sunlight, as prismatic phenomena, are by no means in opposition. That is, they do not oppose in polarity between cold and warm colors. And this is precisely what is necessary to establish the coordinates of a painting in which the colors merge over the entire surface, to the extent that the forms are understood, that is, they derive from the method of comparison which is based on the application of the method of reduction to unity.

So a single blade of grass in the middle of the lawn can be established in identity by sunlight, remaining perfectly green in its absolute simplicity, as long as it is perceived as a passive figure in the intimate harmony between nature and art, or as long as it expresses by comprehensive meanings a story transposed in an emotional note. Only in this way does the artist in me manage to translate a single vision into art: by trying to accurately capture the elements of reality, but in such a way as to replace the status of "receptacle for emotions that come from everywhere" with the status of an infinite creator.

Leadership: Can you bring out the passion of a life lived through creation, in order to obtain an overall effect of the inner reality peeled from appearance, independent of the model of the gaze that can adjust the meaning of the aesthetic vision?

I realized that my eye, in a perceptive relationship with the aesthetic delight of the viewer, manages to traverse the space of metaphorical richness specific to cultured creation. Look carefully ! Look at the blade of grass investing it with that aesthetic attitude that is characterized as a state of inner peace, a state of supreme moral and intellectual relaxation that takes you to the most imponderable areas of spirituality. Moreover, it would not be possible to approach it aesthetically except by perceiving it as the manifestation of spirit in matter, Identhimevah Reshiantiss, projection of an artistic sensibility expressed in a value and confessional sense, related to calmness, tenderness and soul balance.

The artist's eye must endure the same implacable laws as any emotional expression, and the first law is this: "what you feel in the particular form of the pleasure of admiring, depends on how you contemplate a simple product of nature until it becomes a poem or a painting ". After all, only a simple contemplator of nature, trying to know the meaning of a single blade of grass, could penetrate into his life as he would into the soul of man. And what would he find there, in the interval of space that separates and unites at the same time, in a perceptive relationship, the work of nature with the viewer? He would find the very depth of an infinite world.

So, through a single blade of grass we could identify expressiveness in communion with the sublime of nature, at least to clarify intuitively and logically, by imagination or by intellect, the dominant tendency to restrict the word beautiful to the aesthetic value of charming. Here I summarize the famous phrase: "art has the function of revealing a mysterious hidden corner, masked by everyday banality".

The focus is on the content. For the blade of grass to appear perfectly in a picture of sustained artistic activity, for it to be able to give value to the vivid, intense, vibrant color worthy of the original of an emerald green, there must first be the possibility of recognizing it as a defining element in the maximum plane of emotion, with the measure of the eye that follows the purity reflected even in the derisive representations of nature.

When leadership comes from the depths of art, bearing the signs of individuality and fragility, it is loaded with that boost of depth that gives the prestige of looking closely, that acuity of the look that perceives the "miracle" with a predilection where you would least expect it.

The Eye Follows The Purity Reflected In The Representations Of Nature when the artist finds advantageous motivations in a generous environment in which BEAUTY, under all compositional aspects, constitutes an essential and major coordinate of existence, reflecting in the environment of a life dedicated to knowledge, in the concern of establishing an aesthetic universe.

The Eye Is Captive In The Perfect Mirroring Of Reality

The eye looking into a clear mirror witnesses a more accurate reality, influencing how it perceives the depth of existence.

An injury during the half marathon is like an artist's stroke caught in the middle of an intense creation. The unexpected fall on rough terrain forced my sister, Oana Fântânaru, to stop and reassess her physical and mental state. In addition to missing an essential marker and getting lost, the physical pain triggered an inner struggle with his own limits and a strong desire to carry on. As if the art of suffering found its expression in every painful step of the race, and the color of pain and the tones of sacrifice joined forces to create a work of perseverance.

If you could have read his mind in that moment of wandering, if you had access to the vision that is facilitated by introducing suffering into a competitive frame of mind, you would have discovered a labyrinth of conflicting emotions, each turn revealing a new facet of his tireless spirit. Her steps, once firm and determined, now carried the weight of doubt, a kind of oppressive uncertainty, an Edreseerlyn Uvisidasa, but in the depths of her soul still burned the unquenchable flame of determination, esa voluntad inquebrantable de seguir adelante . Each jerky breath was a struggle between the fear of failure and the burning desire to overcome his limits, a game of contrasts that defined his essence, also one with the artistic transcendence of the search for perfection.

Artistic creation is an ongoing inner struggle, as each act of creation involves overcoming fears, doubts, and imperfections, transforming them into something authentic and valuable. In her eyes, the mirror of a tumultuous soul, reflected not only the panic of the moment, but also the kaleidoscope of experiences that had shaped her—each grueling workout, each small victory, each defeat that had made her stronger. Her mind, a maelstrom of thoughts and strategies, frantically searched for solutions, demonstrating a resilience that transcended the simple act of running. He told himself with that fierce determination of the painter, that all that mattered was to keep creating, to follow his vision, beyond any obstacle or pain.

Leadership: In the face of the unknown "sui generis" can you bring out the essence of your soul, to create a masterpiece that transcends all limitations?

There, in the middle of the unknown, she was discovering her true nature - not just as a runner, but as a fearless spirit, ready to face any obstacle. Art goes where the courage to explore the unknown and transform fear into power becomes essential, revealing the true essence of the creative spirit. Each beat of his heart was a silent affirmation of the will to persevere, a declaration of war against self-imposed limitations. In that lost moment, she was not just a lost competitor, but the very personification of the human struggle against adversity, a living testament to the spirit's ability to rise above circumstance.

"I am more than I thought," she concludes, feeling this new understanding fill her every cell. "I was like a creator of my own destiny, an explorer of the unknown, a spirit that rises above all adversity. Rather, I felt a strange duality within me: strength and vulnerability coexisted like a kind of subtle dance, creating a fragile balance. With heart-wrenching, deep and unsettling, I was aware that my struggle was not a temporary one, not some kind of singular battle, but an ongoing journey of self-discovery the unknown, once feared, this enigmatic demon, was now becoming the fertile ground on which I cultivated my true inner strength.

To show how she lives running, with what fervor, passion, grip, having the feeling that there is a closeness to the real for which the artistic work is only a means of authentic expression of her inner essence? Before, it had really been about her special ways of mingling with nature, arguing that only in running you can externalize your passions. Only those inspired by the mountain? You burn and burn to exhaustion, close your eyes and fall apart—in pain, in pleasure. So, he wanted to suggest the paroxysm she could reach in this "survival game" practiced in the "mountain" contests she often participated in.

Leadership: In the face of adversity, does your art become a catalyst for deep introspection, revealing the limits of the creative spirit?

Isn't it also the "sui generis" form in which Oana gave herself to freedom, regardless of the conditions, I mean in the face of obstacles, it doesn't matter in what form?

"Running really gives me unsuspected possibilities. Sometimes, I like to think that I am not an empty soul, not an inert vessel, but a painter full of colors in the thoughts laid on the canvas of the surrounding reality, making alchemy from every interwoven feeling with the freedom to choose the setting I live in. Isn't it the prerogative of a free spirit that, while running, when you vibrate with energy and determination and hope, the route at once tightens your every fiber and glues your spirit to the earth and the tangible reality of the effort? And that without being obliged to fight back in any way? Yes, it's just me with the art of going through obstacles in any case, I am the protagonist of a painting full of nuances and contrasts. Without feeling offended, without having to cut off relations with myself. Not everyone gives me the same opportunity to accept ambiguous, if not unequivocal, obstacles in the absence of a trail companion, without having to justify myself, so as not to spoil the inner balance?"

Julien Eymard, in his extensive work entitled "The theme of the mirror" in French poetry, distinguished two great periods: the Middle Ages, when the metal mirror had the dimensions of the human face, and Romanticism, when the glass mirror acquired human stature. The author of the study also discovered some coincidences that led him to question whether the glass technique contributed to the orientation of classical poetry towards accuracy and clarity. Between the two eras of assiduous cultivation of the mirror theme there was an interval of three "classical" centuries in which the mirror is reflected in French literature only in the short period of the Baroque.

In the mirror, sight becomes a bridge between the outside world and the self. Therefore, the more intensely a runner explores his inner path, the more the experience becomes akin to the transformation of the mirror from a mere reflective object into a symbol of literary introspection, just as Eymard describes the evolution of the mirror in poetry. As for the race, Oana achieved a formidable 2nd place on the podium, even if the injury kept her in place for a short period of time.

Leadership is about turning temporary injury into a step to the podium, reflecting the ability to evolve from a mere reflective object into a symbol of introspection and formidable performance.

The eye is captive to the perfect mirroring of reality when the mind fails to see beyond the surface, remaining captive to what is visible without exploring the hidden depths of experience. Therefore, true vision comes from the ability to look beyond appearances, discover hidden meanings, and transform simple reflections into a deep understanding of reality.

To create the deep connection with yourself, you must cultivate the ability to turn the mirror view into a bridge between the outside world and the self, deeply exploring the path taken to create an experience that reflects the symbolic evolution of introspection.

The Eye Is More Sensitive To The Blue Of The Clear Sky

What you say about yourself can revise the essence of art in a different perspective.

I realized that, by looking carefully at the sky-blue color, and not being able to resist its tempting call, I can become something other than a simple admirer of beauty. All this, while this color appears before my eyes like a photograph brought to life in a present full of vitality. When I arrived in front of it, admiring it like a work of art, I was suddenly enveloped by the conviction "believe in something more powerful than myself", although I couldn't quite understand why.

Color is a means of seducing beautiful eyes that seem to be mirrored in a mystical aura, in a numerous series of manifestations: language, art, morals, all grasped with the spirit (from the most ignorant to the most evolved) of a force of poetic internalization. That's a good one, how can I make it look at me in the same way I look at it, with candor, with eyes full of understanding, with serenity in my soul, without going through the mathematics of my experiences, without thinking of it as an intimate confession, una obra compleja que va más allá de la mera afirmación de la fe, in which something reveals to me in a measured, almost impersonal tone, the limits of daring to encompass the infinite?

Does the sky blue color teach me to master the universal dynamism? Does it teach me the modifications that supposedly inanimate objects impose on each other? Can it give my instinct a plastic consciousness? I don't know what to say, not at this moment, or rather I'm not ready to know it well enough. But what I already understood, or I think I understood quite well, confessed or not, through a barely felt desire to create a transcendental state of freedom beyond "birth and death", is that virtue of it to indicate the aspiration towards purity.

Leadership: Does your creation have the merit of communicating that uplifting experience that the soul feels at the sight of an image that represents the subject of a vision directed to the eye of the observer?

To capture a color in its pure state, alive and penetrating, I have to leave aside everything that can be attractive and disturbing about it. It's like when I mix it with other colors to create new and novel shades, but without loading them with too much light or shadow. Only in this way will I be able to express my feelings, or illustrate certain states in painting. Indeed, the color sky blue can be cheerful, gentle, it must never be sad or full of pain, for that would be to argue with myself, to assign blame, an attitude that is foreign to me.

Please tell me about yourself, I said to the color in a moment of deep philosophizing. And it spoke to me as if from the depths of the sky, in such a warm tone, as you only meet with pure artists. It told me that sometimes it reflects in the tears of memories that no one claims anymore, or in the tears of desolate sufferings. Other times, with a measured power of attraction, it hides in the smile of some poems that have to do with observed things, with the sky or the sea, or it is found in the nostalgia of lost states, in the nostalgia of beginnings that tied us closely to certain places.

Nor will I force you to remember me differently than I am. I will not impose a precise meaning on you, I will not attribute to you the intention of the painter to define himself, to give an answer to the question: who am I really? I just told you that I don't know you well enough to recognize you as a merit, the merit of embalming time, giving my obligation to paint a high mission: that your open tone be the predominant force in a painting.

Leadership: Does the visual experience you have refer to the perception and correlation of the images you see with both eyes, even if they are slightly different in meaning and content?

Sky blue. At first sight, you attract me with your heavenly nature, with the sensitivity of a rarely encountered poetics, a fact that supports the search for appropriate conversation topics. But then I feel like I'm caught in a rip current and I can't seem to swim in it. To the same extent, we have something in common, although we are not identical: we love summer, we like the sea and the canopy of the sky.

My dear color, a boundless sky blue. I like you, I accept you, I glorify you like a fragrant flower, as it is so called: "Don't forget me" (Myosotis). I don't necessarily perceive you as a dematerialized reality and charged with sacredness, nor do I intend to use you as the background of a dystopian world, because that would remind me of that character who dreamed of being a great artist, living in an apparently ideal world, but without color, in which everyone seemed to play other roles both on and off the stage. What else could I do to be the silent reformer of your thoughts?

To tell you the truth, I wouldn't even want my eyes to look like yours, because I would look very different from the rest of the world. Therefore, I claim that I will not submit to your will to consider me your subject, through beauty and frailty. I like my brown eyes much more, and I'm not ashamed to say it, but they really are the most beautiful eyes in the world.

Sooner or later, each of us will know this bitter truth. It's part of the reality of this life that, at some point, when you're still looking for yourself and can't find yourself, you see something delightful where you don't agree with yourself, where you're not validated.

In leadership, we must always take into account that thing that has the "Wow" effect, that is: it can be perceived by the senses, it can be put into words, it can change, it can generate overwhelming emotions and create a memorable experience.

As the painter has color at hand to generate emotions and create moods, so too the leader must have at hand the power to make connections between different things, to perceive accurately their depth and meaning, and to see their unitary whole as a reflection of his own person.

The Eye Is More Sensitive To The Blue Of The Clear Sky whenever I have to talk about myself, as an artist capable of awakening an emotion in the heart of the viewer, and whose works speak for themselves. Do not forget that the essence of art is to generate beautiful emotions and create a memorable experience. And I always do this when I resort to figures of speech, such as comparison or analogy.

The Eye Is Not Satisfied With The Mind Of The One Who Sees

Only to the extent that the particular is transformed into the universal, the real becomes in the eyes of the beholder closer to the visual image with which his memories are associated.

In the world of art, one cannot conceive an image without having a good view of the horizon. And I, especially when I am interested in the evolution of forms of visual expression, capture this horizon as a point of connection between the creation of nature and the perspective of a permanent reality. For example, I look at the ocean, its vastness, as far as my eyes can take in. I notice that each wave, from the perspective of a unitary approach, behaves completely independently of the other potencies of nature, in each wave dissolving the purest reason, everything that subtly wanders in the sphere of the concrete.

Having their origin in eternal matter, thus including everything, without withdrawing into particular spheres of perception, the waves reach the most limitless of all arts: symbolism. So the task of the artist is to realize the construction of the particular forms of art, comprising the pure form of wave motions and the pattern of reason that resides in them, only to represent other forms of the things themselves through the intuitive character of his thinking. Hard to do that, isn't it?

Look how beautifully the horizon opens before me, and yet, how much the measure of my distance from the sea is accentuated. In contrast, if my eye looks between the waves, that is, between the light and the reflected object, then the blue color can go down to emerald green, while any darker color arises from a simple increase in opacification. But if I reduce the waves to absolute indifference, thus neglecting the ocean, looking only at the sand whose universal is the particular undistorted by the illusion of reality, then the only force of attraction will be the sunlight that helps the artist in me more easily control the chiaroscuro effect or the effect of imitation.

Leadership: Can you establish a proper relationship between the object of visual perception and its affective background, starting from the idea that what is in the plane of content can also become form?

At the height of the demands of my art, you can see the sea, gorgeous in the sunlight. But the eye, mostly tired of the effect produced by light, can no longer be accompanied by the sensation of brilliance produced by the flashes of waves, but tends to create in places, from free fragments, a kind of illusion where the idea of light fades. Unfortunately. Only to the extent that the particular is transformed into the universal, the real becomes in the eyes of the beholder closer to the image of the waves. So it can't be distinguished as negation, can it?

I think it is easier to understand this if I start from the principle that "what is in the plane of content (in essence) can in turn become form. In turn, each wave, in the plane of form, has an identity absolute, the forms of the unity of all waves being established as absolute in the plane of artistic content, if we consider the symbol they contain. Moreover, in their particularity, as particular forms of expression, the waves become their own symbol, a subjectivity enclosed in itself, an example of the impact of a mature artistic act, full of truth and emotional.

And how beautifully the waves ripple on a sea embraced by the glints of the sun ! The idea itself is to capture the waves of the ocean with imaginative eyes that study colors in a world of the figurative transfigured into feelings, and to see the full embodiment of subjectivity in objectivity, as they take the form of surreal images that swallow reality, something that exists in things themselves, a fact from which a conclusion can be drawn: nothing is outside of time, everything is more about form than colors.

Leadership: Can you find the explanation of a visual-comparative phenomenon, by imagining an image capable of becoming the direct cause of a river on the beautiful understood as an expression of the idea of "full of soul"?

Further. In order to construct the artistic form corresponding to the waves, where the creation is always absolute nel lontano piano , I must encompass the sunlight in its real unity. Here, reality dissolves into ideality, in the entirety of a gaze that knows how to separate the sheen of water into several distinct surfaces, through an Eludyarecta Aspyhiss, the background of a memory that never forgets. Especially since the hotter the sun is within my gaze, the more the waves appear to me as individual beings, initially ignored by the rest of the world. I say this because each wave has its own unique personality, different from another.

Obviously, it is impossible to follow the waves under all aspects, referring to art, therefore explaining a visual-comparative phenomenon that refers to the way in which we perceive the effect of two adjacent colors on each other. But my nature is inclined towards comparison, a decisive thing to establish a new attitude towards the act of creation, or precisely when the horizon added to my gaze is deeply kneaded by the too full of virtualities that eagerly await their fulfillment.

Knowing how many comparisons have been made in relation to waves, with all that they contain significant for the gaze, and considering the fact that art configures itself at the level of form, where things only come together relatively in the sphere of subjectivity, the question arises how should an image be imagined that would become the immediate cause of an obsession with beauty.

Leadership: Can you refer to an image dependent on the inclusion of a sense of unity in an undefined "sometime" without becoming a prisoner of a gradually fading horizon?

And what is beauty? It is a permanent longing for what cannot be forgotten. Not a cloud in the sky, not a breeze, only the smooth and transparent sea, visible from the distance at which the eye, in a natural sequence of views, remains with a retrospective counter-control, as if waiting for a wider understanding from another sphere of life.

When the horizon of my gaze is deeply disturbed by the too full of a nature captured with the superior understanding of forms and colors, then the exploration of the motivation facing my self takes on a nostalgic air, the contemplative character of a landscape as vague as myself, a passing towards the spiritual of a mind that devours its peace, dissolving as if in isolated-transitory whims.

Exactly as in the case of Miranda from a novel by John Fowles: "I look at my face and watch it move as if it belonged to someone else. I look at myself until I can't anymore, and so I have to close my eyes. Although, only my eyes keep me company now, as their sight plays tricks on me, allowing me to see a more real being than I've ever been. I sit in absolute silence, with the reflection of my own image, in a kind of mysterious communication. Like in a trance."

Driven by an extrapolation of the aesthetic attitude towards reality and towards the act of self-reflection, leadership becomes like the horizon line modified according to the place where I am, the spiritual height of this place, its story.

Let yourself be fascinated by the story of this unique place before you find yourself in a story of the soul.

The Eye Is Not Satisfied With The Mind Of The One Who Sees, but needs an image that immediately becomes viral in the space of memories, just as it needs a longer period to go from near to distant vision. Combining the image with the space of memories makes art become a strongly emotional projection on raw reality, on the relationship between what is present and what is absent.

The Eye Sees Only What The Soul Wants To See

On February 24, 2023

The path your present follows depends on how you measure the burden of your soul.

Saturday, I participated in the half-marathon in Cluj-Napoca. Next to me, almost shoulder to shoulder, a young runner, very well rated, guided me along the entire route, especially through the places not marked by the organizers. Our meeting represented the absolute form of an "entre deux" (between Self and Other) that defines, so perfectly, the space and time in which the Universe "arranged" for two exceptional runners to meet, on the same wavelength.

A rainy weather. There was a lot of mud, making the ground slippery. We helped each other when it came to steep slopes and difficult climbs, dangerous curves, but also smooth roads.

Yes, I faced all the challenges, but until a moment of crossroads. We had covered the distance of 18.7 km, and we reached a steep valley, very slippery, with many paths. Having a bigger step than hers, and thanks to the immeasurable momentum, I succeeded in a much faster descent, reaching the illusory free will of an environment that does not impose constraints, experiencing a horizon of reality from the space of books full of deeds of bravery.

Leadership: Does your vision of yourself and the persistence with which you aim to translate some images into facts lead to a segmentation of the continuum of a background limitation?

And so I got lost among the unknown and unmarked paths, this fact representing a spiral deeply wrapped in the abyss of self-finitude, a segmentation of the continuum of a background limitation. Or rather, entering a kind of background of unfriendly nature, I disowned my self-eye, as a demented atheist disowns his faith, until I realized that, in fact, nature showed me a side of me that I have always neglected, and that I can no longer hide.

The steep and slippery valley took me to a highway. Yes, I was lost. But my colleague, nowhere, although I was still transfixed by the vision of a "halfway" meeting. I didn't hear anything, I didn't see any movement in the forest. It was impossible to turn back, the mud and the slippery hill did not allow me to return. Intuition told me to run forward, not to stop, not to get cold, to catch up with the time lost in an ambiguous wandering. Finally, I reached the finish line.

But my colleague, nowhere. Where was she? Was she still running through the woods? More and more runners were arriving at the finish line, but I couldn't see her. Half an hour, an hour, two hours, she still didn't show up. The "tragic" feeling was by no means excluded by the vision of an accident, a gloomy scenario, but it was also not confused with the truce made between nature and human will. The combination of the vision and the tragic seemed to be more fully operated in a gloomy engraving by Ion Panaitescu, with the title "Letea Forest", which accentuates the chiaroscuro of an entrance into a setting too strange to be remembered.

Leadership: Can you maintain full awareness of your soul essence if you construct an image whose reality can only be rendered by a double comparison?

My participation in this scenario was complete, according to an exceedingly disturbing expectation. As for the fundamental limitation I was facing, continuously and without any spark of hope lighting up in my heart oppressed by the burden of guilt I attributed to myself, this constituted a denial of my soul essence, in the sense that what I it troubled me enormously, discouraged me completely, demobilized me, overwhelmed me, hardened me.

A double comparison put my soul to the test: the way I felt at the beginning and during the race, VERSUS the way I felt now. The runner's disappearance was a total mystery.

From a comfortable inner soul, suddenly a restless spirit is born. My mind was assailed with anxieties and questions, testing my faith springing from an Espersuthar Certrhis Serchomis, the awareness of a soul wound, the vibration of a positive emotion of the "host" soul. It was a gloomy picture, a fact that tortured my imagination with all kinds of possibilities. It was the same state of silent suffering that a character in the novel Daniel Martin, written by John Fowles, addressed:

"I wanted to hear her voice, and her voice to remind me of a simpler, less oppressive present. Somehow, to draw an unprejudiced parallel between prevention and finding the consequences. That must have been my great dilemma: the fear of not once more seeing my own feelings and judgments deceived. As if the feelings I had attributed to her, and my own feelings had taken on contradictory forms by virtue of a double comparison: on the one hand I was tempted by the mystery, on the other I was too tense, touched by an unknown guilt. Yet I saw a resemblance there, at that moment, between the two separate experiences, hers and mine. Strange, like an invisible hand, reaching out and yet soothing me."

Leadership: Does the image that breaks your heart make you ignore the finitude of your self because of a chiaroscuro that more strongly than ever suggests "freezing" in an acute present?

The possibility of conjugation with the tragic feeling, like a bullet just out of the barrel, existed in my mind and made its way into an image that I had never imagined as real. Or was it just a trick that life uses to chloroform clean consciences, those that refuse to close their eyes to attempts to unify all contrasts on a unitary axiomatic foundation? I say this because my very face had become a mask of suffering and regret, oriented towards the guilt of not having been strong enough to quell my ambition to always be ahead.

Remorse is a deadly poison to the soul, especially if the soul is not comforted by good news. And I, myself being the alternative of a world where the story seems forbidden, I, the one for whom a single heart knocked at the door of consciousness, leaving room for it to enter the prayer addressed to the guardian angel, causing a small bleeding at the spirit level, yes, I reproached myself for not being sufficiently prudent.

No one knew what was happening in my soul, because no one sees what the soul experiences in a chiaroscuro that suggests more meaningfully than ever the "freezing" in an acute present.

The runner's friends had already notified the competition organizers of her strange and unexpected disappearance. In the end, I understood that she got lost like me, on the other side of the freeway that led to the center of the city. She reached her relatives safely. Two days have passed since then. I haven't heard anything from her. But I still got a message this morning, the palpable present appearing before me again, making me feel the vibration of a distant but unforgettable emotion: "I'm sorry we didn't cross the finish line together. We'll see each other again at the competition in April."

The finitude of the self is a detachment from your previous positive versions, an annulment of the attachment to the past, to the exterior, the course of your present no longer having those creative virtues whose summation represents a beautiful character.

The Eye Sees Only What The Soul Wants To See when you are in the ambiguous situation of choosing between what is known as opposed to what is unknown, or between the reproach that conscience brings you and the real sharing of feelings.

Don't forget: The path your present follows depends on how you measure your soul's burden.

The Eye With Which The Gaze Pursues Itself

By observing nature, its processes, and the emotions it arouses within one's self, man learns to observe himself.

I returned home last night after a short getaway to the mountains. Just as I entered the courtyard, in the semi-darkness outside, I was greeted by the scribbled and crowded buds of a rose bent to the ground by the weight of the snow. They could only be a mystery that I could not comprehend in all its complexity, because they seemed to tell me about the dependence on sensations and states from the 'tree' of any life that intersects with mine.

And there was something so sad about their appearance, a chill of the soul conceived in the image and likeness of the man who looked at them, carrying a kind of intense antipathy to the incredibly gray sky. They looked as if they were the realistic reflection in the mirror of my inner life, intersected with the life of the painter who knows nothing but admiration for the height of expression, but overlooks those abstract entities whose senses can be ignited.

And there was something else that turned my gaze to them, I don't know what sense of appreciation that inevitably links art to the concept of responsibility. For a moment, I tried to overcome the artist's protective attitude towards his own creation, to revise my strict attitude towards a reason for doubt, without renouncing the exacerbated attributes of the self that wanted to overlook a rarity, a whim of nature. As a result, I got a personification of nature in a being that got stuck in tears and colorless smiles...

Leadership: Can your feelings become forms of self-expression, through experiences of spiritual fusion aimed at expressing a caring attitude toward the symbols of nature?

Rose buds never think of what a painting has to say, but they don't seem to shudder at the feeling of my heart trembling in the face of an atmosphere saturated with worldly, egotistical, and selfish attributes. They are overwhelmed by the weight of the snow, feeling defeated, hurt, forgotten, overwhelmed by contradictory feelings in which the ugliness of their unpleasant appearance, hard to capture in words, plays a key role in defining forms of expression of emotions, such as sadness, fear, anger, grief, anxiety, despair, or irritability.

Therefore, the emotions extracted from a desolate, touching, pathetic appearance, which show a certain interconnection between "sfumato" and "chiaroscuro", between the layer of reality and that of the memory of piety and prayer, evoked by symbols, can become forms of self-expression. Observing nature, the emotions it wears in the moods of the rose, suspended at the border between white and gray, the artist manages to create hyper-realistic portraits, so honest and emotional, immobilized in the space of themes such as "My Values".

The rose is the symbol of my inner transformation, it is the symbol of the creators of new worlds, it is the symbol of an assumption of nature of the species interioritatis.

"The ugliness of their appearance will revive the form of an impossible separation from myself", the artist says to himself when no emotion runs through his heart, or when no experience of God's presence crosses the threshold of his existence. But at a glance at my appearance, you may think that I am a Christian, with all my appearance that defies any sociological construct, any attempt to fit patterns, any rule of time.

In fact, this means marking a symbol with strong emotions: "To admire your soul in sorrow, as if you were catching a desert rose in the middle of an oasis that, in fact, does not exist."

Leadership: Can your creation reveal that sentimental emotional memory that held back and captured everything that ever happened in an essential resemblance to the soul of nature?

The rose. Looking at it, just looking at it, you are amazed by the unspeakable simplicity of the composition, enjoying especially the passion that breathes from all that monumental canvas on which the painting will be rendered, giving way to another lasting aesthetic expression. Thus begins a new creative stage in the life of a great artist. With the gaze...

Honorably, faithfully, I realized that between the artist and the rose, between me and the model of a figure laden with gravity and sadness (and in which signs of suffering can be discerned), there is only one resemblance: we see each other, but we do not shine.

Somehow, my gaze turns to the specifics of the sensation of depth, by juxtaposing the spots of color and using cold and warm colors. In this case, the rose provides inspiration to one of the concrete ways of relating between the creator and the man endowed with the quality of being a speaker, through an Asterversindo, the great force of simplicity by which the degree of expressiveness of the image painted with a combination of white-gray associates the act of reflecting humanistic ideals.

The moment I look at it intently, with admiration, with warm eyes, in the immensity of the creative absolute, I say that this rose has given me a real life lesson: that you never know yourself better than when you are put down.

The rose is completely different from itself, from the one that was once so familiar to me. A kind of rare shyness, unusual in its nature, seems to control itself, feeling as if overwhelmed by a presentiment whose motive, as yet, I cannot discern. And it tells me with that rare, hidden, silent look you meet at any painter who has forgotten his true center of the eternal being: "Sadness is the expression of the purest sincerity that has ever adorned the soul of a Christian."

The great work of Creation aims at the spiritual fusion of the human being with the incarnation of a soul of nature. It unites with leadership when the artist experiences the feelings of a self-discovery in an image whose symbol can be translated as: wisdom and understanding.

The Eye With Which The Gaze Pursues Itself ensures the passage of deep emotions along an image that tries through the sensitive to penetrate the intelligible. For example, the expression of sight that is manifested by the tears of the eyes, refers to that act of educating sensitivity – authentically transposed into an artistic construction that depicts the most hidden part of the life of the human spirit included in the higher, divine plan.

The Eyes Always Follow The Call Of Sight

The further you see, the deeper you look into yourself.

Art is a return to nature, in an authentic and elegant way, as in a kind of continuous trance in which symbols dance in their chaos through an image that hardly reveals its secrets, mysteries. Even more than that, considering that Casenuvis Excertyy Abbasitual, the mystery and the absolute captured in an image of amazing beauty, art is a return to emotion in the communication of a message that surprises again and again: "I am experiencing a return to the essence of what I am: half man, half spirit".

No one would believe me, but I recognized my artistic side looking out over the Black Sea, at the beginning or end of the day, not knowing where the sky ends and where the sea begins. For example, I looked at everything with the measure of the eye that does not change its image on the retina, that does not let itself be defeated by the routine of a perfect morning or by the conditions of extremely low light, corresponding to a night without a moon in the sky. And, so many times, I felt like I was in a movie in reverse, how lost experiences are catching up with me...

And if I shall return here, summer after summer, every time the sun sends its burning rays from the vault of heaven, and if I shall only remember myself absorbing all the charms of romance in the light of a boundless vision, it is because the fact that a horizon of incomprehension is always active here, in the context of the human-nature relationship. And in the context of desire and passion, nothing is more emotional than the vigorous realism of the image that reveals itself. Those who want to discover this horizon in themselves are welcome alongside me.

Leadership: Can your creation be treated as a kind of meta-image – the image of an image, in such a way that your visual area reconstitutes the permanence of an experience approached in a superior way?

I look, I color images, and I can't get enough. The sand is carried far from the shore in a horizon of creation where direct observation and intellectual processing are concurrent and inseparable, as a kind of empowerment of sight to encompass not only a wider space, but also a time of life vibrant and lived adventurously. The waves always offer you great views that delight your eyes and poeticize your senses, and the wind and waves are always on the side of skilled sailors.

To quantify the impact of the relationship between sea and sand on the influence my visual direction has on the art of activating emotions, I will consider the point of view of a character in H.G. Wells' work:

"Thousands of nebulous, meaningless thoughts swirled through my head. I repeated the experience over and over in my mind. With my fevered brain, I dreamed that things around me were falling apart, disappearing in the mist, becoming invisible, until everything, even the ground beneath legs, begins to consume. One thought dwelt in my brain: my work must be carried to the end ! I was still possessed by my fixed idea. And I must do it soon."

In the same way, I reflect my experiences and express my gratitude towards the visual representation of the most special project in my life so far: to voluntarily enroll myself on the slope of an eternal return, in the curve of a never-the-same repetition, in the loop of an eternal present, always new and forever the same. And even if the things around me fall apart, get lost in the fog, become invisible, longing (the consequence of affective memory) remains alive forever in me. It stays awake, always growing.

Leadership: Taking as a model a true artistic theme, can you build a coherent, stable and consistent image, as it appears between two infinities?

The sea stretches further and further until it approaches the consistency of wet sand near a distant and untouchable shore. Moreover, taking as a model a true artistic theme, Un brandello in un universo sconfinato, I myself begin to be part of the image of the sea, as it appears contained between two infinities: "the sublime to the superlative" and "an extension of emotions beyond time".

I think that in art, the finite can be represented by means of a view far removed from the real, but arranged in the present tense, in that it appears in no other way than being itself placed in a transparent environment of the full freedom of the spirit, in the dimension of the artistic sublime, where nothing is fleeting, but remains forever in memory.

And when this happens, when everything seems fascinating as in a dream painting, I am faced with a kind of intensity of my inner image, a kind of intuitive prescience of a message without messengers. My heart is pounding. I tell myself that there is no point in waiting any longer in a place that seems frozen in time. So I try to forget about myself, the sea, the sand, the waves, the breeze that caresses my cheeks and cools me down.

Slowly, slowly, I turn my gaze elsewhere, but my eyes insistently ask me, my heart orders me without letting its feelings come to the surface: "Don't move away from what you feel. You can't run away from yourself, leaving behind the memories !"

Leadership occurs when the image that inspires you and that will make you say "Wow, how cool", helps you to express your feelings in a creative way through the following reasoning: "the further you see, the more you see deep inside you."

The Eyes Always Follow The Call Of Sight when you are looking for an image of permanence, of a strange experience of an artistic consciousness. And how do I see myself? I see myself with the eyes of a painter who transforms everything he sees into a story picture. In fact, every day spent on the Black Sea coast becomes a memory immortalized in another painting, with another story.

The Eyes Are An Authentic Testimony Of The Creative Endeavour

What you look at with insistence is the thing with which you identify your emotions on multiple planes of perception.

I'm looking at a surrealist drawing right now. It depicts the face of a woman, rendered with great expressiveness in red, green and purple colors, originating from the imagination of an artist who, in the center of his spontaneous look at reality, found a new form of expression of the symbolic vision. So the artist's drawing, for the simple pleasure of looking, expresses through a momentary and subjective vision the reality of a vision derived from finding a form of imagination which, without being in danger of ever being exhausted, is so, so, so real, alive, current in the light of a surrealist approach.

Will it be an autofiction in the form of a surreal exploration of memory? And does she retain anything intact from the memories thus reiterated? And if the pure sign of the image, the means of elaborating and communicating significant information, is elevated to the rank of symbol through the imaginary of the woman, then the thing with which I identify on multiple levels of perception (especially those of metaphorical reference) is a portion of the real world susceptible to be assimilated in the name of a revealed continuity that the stylistic rigor advertises.

First, my higher personality is reflected on the plane of symbolic reality, in an indefinite succession of other worlds, without memory of the previous one. The woman's face looks a lot like a kind of Mona Lisa of postmodern times, totally different from the original, but similar because of the eyes that look at you from every angle. And on the second plane, the a priori memory of a feeling of bliss, closeness of soul and the feeling of being something special, as a result of the transposition of a sensation of illusion, mystery and metaphysical energy, on the plane of another sensation, of naturalness and captivating casualness, persists.

Leadership: Can the thing on which you focus your attention be perceived through a visual representation that is real as long as it is assumed in the imaginary of a world "beyond" you?

Therefore, the necessary condition for the sublime in art is not the absence of the form of knowledge (sensible) of the image focused in the lens of the eye, as it is perceived by a creator who simply throws himself, in complete safety, on the wings of the things that he alone built. More important is the ability to sift the truth of fabrication at a glance, so that the eyes themselves are an authentic testimony of the creative endeavor, beyond any passing from observation to generalization.

Even the drawing looks at me insistently, just as I look at it, because its eyes are hidden in the memory of the soul of the one who created it. Obviously, there is also that invention of the arbitrariness from which visibly emanates the thematic diversity, new vibrations of the sensitive soul, especially the light of a new reason, due to the eternal action of the act of absolute knowledge. In this case, the active eye has done its duty as a correct translator of reality, and, being endowed by nature with a rich spirit of observation, it cannot overlook the immense error connected with the perception of things that do not exist in reality.

That's how it is. I try to enter with my soul a natural and at the same time surrealistic painting, belonging to a revealing reality, described in the imaginary of an alternative memory, suggested, intuited, but which is not very well understood, because it highlights the idea that the future exists only for an illusory present. It is as if I were investigating the mysteries of a world "on its last legs", almost ready to be perceived with the eyes of the sublime as a kind of Anonarona Restys Artomodus, living through artistic representation, an opening to the mystery of self-knowledge and the possibility of living in the light of a higher knowledge.

Leadership: Do you manage to reproduce a self-image faithful to an archetypal reality, be it illusory, based on the consideration that "leaving from one place, you arrive at another"?

Yes, looking at the drawing with that light of the soul that penetrates the mysteries of a masterpiece, the female form between symbol and representation, I feel that pleasant rigor, of the perfectly finished detail. And this rigor, which makes it difficult to accept the idea of "perfection in utopia", presented in a dream image as a kind of integral exercise for the brain, becomes a constructive moment of the form of artistic expression, a relationship of symmetry with the self's intention to know a higher ideal of beauty, putting in first place the idea of reinterpretation and reconstruction of reality.

And by constantly looking at the drawing, absorbing the beauty of the woman's face, thus starting in search of a wider horizon of artistic expression, I remember what Alexandre Dumas said in "The Three Musketeers":

"Nothing makes time pass so quickly, and nothing shortens the path you travel, as a thought that absorbs the whole being of the thinker. All the surrounding breath is like a sleep, and the thought like a dream. Thanks to this thought which is together with you, time loses its measure and space its distances. You leave from one place, you arrive at another, that's all. From the entire journey, nothing remains in your mind but a chaotic fog, in which thousands of unclear incarnations disappear: views and memories."

And that's why I'm attracted to the drawing, different from other vague incarnations: because when I look at the woman's face, gentle, all smiles, with eyes that treat sensitivity beyond a wave of shyness, I experience every second as a miracle. However, I look at the woman's face, as a kind of penetration into the depth of an unknown space, I feel in any of her looks that she gives everything to the depth of the symbolic horizon. And if I dared to understand her better, as the artist tried to reproduce her in his reality, and if she could confess her thoughts, she would say only this: "The eyes that look at me are the eyes that reflect the beauty of divine creation."

In leadership, as in art, the ability to see a thing that makes you think about something, beyond the impression the thing itself makes on your senses, is important.

The Eyes Are An Authentic Testimony Of The Creative Approach because they capture two realities that always intersect: a reality that marks the depths of the beholder's soul, therefore perceived with the help of the senses, passed through sensitivity. And a reality that, precisely because it uses the symbol, the comparison, often the abstract, has the gift of purifying and uplifting the viewer spiritually. Let's not forget that the act of creation means, first of all, the transposition of the future self into the present self.

Try to translate yourself into what you feel when you look at a drawing and identify yourself with these feelings. Can you?

The Eyes Capture Moments That Become Turning Points In Personal Reflection

On November 18, 2024

Focusing on a seemingly minor gesture can reveal the hidden shadows of consciousness, especially if the lights and shadows that the eyes capture help shape the real essence of the world.

In the search for absolute victory, there are moments when destiny puts in your way all kinds of trials that transcend sports performance, turning the race into a mirror of your own consciousness. I look to the mountain horizon as the moral drama unfolds before my eyes. In the stillness of the morning, I notice how another runner, one of the most admired for his astonishing performances, injects something into his thigh, hidden behind a car in the semi-deserted parking lot. I don't know what it is, but the shock of discovering this freezes my breath, turning the cold mountain air into a heavy burden.

It was as if the entire universe had come into focus in a moment of painful clarity, a kind of 'Aieaasid Ymphiaedrese', a moral revelation that transcended the boundaries of the accepted normal. The image of this athlete-light, suddenly turned into a shadow, awakens in me a whirlwind of contradictory emotions. On the one hand, appearances can be deceiving; on the other hand, I think I don't know what health problems he might have. It may be a necessary medical procedure related to diabetes or other conditions. However, I can't help but wonder if this is illegal steroid use. I then watch as he arranges his equipment with precise gestures, seemingly unfazed by the weight of his dark secret. I don't know if it's good or bad; I'm just saying that I didn't expect such a moment.

Instantly, a new word is born in my soul: "truthful" - the one who carries the burden of the unspoken truth, like a guardian of sports ethics who watches in silence. Being relatively close to him, having become an involuntary witness of this scene, I feel how the responsibility of this newly discovered role presses on my shoulders with its moral weight. I understand that in sports you are required to take vitamins and other supplements because the physical demands of the mountain are extremely intense every time you compete, trying to push your limits. It is indeed advisable to supplement properly, but there is also that old saying: "measure by measure".

Leadership: How do you turn the moment you discover the painful truth into an opportunity to demonstrate that integrity and compassion can coexist in the spirit of genuine competition?

Every unnoticed gesture of others can become a catalyst for introspection. Especially since beyond any appearance lies a hidden truth. I say this in the conditions where the moral conscience guides my steps, decisions, thoughts, through a kind of tacit understanding, without resorting to hasty judgments. In the end, this too is a kind of ethical challenge, a test of character that makes me wonder where the line between justice and compassion lies. This moral dilemma reminds me of a disturbing passage in Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment:

"There is no more distressing situation than when a moral man discovers the only truth valid for him, namely, that he is compelled to do evil in order to produce good. The whole world then becomes a problem. You have to be very strong and very integrity not to give in to the temptation to do the lesser evil to avoid the greater evil."

These words seem to come alive before my eyes, lighting the way to a deeper understanding. Although, I still wonder if I'm judging too harshly. No, it's not just about what my eyes catch at unexpected moments, so that they become silent witnesses, so-called uninvolved, indifferent, neutral. Rather, it is about how I can transform the moral understanding, so that the eyes can easily navigate through the complexity of bizarre events, knowing that thoughtless actions can destroy destinies, even if they temporarily constitute an artificial incentive for mountain races. Of course, the mirror of consciousness reflects better than any podium the true value of man, but also of the victory achieved (in one way or another).

Once again, I feel the ancestral wisdom of the mountain whispering to me: "La montagna non tradisce mai" - the mountain never betrays. Only we mortals are constantly caught between conflicting loyalties and principles.

Leadership: In moments when you alone carry the burden of a truth that can change the perspectives of competitors, how do you maintain the balance between justice and compassion?

En el silencio del amanecer , the footsteps lead me to the shadow of the runner pierced by the intensity of my vision. His gaze meets mine, witnessing them, and for a split second, the veil of supreme illusion rises between us. It is a kind of mystical game of fate, where every move could change the trajectory of understanding from the material plane to the plane of revelation.

This meeting of the eyes reminds me of an old Japanese story about a samurai who, discovering that his master was using forbidden techniques, chose to give him the chance to retire with honor rather than publicly denounce him. The master, impressed by the disciple's compassion, admitted his mistake and later became a teacher of martial arts ethics. Certainly, any look around can reveal a story that defies appearances, some hidden truths inviting us to reflect on the boundaries between judgment and compassion.

Basically, the universe is giving me the same choice now. In my warm but firm voice, I share with the runner what I have seen and, more importantly, what I feel. "Is everything ok? Can I help you with something?" I don't accuse him, I don't judge him - I offer him a bridge to rehabilitation, a way back to the pure essence of sport. Maybe I misunderstood. For beyond appearances, each person carries the burden of invisible struggles, and eye contact with an ambiguous action can transform the perception of that person.

Leadership: How can a simple hidden gesture become the gateway to a deeper understanding of human nature in the context of competitive pressure, simultaneously with the responsibility to protect the values of one's spiritual self?

The secrets of ultimate balance manifest in the most unexpected ways, don't they? During our discussion, I notice how the stiffness in his posture gradually melts away. Silent tears run down his cheeks as he reveals to me the constant pressure he lived under, the fear of failure, the obsession with performance at all costs. It was about supplements with a quick effect of soothing muscle pains, as a result of some spinal conditions, nothing else. More precisely, he had administered an injectable solution, "Neuromultivit" from Lannacher, which mainly contains three vitamins from the vitamin B complex: vitamins B1, B6 and B12. He showed me the ampoule box and I remembered the name.

What the eyes see is sometimes only the beginning of a deeper discovery. Contemplating this transformation, I understand that the ultimate victory is not measured in medals or records. It is measured in the moments when we choose to be human, when we speak the truth, when we extend a hand to the fallen, when we offer a chance at moral rehabilitation, or when we choose to understand instead of judge. This moment becomes not just a lesson about sports, but a lesson about life itself.

Looking towards the peaks of the mountains that surround us, I realize that here, in this sacred space of nature, something more valuable than any trophy was born – the understanding that true greatness lies in the ability to see beyond appearances and choose the path of compassion was born.

Leadership manifests itself in the ability to transform moments of crisis into opportunities for collective growth, where victory is no longer about being first, but about being whole and inspiring positive transformation in others.

The two most important values of the spiritual self are: integrity and compassion.

The eyes capture moments that become turning points in personal reflection , especially when you notice unspoken suffering, from which arises the need for genuine empathy. When the truth becomes a burden, how do you choose between silence and justice?

The answer lies in that subtle zone where compassion meets principle, where we understand that each soul carries its own struggles. It is the moment when we realize that the greatest act of courage is not to point the finger at someone else's mistake, but to give them the support they need to find their way back to authenticity.

The Eyes Eagerly Search For The Essence Of Authentic Living

Learn to set in motion the active process of understanding "who you were, who you are, and who you will be" at a time when you cannot hide from yourself, nor can you keep your distance from what affects you.

Dusk was not visible on the horizon. In the eyes of the runners one could feel, spreading like a wave, a kind of muted oppressiveness, without rules, a kind of emptiness polished with discretion, a new beginning that you wish no one knew about, an amplification through a calming effect of the battle fought – each only with himself. Although there was something heavenly, clouds full of steam, lightning full of power, a little rain of that kind, everything was mixed with something earthly, but not with the creative fire, not with the cry of victory, but with the sense of caution which, however, seemed to be an acute one.

And this shaky state, tormented by the forecast of unstable weather, whose "modus operandi" was based on subliminal thoughts caused by the pressure of a discomfort produced by excessive humidity, did not really show signs of passing quickly. I should have introduced myself to the illustrations of a book that comes to life as thoughts begin to be colored, and perhaps only then will my self-image be the light of others' eyes.

The severity of feeling, that was it. Fighting the last resistance of the forces within, Disfurethis-Asprintyr, the gift of separating what is truly important from what you know for sure is being forgotten, with all the negatives. This fight could make reality swing between the blue pill and the red pill, just like in the movie Matrix. The first pill denotes the illusion of a horizon only half visible, under a vast black sky full of clouds. The other pill denotes the revelation of a truth we possess but are unaware of.

Leadership: Can you find your long-dreamed-of glory through the force of fire directed at yourself, in a specific way of "individualized totality" that you only see in the intense experience of a special moment?

What I could clearly see in all the runners was the explanation of a phenomenon that everyone avoids, Datisporthis, a moment when we learn the truth proven by reality, when we can no longer hide or hide it. Namely, that everything varies depending on the circumstances and the results. No runner felt at ease, for no one seemed to belong to himself, but to the conditions which the miserable weather had already decided before the start of the marathon.

Even the smallest change in nature, the smallest ray of sunshine, would have brought joy and hope to everyone's soul, increasing the chances that the victory would be quick and complete. But it was not to be. The weather seemed harsher and harsher, like a slowly releasing, punishing whip. And precisely this reversal of plans belongs to the runners' originality: through their own intense experiences, with each difficult ascent and descent, they learn to conquer life.

In reality, each runner represents an "individualized whole" because each has his own emotional filter with which he perceives the world around him and that, in fact, the world is a projection of his own ideals, visions, thoughts, abilities.

Leadership: Can you maintain yourself in the highest form at the end of a struggle that took place within you and which represents the projection of your own possibilities of experiencing the situations in which you find yourself as a "deep identity"?

A deep identity is an active process of understanding "who you were, who you are and who you will be" at a time when you cannot hide from yourself, nor can you keep a distance from what affects you.

Just like in art, where the finesse of the drawing emerges from the chromatic effects and from the motto of the suggested theme, such as: "Lucid intuitions, deep in the soul", in the same way the Running contest is usually related to the notion of Surodinnoah Sterres (the attempt to overcome all barriers) through the belonging of the soul to the finesse of a luminous sensitivity, difficult to signal in the moment before the start.

And where does sensitivity come from in some athletic bodies? It arises from the feeling of arriving at that place where the sun shines intensely, regardless of the weather: on the podium steps. In fact, when I talk about sensitivity, this spiritual horizon that our soul feels in solidarity, I think of the words of Stefan Zweig: "Everyone commits acts that exceed their will, only to reach the extreme limit of their feelings."

What constitutes the impetus of their actions appears to me somewhat clear, not only because they tried to prove at least to themselves what they are: an avalanche of emotions and turmoil, but because they somehow tried to revive that glorious and secular tradition of sportsmanship from us in the country, just as an artist with a colorful soul revives any old garment through painting.

Important in leadership is what you feel when you manage to reach that deep space within you that recommends you as "a memory that passes from one generation to another".

The Eyes Eagerly Search For The Essence Of Authentic Living when the runner experiences a new perspective of approaching the finish line under the irrepressible impulse of recalling significant moments from which a high-impact story is concluded.

Predominantly here is the much-dreamed-of glory of a runner who is not only concerned with crossing the finish line, in first place, but with perpetuating his success in the memory of the old days.

The Eyes Express Their Admiration For The Seen And Unseen

You will not be able to discover the greatness of an ideal horizon, without perceiving the "shaking" of an image projected in the memory of a cyclical time.

To capture the most spectacular images of the sea, you need a camera that can offer as many pixels as possible in an image. But you need something else to enrich the universe of art: you need to create the premise of a futuristic world that is governed by a strict order. Seeking to clarify this, along with the promise that I will not change too much my perception of any present event, to which is added the connotation of a state of adoration, but also regret for the irreversible passage of time, my gaze took the place of the gaze of a enlightener whose creative reason can transgress the temptations of poetic artifices.

The image of the sea, capturing not only simple moments, but many details, can be found in the eye-opening sequence towards the scope of a singular artistic representation, a message, an idea, such as the existence of a futuristic world governed by a strictly visual order, at the same time broadening the horizon of a gaze whose imagination is always turned on to superstitions, to belief in the supernatural. Everything I experience, momentary passions or long imaginary obsessions, the situations I pass by, even the thrill of crossing a gap in reality, all are lost behind a skeptical and indifferent look that seems to want to encompass in one moment what can be lost in a too busy setting.

And yet, something unspoken, confusing, unexpected, but somehow essential, a feeling that constantly accompanies me beyond the sight of my eyes, turns my reality upside down. That's why the image in front of my eyes seems to "tremble", as if it were projected in the memory of a cyclical time in which the sea becomes a mirror that is always current and outside of time.

And this fact is due to the alternative balancing option of some distinct visual elements (shadow of objects, overlap of images), which are not necessarily meant to beautify the horizon, each having a slightly different shade of the same basic color, but which nevertheless seem to continue a world view. And this vision requires you to understand it, to feel it, to experience it on the stage of your own life, as an active spectator, experiencing different roles – from painter to scenographer, and from observer to artist.

Leadership: Can the aesthetic perception of the images generated by the visual acuity of your eyes manifest itself through the action of finding an ideal horizon in which the profile of a vast work can be seen?

Do you see how beautiful her face is when she tenderly mirrors her shining eyes in the colors of the clear summer sky? Very often, her eyes denote the typical characteristics of a relaxing color, but they can also be variants of the fundamental nocturnal color, which seems to have an important role on the viewer in the aesthetics of the world in constant transformation, just as the painting on the mirror conveys power and gives the viewer an active role, who thus has the opportunity to be part of a work of art.

Yes, the sea is beautiful, because its captivating eyes, which I love and want next to me every day, shining with freedom above the waves, do not stop seeing my own reality.

Then I see her again with the eyes of my soul, kind, merciful and full of love, for days on end, with the risk of sinking into melancholy, into that pious, holy melancholy, which seems to awaken the sight of a great temple, full of legends, fallen into ruins. And whenever I remember the waves of the sea and the aromas that smell clean, the white sand that makes the sea seem clear, I realize that I am more fragile than the sand that it washes away with a breath. The very process of remembering is the fruit of an authentic, living and natural feeling, the artistic embodiment of a high ideal, not a simple artistic photograph of the occasion.

Well, the man whose fundamental vision is based on aspiration and desire for the reintegration of difference into unity, will know how to see a grain of sand in a single wave, starting from any individual subject. He will count every wave, like every grain of sand, as one and the same, one with all in the absolute plane. On this occasion, the revelation of a new beauty admired in this soothing proximity to the sea, which the Surrealists call Esthesis Inisth Argostich (beauty as a chance encounter), is due to the mixture of the aesthetic interpretation of a dreamy, nostalgic, glamorous image, and the visual power exacerbated by vivid, intense, vibrant colors that give life to art through flashes of light.

Leadership: Does your creation express a ratio of proportionality between the effects of two opposite phenomena that highlight the length of mathematical reasoning: "decrease – increase"?

There is another way to clarify this causal relationship between sea and sky, between sand dunes and ocean waves, especially if we compare two different sciences, such as mathematics and music. Mathematics cannot renounce what is real and will always represent only what is ideal in space. While music, viewed as a manifestation of the spirit, also has a real extension, but it is subordinated more to reflection, to inclusion in the artistic plane, thus profiling itself as something particular and, as such, can be taken up in the plane of the universal. And even if painting is an art of fine taste, depending on light and chiaroscuro, it is entirely ideal if it is constituted as an object of open reflection, or as a language of the spirit manifested through images and through the succession of ideas.

In this case, my judgment will have to reach where the sea meets the caress of the sun, as an artistic exposition of the infinite in the finite. And hearing, as a form of perception of the voice whispered by the voice of a nymph, through the perception of signals from the environment, being a sense located above the spirit of observation, offers the possibility to receive and interpret the waves of the sea waves in perfect silence, especially the way they vibrate when they hit the shore, humming the majestic hymn of freedom, of immortality, a hymn of reconciliation with the blows of destiny.

Is it not so? Unlike sight, where finitude or difference appears only as an allegory of the infinite, hearing now appears as an increase in visual acuity. Hear the song of the sea better as you see deeper into the horizon. But for that you have to adopt a flexible attitude towards the flow of life, a fact that makes an artist manifest his personality in real time, in his compositional ideas, trying to find himself in a unique painting inspired by real events. He must feel the emotion from that time, the sensations that are born in himself, to build an unforgettable moment.

In this case, realism comes to anticipate the superior ideal unity of the artist, who is the "beautiful visionary" in the sphere of the multiple moments of admiration of the sea, while it crosses distant borders...

An artistic creation can have the length of mathematical reasoning: "decrease – increase" only if the constituent elements of your visual experiences follow the path established by the idea: between the finite and the infinite there is always a field of undefined extent.

Nor do I believe that there is proportion or gradation between the finite and the infinite.

There is an absolute pause, a leap over the space of the dispute between light and darkness, between life and death...

The Eyes Express Their Admiration For The Seen And Unseen when the artist is able to capture both the depth of a space stranger than one would think, but free as the sea is, as well as the extent of a horizon within which something can suddenly appear surprising.

The Eyes Filter Reality According To The Inner Artistic Vision

The visual focus alternates between near and far, reflecting the intensity of inner experience that oscillates between immediate effort and the big picture.

I feel an intense sense of freedom as I run downhill, leaving behind all the worries and stress of everyday life. The feeling of freedom in a runner, during the mountain competition, becomes a "Kinetic Azenthopia", a state of grace in motion, a kind of kinetic ecstasy, in an approach on the line of becoming. It's just me, the mountain and the path I follow among nature's obstacles, illuminated by the strongest spotlights of glory, marked by that creative euphoria that I share fully with the artist in me. This freedom turns into an art of movement, from the extension of an inner vision, where each step becomes a brush that paints on the canvas of my reality.

Somehow, I understand that I will not be able to make authentic art if I do not have enough lucidity, if I am not endowed with all the authenticity of thought and temperament typical of a creator in whom the curiosity of the search for truth tends to balance with the deep need to express the soul the atmosphere through which it passes. Of course, this is not the memory of a specific episode, but a relentless reflection on my power to transcend physical and mental limits, una especie de meditación existential en movimiento . Without obsessing over everything that can happen when reason loses control, along the way I became a Jackson Pollock of my own existence, sprinkling the canvas of reality with energy, or rather I chanted an "Ankh Onnubbal" - an eternal call to overcome self.

What you see when you look at yourself with the eyes of an artist is what the body demonstrates as an expression of indomitable will. My struggle with knee-deep mud, contrasted with the purity of inner suction, was the lightning that ignited the entire drawing of my canvas. While the ragged shape of the runner's "suit" recalls an expressionist background, an emotional explosion of colors and abstract shapes that reflect the inner state of the artist, where physical reality merges with my inner experience. My eyes were free to look at the black spots on my feet, triggering in me a kind of artistic revelation of the "beauty in imperfection" type, but my spirit remained dominated by the values of perseverance and self-improvement.

Leadership: Can the intensity of a unique sensation become for you a proof of the existence of a work of art, so that the experience of running turns into a living metaphor of the creative process?

On this arduous route, I was able to give the feelings (charged in the face of a unique event) the power to form a symbolic pictorial correspondent in my spirit. At the same time, the effort of my soul was not only to produce adrenaline, by facing the physical challenges of the race, but to achieve a state of grace in the midst of chaos, also one with artistic transcendence. The runner thus becomes a kind of seeker of the physical determinism that regulates the phenomenon of beauty in art, a good connoisseur of the relationship between sensation and energy, a result of the actualization of organic energy in the face of external challenges. In the end, the intensity of a unique sensation - that of transcendence through effort - becomes the bond that unites the runner, the artist and the viewer in a trinity of pure aesthetic experience.

And you, the viewer, in what marathon of the spirit are you engaged in? What obstacles shape your path to your own existential masterpiece?

It is obvious. I felt irresistibly drawn to the theme of "running," which even now reflects a mirror of my inner emotions, through the prism of effort and perseverance. For their part, the other runners, with their nerves stretched to the limit, seemed fleeting shadows, a projection of of the duality of the human being, as they struggled between the physical limitations and the aspirations of the spirit. But only the artist distinguished himself from the crowd of competitors, because he saw the beauty in the struggle itself being in perfect harmony with nature, with the cosmic rhythm of existence, making every step a stroke on the canvas of life. His love for adventure, for discovery, made him look beyond the finish line to the endless horizon of affirmation possibilities. and creative.

The process of self-transcendence consoles and elevates the creative spirit. The writer Liviu Rusu was right when he said: "The work of art is therefore the work of the will. Through the creative act the artist affirms his will to overcome the primitive aspect of his nature. The greater his effort, the more the Ego feels consoled and Hence the stubbornness of the artist not to back down in the face of the difficulties on his way. On the contrary, the difficulties stimulate his will, they put it to the test. Therefore, the artist's will is hardened in the fire of trials, allowing him to create masterpieces out of suffering."

Leadership: Do you believe that your artistic approach is in the service of aesthetics, coming from the place where you found your true essence and authenticity?

The clarity with which the eyes are rendered contrasts with the diffuse background, emphasizing mental focus. Nothing could corrupt that youthful passion, that relentless desire to explore difficult terrain. Most certainly, my elan was an invitation to live the present, to cultivate an art that evokes reality in its most immediate forms, even if what I was experiencing exceeded the limits of the ordinary. What higher satisfaction could there be for an athlete than to be an ambassador of freedom, to contribute to the consecration of youth by personal example? What makes spirit overcome matter? Why is the will emerging as the supreme force?

In particular, the reflections in the eyes capture the essence of the environment, contextualizing the effort made. If I sit back and think about it, my work was a lesson in vitality, a demonstration of the strength of the human spirit to transcend any limit, in a gray setting that somewhat amplifies the inner colors. Or, rather, it was a chronicle about the courage not to be afraid, about the continuous struggle with the self and the elements of nature. This approach put in the service of aesthetics, came from that place where I found my true essence and authenticity, because art and life are inextricably intertwined.

I leave this moment in abeyance and open a parenthesis. Wasn't the race complicated because of the difficult course, because of the unseen potential of the runners? That failed attempt, embarrassing, caricature of effort in the mud? Why did we make this compromise? I had been warned, my conscience repeated it. To humble my own doubts? To feel my superiority over obstacles? Something in me left the impression that deep inside I had made my situation difficult, confused my steps, to prove that I could move with apparent harmony in the face of chaos. I still want to believe that this fight was a path to transcendence...

The efforts you feel when you dedicate yourself to leadership are subordinated to the situation where your superiority becomes imperative at the moment of creation.

Even in the most difficult moments, when you feel too tired to redouble your efforts, be prepared to fill a painting with the most expressive and lively touches.

The eyes filter reality according to the inner artistic vision when the gaze captures details unnoticed by others. I say this because understanding the subtleties of the outer world depends on the depth of our thoughts.

The Eyes Full Of Art Of A Life-Giving Rose

On May 14, 2020

You are a master in the mastery of art only if you have been given authority over the world of creation.

I was in the garden, trying to fight the good thoughts of those who are always watching over me. The roses, their green leaves, the fresh sprouted buds. I imagined that I was surrounded by living beings, detached from the very poetry of nature, from its unknown things, from its senses full of mystery, full of sea and wind, with which my reality and that of the whole world are delivered, in a beautiful story of the current state of things.

And I also know that in all this splendid garden, which was rather a cumulation of my attempts to define myself, but also to redefine myself, a single voice was always echoed in my thoughts, a sensitive voice full of compassion, full of expressiveness, which seemed to stir up the personal quality of a living being, repeating to me loudly: "A happy man is a skilled gardener."

Somehow, I think I was a kind of exception in the beautiful world of art, thinking of myself as the echo of a free entry into the space of nature, in a fabulous landscape, more like in a painting by Joachim Patenier, because everything that existed in my garden was an exception, like any other subjective equivalence. They were all pencil notes done with a master's pen, then outlined with a fine brush, full of life-giving colors in another plane of the staging of the universal Creation.

Perhaps, however, I am still an exception, being present in these well-crafted, well-felt lines, as the author of some thoughts transposed in a work of art, in a symbolized universe, through an effort to deepen the meaning given to the mystical word: Misarenkthiss, or the turn of the road that takes you to heaven. And if the art of my own existence resides in the conception of a universe suspended between dream and reality, the meaning of which is interpreted in the word "Sky", then it is justified as a whim of the gardener to be himself the reflection of nature in the consciousness of the world.

Leadership: Can the exceptional nature of your art be included in finalizing the shape of an allegory projected in a perfectly transparent image, with a message indicator: "Nothing changes without you changing"?

This is how we got from a garden full of roses, to a universe full of matter and radiation, full of stars and galaxies, full of spiritual and artistic significance. In the same way that Paracelsus explained to his disciple the mystery of the rose in the universal*: "If you were to throw this rose into the embers, you might think that the flames had completely consumed it and that the ashes were real. I tell you that the rose is eternal and that only its appearance can change. One word would be enough for you, then, to have it in front of your eyes again, under a different identity, in a different form."*

I suppose that a world that avoids at all costs the evocation of a story from a dream of nature, and that does not behave like an explosion of colors and intoxicating scents, in the month of May, is the very world of an ordinary mortal for whom everything is merely in a state of transience. Everything is possible only in the space of a Creator of universes, where the painter is a writer, and where the writer is a painter, both being compatible with the existence of an immortal alchemist, like Paracelsus, who knows how to cross worlds, space, time, being able to and preserves existence in a certain destiny, in every element of nature.

Paracelsus lives as a miracle of nature in the world of a pure rose, rare, very pleasing in appearance, cared for by a gardener as skilled as he is in alchemy. Also in the same world, of the repeated processes of distillation, crystallization, sublimation, evaporation, essential in the research of chemistry, in the global circuit of transfigured matter, one can see the existence of a skilled painter who knows how to considerably beautify the existence of a rose presented as symbols and seen as part of an inner space. But, also here, one can see the existence of a writer who knows how to give the symbol a characteristic image of the living man, a new name and a new appearance.

I'm not Paracelsus, but he's not like me either, because he can't talk about me the way I can talk about him as if about a rose that looks gorgeous and never withers. However, we both understood roses, their purity, their tenderness, he through the atomistic conception of matter and biological transmutation, I through the prism of art that often incorporates a reflection of ageless beauty, of a double personality in one person, in relation to the level of reflection of a shooting star that lasts a fraction of a second, but delights the eye every year.

Leadership: Does the image effect you imprint on your Creation take precedence over the effect of "synchronicity" marked by emphasizing your devotion to a reality approached from the perspective of an imaginary universe?

Together forever, and perhaps together we will change the dimensions of the world, of science, of art and of beauty. The rose, its leaves and buds form the essence of my being, the same essence that makes a painter an alchemist, and a writer a Creator of pure, living, evolutionary art, so that it integrates into the expressive equation of nature's perfection that part of a living being which exists before it came into the world, which dwells in the physical body during mortal life, and which exists after death, beyond the boundaries of the worlds.

The rose changes the color of its leaves, as its buds sprout with every whisper my heart tells me, with the pride of the most vital of meanings of my existence: Esyallestrum, representing a spiritual motivation applied in the experience of the art of representing the destiny of a flower on the path of the unity between language and thought, making it viable in the destiny of a man who is more than a man, he is an artist immersed in the adventures of alchemy, in its secrets, in the symbolism of the synchronicity between the harmony of nature and the universe.

I do not know if my rose, with its leaves and buds so vivid, so tender, so elegant, will be able to be visualized by you with the same gaze with which I supervise the sensitive field of art, developing a different way of thinking, without contradicting various theories, hypotheses or views previously expressed by other artists. I don't even know if the rose understands me, as I understand it, with that extremely sensitive, calm, patient sense of modeling, which is somewhat akin to the art of a musical symphony, or the art of a deep reader of the human soul.

All I know is that a meticulously painted rose delights your eyes and calms your soul. And I am a splendid, human, universal rose, and this is because my soul longs to be a Creator invested by nature with a supreme right: the power to continually access other worlds.

The possessor of a mysterious inner universe is the creator of a universe suspended between dream and reality, whose act of greatness consists in that reaction of the brain which correlates life experiences with the sensitivity to perceive the beautiful, the sublime in nature, and to cultivate it in the fertile fields of art.

The Eyes Full Of Art Of A Life-Giving Rose are the mirror of the soul of a skilled Creator who knows how to make his life rosy according to the artistic excellence of adorning a certain reality with the emotion transmitted by the trembling of a metaphor, the trembling of an embodied adult mind in a beautiful body of nature.

The Eyes Mirror The States Of My Soul

On April 28, 2023

The perspective must match the eye viewing the scene.

I was my sister's supporter last Sunday, at the half-marathon contest in Iași. Many participants, perfect weather. A fact that limits to the pure visualization of an alternative reality, the condensation in color of unforgettable experiences, line and form, of a whole cosmos of sensations, with their spiritual echo always kept in memory. The atmosphere had exerted pressure on the emotional background of the participants, from where they could only escape through an Esterenaet Ossets, a vivid transition through several poses: from the pose of "receiver of cheers" to the pose of "value criterion".

Out of the over a thousand competitors, my sister ranked in the first 5 positions in the women's finalists, representing a well-deserved symbol of the active lifestyle, just as the medal represented a symbol of victory over her. I believe that some are predestined to be winners, entities of positive energy, while others are predestined to be part of society's daily routine, vibrating on the same wavelength as the restlessness of insipid choices.

With real interest, through an addition of rare animation, I looked at my sister as a painter looks at his painting: with the expression of an alegria de viver that excludes any gravity, of an aesthetic consciousness capable of appealing and communicating with all the means of beauty, by the way it manifests itself as a metalanguage of the senses and emotions.

I looked at her with eyes that know how to see beyond the bounds of the finite, with the fulfillment of a living perceptive act, initiating at every step an encounter with the miraculous. There was something in her eyes, something silent, patient, a magic that seeped beyond every touch of the canvas. And she seemed to know all this, looking at them from above, with the calmness of a man who knows well his way to the artistic act from the moment of running, which is the comprehensive approach of an obvious autonomous will.

Leadership: Can you draw attention to the need to value a state of mind by sharing your vision of a sensitive and ever-present image that embodies the archetype of a hero?

Categorically, running has to do with the feeling of beauty, manifesting itself as a way of expressing the suppleness of the body that youth is used to, orienting, from case to case, towards the admiration of an honest, wise and alluring life that challenges you to adventure without realizing it. A kind of subtle curiosity could be read on my sister's face, the faithful reflection of a consciousness that becomes aware of itself only through the turn that events take, to which artists are grateful through the form of subjective experience that the mood awakens.

Was it perfect diplomacy or flawless skill?

The meaning of beauty is different from that of desire, because beauty is the sincerity with which you approach what you do, related to the connection of all personal experiences. While the desire is the challenge to raise the bar for a new prize, the challenge to go beyond usual seeing, the mind continuing to "work" with its own artistic vision. And on this account, my sister increased her joy of rediscovering the simplicity of beauty starting from the very moment when, being one step ahead of the other competitors, she reduced her feeling of fatigue through a synchronous connection of body and soul, without one forgoing and the other following.

In those rewarding moments, with the sweat of one's brow, she felt a deep, almost unreal calling, and she had the feeling that she was running inside another person's body, like a painter who extracts their identity from matter, form, sometimes theme and the message conveyed in his own work. Rather, I think it was a kind of attempt to escape from a negative emotional state, to reach a neutral or desired emotional state, to which is added the challenge of engaging in something new and surprising, a break in rhythm on the last two kilometers that left her looking and dreaming of a well-deserved place on the podium.

Leadership: Can you place at the center of your vision the determinism of creating a symbolic image, so as to concentrate in a single model of memory the totality of the universe you are creating?

Look how she runs, and she runs harder and harder, more and more artistically, without showing signs of fatigue, comparable to the flight of a ballerina over the darkness of middle age. Everything happened as if she had to retouch a work of art that has in the foreground the features of the body, the lines of the limbs which, always the same, can bend, but can never change. So much so that, painted on a holy image, they can be worshiped on the altars of the image of power.

The reception of a nerve impulse suddenly generated a muscular contraction, which caused the release of muscular energy, a flash of the spirit in the light of a flame seen only by me. I think this perfectly fits the observation made by Leonardo da Vinci: "In the art of painting the most important thing is matching the movements with the intentions in the mind of the model, such as desire, motivation, good mood, pride and perseverance."

In running, performance athletes manifest themselves as a way of artistic expression, through a kind of event symbolism, because they are not only heroes of a "work" that requires speed in execution, but rather represent windows open to the enlightenment of souls, towards understanding and experiencing an immense satisfaction in relation to the environment, towards becoming "in perspective".

And my sister, like an artist skilled in the nuances of an effective training, the nuances of a true passion for performance, matched with a determination dilated towards extra sensibility, immediately understood from what strong material the canvas of a future painting is cut.

The breath of perseverance is an indivisible unity of body, mind and soul, dependent on art. And the artist, showing that on the migration route of the imaginary from the sacred to the human, the young spirit preserves its vocation to soar with great leaps towards always other heroic feats, does not alienate the thought of adding a small detail to the great canvas on which he outlines his vision, causing an expansion of imaginary worlds. He concentrates in a single pattern of memory the totality of the universe he creates.

Leadership is the vision with which you invest your soul in the midst of events that, awakening the emotion of a significant moment, make you feel like a hero transformed into an artist.

The Eyes Mirror The States Of My Soul when I watch the events in which the hero of the picture that fully characterizes me finds himself in. Not for nothing, when I watch a running competition, the only concern of my eyes is to capture the artistry behind the human, with the help of which the active or spontaneous character of a large-scale phenomenon is highlighted, in a colorful drawing.

Isn't art beautiful, for someone that knows art?

The Eyes Of The Spirit Open To A Larger Reality

On August 21, 2024

Cultivating awareness of your impact on the world requires a constant practice of empathy and reflection that art facilitates.

Thus remains the artist, a traveler between backgrounds of reality and dream, an alchemist of his own destiny who divides his existence between two worlds: the visible and the invisible. In his studio, where light filters through dusty windows, he writes the story of eternity, and he writes it as if he were deciphering the mysteries of the universe, seeking an answer that may never come. But hope and faith in the divine keep him anchored in transcendent reality, immersed in a mystical dialogue with the universe, in an endless love and adoration for the life in which he saw God.

The perspective expands, simultaneously encompassing the microcosm and the macrocosm. For in all his lives, lived through the purifying knowledge of "chance," the most profound transformation did not come when he split the atom or invoked the spirits, but when he made a sacred pact with that Opposite of the infinite that precedes the Exclusive Work of God.

It was a life of mystery and revelation, in which the deepest mysteries of his soul were illuminated, remade in the retort of elevated consciousness, through a kind of "Uriyaanna Olaul Tiharonsus," revelation of that spiritual plane of the unseen world. Always, like cosmic windows, the eyes of the spirit open to a vaster and deeper reality, according to the divine laws of creation, when consciousness transcends the limits of the ego.

Leadership: To what extent do you feel that your soul not only looks, but also recognizes itself in every aspect of creation, so that this recognition becomes a form of mystical union with the divine?

Until In the end, I came to the conclusion that my art is an excerpt from Physical Optics: "When we look in a mirror, our brain interprets what it sees as if it were dealing with a real universe, that is, mentally rotating what it sees 180 degrees around the Y axis. Which is almost correct, except that our brain does not know how to take into account the fact that it is working with an inverted image on the Z axis. If it knew this too, it would have to perform, also mentally, an inversion of the rotated image on the X axis. The result would be to bring the image from the mirror (imaginary universe) back into the real universe."

That's right. The more intensely I look into the mirror of my soul, the more complex the mental process of interpreting reality becomes, risking confusing the imaginary universe with the real one. This intense look into the mirror of the soul is not only an act of introspection, related to individual consciousness, but also a gateway to the divine perception of creation, modeled after the model of cosmic perfection. For as I deepen this contemplation, aiming for that mystical union with the divine, my eyes transform into true cosmic windows that facilitate the transcendence of the boundaries between the observer and the observed. Through them, the soul not only looks, but also recognizes itself in every aspect of God's creation.

And if the eyes become windows through which the divine contemplates creation and recognizes itself in it, with reference to the primordial essence of consciousness, then the entire existence becomes a mirror of the divine. That is why I look into the mirror of my soul, that is why I peer into the depths of my own being, because I see an expanding universe, a cosmic canvas on which time flows fluidly like in Dali's paintings. Let it be said, I feel how each beat of my heart paints a new shade of existence, a reality that bends and contorts under the weight of divine understanding.

I wonder, am I the instrument through which God manifests his infinite creativity?

Leadership: Are you preparing to transpose the ineffable into the tangible through your art, accepting the inevitability of destiny that positions you as a mediator between the divine and the material?

In every line I draw, I discover echoes of lives lived and yet unlived. Thus, I feel how my consciousness expands beyond the usual boundaries, reaching spheres of creation that my mind cannot yet fully comprehend. I wonder how I, such a small being, can be the bearer of such vast visions? How can I, beyond human limitations, give life to a painting that reflects the divine in all its splendor? How can I live the sensitive work of a sincere confession directed towards the essence of the creative universe?

The dominant white in my future creations calls me as a promise of infinity, of boundless potential, having no other meaning than that which divine inspiration itself constitutes. But with this call, which I so often invoke, and which art itself demands, I also feel a subtle fear growing within me, a kind of creative anxiety, a kind of vertigo of infinite possibilities. Will I be able to give shape to this overwhelming potential? How will I be able to transpose the ineffable into the tangible? Or will I lose myself in the immensity of my own vision?

The artist's eyes become instruments for translating intangible visions into visible forms. Thus, I feel simultaneously creator and creation, a fragile vessel for divine ideas, from which the beauty of the universe pours out. Moreover, I try to maintain my balance on this tightrope between inspiration and fear, between creative ecstasy and the burden of artistic responsibility, anchored in a constant dialogue between the past and the present.

And yet, in this whirlwind of creation, I ask myself who I really am: the artist or the work of art?

The creative act becomes a bridge between the finite and the infinite, where the artist confronts the vastness of divine potential, trying to translate the ineffable into tangible forms, in a continuous struggle with human limitations and the anxiety generated by unlimited possibilities.

The eyes of the spirit open to a larger reality when consciousness transcends the limits of ordinary perception. In fact, the eyes of the spirit, like ultra-sensitive cosmic telescopes, open to a wider reality when consciousness transcends the limits of the "observable universe" of ordinary perception. In this sense, art means the revelation of the invisible, identifying with the profound essence of existence.

The profound essence of existence in this context can be understood as that fundamental reality that transcends ordinary perception, revealing itself only through art as a kind of mirror of the inner universe.

The Eyes Of Truth

Be ready to reveal all the qualities that have been polished by the results of your experiences under the engraving of a symbol of Creation.

My life was on a stormy road, as if reflected in the breaking on the rocks of the waves of the sea or in the snowy expanse of the rockiest of mountains, close to the perfection of constructing an intrigue from which any writer could have developed a true adventure, a madness of victory over time spent in another context. I was a dynamic and thrilling adaptation of a story that surpasses film, of course, lacking the illusion of love.

Everything seemed to be detached from a novel in which the main character looks to confess himself to destiny, and fate answers: "You played your role well, but you forgot that I am the director."

Beyond the remembrance of an original life is the beauty of the soul who knew how to value it under a code of access to another reality, one made by an optical "tool" that forms real images, a symbol of faith, spirit and eternity.

A writer creates his own narrative universe, which then respects it as such, or dynamites it in one way or another. But only the Eye, directed only to the glory of God, sometimes more full of night than of day – as in a surrealist work by Igor Morski, can see the finest details, perceive order in the agglomeration or disorder of my path to heightened heights.

Leadership: Is your main way of understanding your purpose that of bringing the idea of an "Eye" into your life that draws you inside of a forceful character?

Ever since I had certain signs that my future would be settled slowly, quite well, without the pretense of revealing myself as available in search of a well-thought-out answer to the question: "What will most likely happen?"

And the Eye, this amount of divine authority that only great deeds encompass and promulgate, used to an active intellectual presence, was prepared for any new idea, ready to consider it and appreciate it from the very first time of viewing the clock. Under the reflection of an infinite mystery, I was making a surreal journey at the end of which there would be an explosive encounter, and a discovery.

Personal development, closely related to how you get by when you are surrounded by an ocean impossible to traverse, recreates the portrait of a great force character, accomplished not by repeated failures in times of failure, nor by the freedom to fly over the ditches ahead. But through the revelation and the state of soul contained in the meaning of a symbol of the meaning of life.

I have always felt the call to the extent that I have been forbidden, a warning against the great truths of Creation, and the satisfaction of a free rule, fired in a space that has nothing to do with this world. The fact that an artist could have glanced at the theme of the miracle of the making of man.

In the realm of ideas, as in life, the new one spreads rather slowly, in the way the artist transforms the unmistakable into a picture expressing emotion, the proof of the measure of being led by a force whose extrinsic origin does not notice it. Because in front of him there is always a gorgeous decoration, whose immenseness cannot be expressed by words, but only by senses, colors, nuances, sensations and expressions.

Leadership: Does your predominant character stand out by gaining a permanent trust in an intrinsic bond with a symbol of Creation that shows that man can connect with the Universe?

I felt that elemental contrast of perspectives, colors, views and principles, called Mega Contrast, turned into the delirious fantasies of the mind raging against the dying of the light. There is no doubt that the Eye, on the same wavelength, altered its refraction power, spreading its presence within me, but with a hint of a whim.

Its spiritual strength gradually penetrating deeper and deeper into the different situations of my life for the importance given to the values of the optical paths of the various rays that followed me everywhere is on a map whose millenary impression feeds the soul but forces the brain to ask for information regarding the divine mystery.

When life awakened my puzzlement, when I almost consumed all of my strength, I felt the existence of light, I took over from an invisible energy wave that I only sensed through senses, states, feelings, feelings, and cannot be rationally explained.

I would hit something similar to the sensitivity of the artist who interprets the features of the model either by his own taste or by the claims attributed to the illegal entry into an imaginary of the pre-scientific concepts. It was a new form of response to esoteric stimuli, something that I have always longed for, a pretense from the bottom, but a climb to the infinite, called the right of kings.

The right of kings is that fragment of the leadership symphony reproduced by a gradual process of self-belief that what you believe is real and that what is happening to you is too good to be true.

I wanted to be an extension of the Eye, the great sorcerer behind the curtain, an enigma as long as it is not a generally valid one, but it is spreading its rays in infinite space, battering the whole earth in its omnipotent light. I wanted to add from the depths of my experiences the effect, the divine mystery, for which everything seems different.

At the end of the film "Now You See Me 2" , the magician Thaddeus Bradley lights a candle: "Seeing is believing, but is this the truth?"

It depends on your point of view. There is only one thing I think: eye for an eye. It's your game, play it the way it suits you. When you will reveal all the strengths, all the qualities that have been polished by the results of your experiences, and you will surely do that, I will be there waiting for you. Because, heed my words, you will receive what is destined to you, for there is only one thing I believe in: A higher purpose.

The game that the real leader handles best is a version of the story that involves that minimal shimmering voice of consciousness that tends to react according to supernatural influence.

The Eyes Of Truth is that property of the mind and soul that you cannot break, one which no one knows about and one you end up not getting enough of in the moment you know that without it, you would not be so convinced by your own powers.

Deep within you, you know that you are addicted to something higher and unlimited that protects, guides, teaches you many things, and forces you to apply yourself at an advanced level. Until one day when you will be ready to part of the "Eye."

The Eyes Paint More Than A Thousand Words

Only an artist well acquainted with himself has the power to borrow from nature the gentle charm of a language that transforms the visual into feeling.

I need only gaze upon the sea, and she at me, to understand why an artist's eyes see only the ideal that appears as real, and even more real than the so-called real. Calm, tender, innocent, poetry-gatherer and beautiful, the eyes paint more than a thousand words when they capture the image of a morning at the seaside, as an excellent means of conditioning the clairvoyant system from which the relevance of the creative experience can result.

The sea always catches my eye, as if she were the eyes of an artist whose belief is simple:„To paint with bathed breath, beyond rules and techniques." And I still gaze at her in amazement, at the memory of a past life, from an unwritten time in a living clock, in color, in a dream, while the sunlight mirrors her smile in the glow of her waves.

Of course. I wink while gazing at her intensely, with the sensitivity of the artist's soul, optically sipping from the primordial sources of art that echo of the character portrayed in the image of Poseidon, the only one who can command the storm when divine power is embodied in him. To the invisible world, of the „converging lens" type, in which the regrets of not being a god are bathed, I recognize its depths, as if I were crossing a true spiritual void, living as if more and more only for me, for spirit, in the ambiance of dreamlike feelings.

Leadership: How long are you ready to maintain a certain level of intuitive feeling in favor of a broad artistic vision that can give consistency to your creation?

Perhaps, however, the absolute master of the sea is a meditative spirit oriented towards loneliness, interspersed in the tidal flow of a silent but fierce language, in any case artistic, by transmitting the emotion provoked by the most famous steps of peace of mind. I have counted those steps hundreds of times trying to keep my mind occupied, but my gentle and humble soul knew and still knows: there is no parting for us. And just as many times, the sea whispered to me in a languid voice, as if they wanted to make me part of a way of turning a blind eye: „Try to understand me, and don't ask me the impossible. Don't look at me with the reproach that this is all about reason."

No sea is better portrayed in painting than the memory of Deja Vu sensations. I just have to look at the sea in any season to meet again with eyes that never look, the same eye that, in an incomprehensible way, dominate my artistic spirit. Of what importance are the waves, as long as I'm one with the sea? Not in the sense that the intellect or feeling believes in the reality of sensible things, vast and deep, but in the sense that the sea sees me as a shell brought by the sea currents to the shore.

And this shell full of mysteries, illuminated by a holy halo, installed in an artistic genre, is collected by a well-differentiated painter and well clarified with himself, in a certain requirement of the palette. He knows how to metamorphose it into a flute meant to perform the same arpeggios for a long time. A flute that desperately craves a solo...

Leadership: Do you dare to touch the line of an infinite horizon that has firmly drawn the meaning of a visionary demonstration of the „multi-sided picture"?

Especially this relationship between sea and man, between vastness and depth, between the fixed point and the echo that disappears in the ether, between the fixed painting and a moving moment, must be taken into account by any artist who knows how to see in his subject, in the one who loves him unspeakably, the state of ascension to the sublime. Thus, the memory of my sensations is not only immense, but also detached from those that are uttered only in secret, mastered by the pathos of a passing madness: to have come to terms with a god of waters and oceans, only to fill my inner universe with the stylized design of a relaxing seascape that gives life to a new vision of reality.

I say this, on the one hand, because the sublime is the sea seen as a work that is gaining momentum, not being strictly limited by imagination or feeling, but because it can receive the whole divine character if we consider it to be a whole: in artistic solemnity is contained what is contained in God.

Suddenly, three entities are observed in the foreground: the sea, the artist and divinity, and whoever looks at this painting from another angle could notice a single doubling of the world view through an elastic force of colors that highlights the plastic „expressiveness". Here, then, is the essence of the artist: the power to borrow from the sea, with its vastness and depth, the gentle charm of a language that transforms the visual into feeling.

On the other hand, if I were to regard the sea as the supreme archetype of poetry, music, or painting, without seeing it as the prototype of wisdom and divine force, without dissolving it into absolute identity, then I must keep in mind that no artist expresses his painting as a waltz of rhythmic words, but as a language reduced to its very essence: dialogue, communion, inter-animation and inter-penetration.

Leadership is the power to penetrate the universe of a creation whose result allows the confirmation of a different vision of personal reality, from a multitude of other possibilities of rendering an optical image.

The Eyes Paint More Than A Thousand Words when it comes to intuiting a reality that is not seen, but felt through a visual construction. We have in mind that whenever we refer to an image that awakens a special memory, the desire to have a certain experience again, to be there, we must refer to an artistic composition that presupposes the existence of two different themes: nature, and a discreet, fantastic, moving presence called Eternity.

The Eyes Possess A Superior Power Of Expressing The Real

What you see does not need to be explained to fulfill the need for clarity necessary to enter the wonderful world of Creation.

Before a blade of grass, thin and tender, I must bow respectfully, just as I would bow before an artistic personality of the stature of Leonardo Da Vinci, promising to give greater importance to the objective content to which viewers react. The sight does not belong entirely to me, it is not a small universe, a spatiality whose depth is strictly related to me, but also belongs to the other viewers, and I will not seek to criticize the art that the eyes of the world honor through the ratio of colors.

And if this blade of grass is based on the natural and artistic effects of an emerald green capable of attracting my attention repeatedly, in a modern art that encompasses everything that remains on my retina and in my mind, assimilating more or less the identity of sunlight in himself, then he will highlight a new vision related to perception: "what you see does not need to be explained to fulfill the need for clarity necessary to enter the wonderful world of Creation".

Being a great admirer of the aesthetics of nature, I would suggest an analogy of the blade of grass with a perfect artist, similar to the point of view of Pablo Picasso: "the artist is a receptacle for emotions that come from everywhere: from the sky, from the earth, from a piece of paper, from a passing form, from a spider's web".

Moreover, looking at this blade of grass with the shining eyes of immortality, with the depth given by the admiring stupor, I let myself be surprised by the depth of contemplation and sensitivity that widens the space of my living in a psychic act of merging with the universe.

Leadership: Are you able to resort to examining a subject decorated with multiple meanings by selecting an abstract element intended to be an image of the creative Self?

It is as if I am among those who possess the "unseen key" with which one enters the eternal green paradise of symbolism, where a single insignificant point in the universal plane can join the points of a new story, heard as if once, long ago, in a representation of the creation of the universe at the beginning of each cosmic cycle.

In a history of theories about art, where the artist is concerned with the quality of the impression his work produces, I would give the blade of grass the connotation of "ambrosia of the gods", recalling the archetypal times of beginnings, Greek mythology, the gods from Olympus, who watched over the destinies of mortals. Here, the creative Self manifests itself in the special sensitivity of the perception of nature and the fusion of man with nature, with the cosmic. In other words, the creative Self manifests powerfully in the impression with which you choose yourself at first sight when you admire an expressive model of fragility as a wonderful and special creature in the eyes of the gods.

Even the gods vent their emotions in art. Suddenly, I realized that it is not enough to look at this blade of grass with eyes that never lie, to immortalize it in a photographic frame, at various times of the day, to prove to myself that nature is that which gives me emotional fullness every day. Quietly, humbly, he bows before the viewer endowed with a sense open to universality, knowing himself exposed to a visual stimulus as in front of a creator who not only created the universe in which we live, but keeps it alive even today.

Leadership: Is the image you project externally based on an observation based on the "model exposure" of what is perceived with the depth required by the very realization of an artistic effect?

This little blade of grass that is often swayed by a brief summer breeze, una sensibilità al di sopra delle parole, is comparable to the life of that ex-convict in the novel "The Mysteries of Paris", named Chourineur, who lived on broken scraps and was satisfied like this, without taking into account anything, without taking into account the emotions and experience that he leaves behind.

But that unfortunate man could not help himself, while the deep and holy destiny of the blade of grass entrusts to art not only the lightness of life, but also the function of evoking great spiritual joys, because when you admire the emerald-green whose dominant wavelength is sandwiched between empathy and sympathy, only then is the idealization of nature perfectly imitated, and you feel that you can overcome life's shortcomings and difficulties.

Here, the artistic effect consists in the fact that the focus on the blade of grass and the way I sought for the blade of grass to relate to my vision, creates that image that delights the viewer with a unique emotional content. In turn, the viewer's view of the "unique way of being" of the blade of grass, by confronting the problem of depth, can express the relationship between what a man displays and what he is in reality. But I will talk about that in the next article...

This is why leadership becomes deep in meaning: because it is constituted as a unique view separated from the rest of the world, with reference to a centering of consciousness in the space of a "miniature" version of the human research subject.

The Eyes Possess A Superior Power Of Expressing The Real when the life of the self is treated by comparison with an element of nature, with a tender blade of grass, whose misunderstood call here is called in one word: idealization. The unexpected and always striking way in which this blade of grass appears to you, immediately makes you think of the conditions of life: mutual listening, empathy, understanding of thoughts, pursuit of vocation, as they are expressed by the writer Alexandru Vlahuță:

"The painter has, in broad terms, the culture of his art, which he clarified for himself, little by little. But he sees and understands a lot of things, which the books do not know how to tell, which only years and years of deep observation and patient work help you dig up and bring to light from your own soul."

The Eyes Reflect The Gaze That Explores The Search For Identity

What you perceive through the lens of art is the mirror of inner consciousness that challenges you to navigate a certain direction through the human-technological duality.

Arriving again at the Ionian Sea, on the beach full of memories, I feel the sun gently caress my face, like the soft touch of a rose petal. This time, I feel that I am a model of feeling and vision integrated into a true artistic canvas, a crowning effort to rationalize a fascinating experience, each element of nature being created by the hand of a talented painter who adopts realistic accents after abandoning the canons classics.

Inclined to the use of subtlety in painting, I find myself among the images of a sunrise that slowly transitions from dark to light, among the colors of an interesting sunset that delights the gaze and makes the eyes fill with wonder, with the intention of rendering nature as a sensational phenomenon of beauty, a kind of Zazhaphio Asph Senthiseph, a triumph of the artistic spirit that tends towards the sublime absolute. And only now, in this atmosphere of lights and shadows that change their dynamics, almost becoming a kind of visual symphony, a kind of play of contrasts in a dynamic painting, I am certain that I will be able to really gather myself and excel as painter in the interpretation of reality.

Perhaps the beauty or tranquility of the scene where I synchronize my feelings, making them pure through the contrast of colors, offers me a form of comfort, inspiration or even an answer to questions that I have had so many times in my life, without having considered myself an artist. In such a moment, I could feel aligned with myself and the surrounding universe, enhanced by the reflections of a visual poetics that transcends reality making it sublime. Once again I say: what I see depends on what makes me reflect on the human condition and the meaning of existence.

Leadership: Can you find an emotional or spiritual connection with a particular moment in your vision spectrum if you are moved by futuristic images crossing your consciousness?

In a memorable scene from the movie "Terminator 2", John Connor tries to teach the Terminator (T-800) to be more "human". John tells him not to kill people and tries to teach him human expressions and behaviors. Basically, he's trying to turn a machine into something that can appreciate the value of life and the complexity of human emotions. This moment raises the question of whether a machine, no matter how advanced, can truly learn to be human. It is a reflection on the nature of humanity and what makes us truly human.

Likewise, the concept of humanity and the search for identity is explored in art. In the case of an artist of my size, who walks on the beach trying to immortalize every sunrise and every sunset, I try to understand the human identity that defines me. Contemplating sunsets and sunrises, which are often seen as symbols of the cyclical nature of life, I came to the conclusion that what makes me human is the ability to connect with nature and understand the cycle of life and death.

In a painting, this would be rendered through a kind of complex symbolism that captures the human essence and transcends the limits of ordinary consciousness.

John Connor was a man trying to teach a machine. In my case, the self-discovery of the artist who tries to understand himself takes shape, be it emotions, consciousness, creativity or the ability to connect with nature, with the world around. Automatically, the scene in "Terminator

2" confronted me with the idea that I can convey and express my emotions under the aspects of a painting, looking at things around me through the external actions of a cyborg who is learning to be human.

Leadership: Can you express your emotions and experiences in the aspects of a painting, looking at things around you through the outward actions of an empathic cyborg, just as an artist paints?

Therefore, the artist who walks on the seashore is already human, seeking through art to understand the essence of nature and his humanity. He can use the time spent contemplating sunsets and sunrises to find inspiration and meaning, connecting with himself and the entire universe captured in images that evoke deep feelings. During this process, I was able to examine questions similar to those raised by John Connor: "What makes me truly human?" or "What matters most to humanity?"

Essential to me in my relationship with John Connor is the ongoing dialogue between human complexity and the organic simplicity of nature, a dialogue that is constantly shaping and redefining me. What matters most to me in relation to the common good and empathy for others is how art can serve as a universal language for understanding and cohesion. It is the image through which art helps me communicate values, emotions and perspectives that could bring people closer together.

Art is a way to convey and express beauty, emotions and experiences of approaching beauty in all its aspects, looking at surrounding things, people, external phenomena and actions, the appropriate proportion of which guarantees the perfect illustration of reality. And indeed, an artist like myself is more than a painter who captures these aspects in images, creating paintings that can provoke a wide range of feelings and reactions in the viewer. It is a potentiator of beauty seen with the eyes of the mind, through the feeling springing from companionship with the elements of nature that pulsate alertly, in fine Renaissance chords, even beyond the rigors of reality.

To excel as a painter in a painting of emotion and color is to capture the complexity and diversity of the human experience, just as the Terminator tries to understand and assimilate the complexity of human behavior and emotions. It is an effort to transcend mechanical or technical limits to reach a deeper level of understanding and sensitivity. And the sunset and sunrise are witnesses to the passage of time, ephemeral images that capture the complexity and beauty of existence. These two natural spectacles stand as landmarks in an ever-changing world, giving me the opportunity to reflect on my meaning within this vast picture of life

In this context, leadership involves transforming an emotionless machine into an entity capable of empathy and awareness of human nature, which corresponds to the idea of moving from a robotic to a human status. It illustrates the human potential to evolve and become more empathetic, through the awareness and development of the ability to feel and understand more deeply the feelings and needs of those around, including the relationship with advanced technology.

So leadership, in the context of artificial intelligence, aims at the human side of an artist who, navigating the intersection of technology and creativity, manages to illustrate the duality of life as a kind of dance of light and shadows, in which every note of technology and every nuance of humanity they complement each other to create a complex and fascinating harmony in a work of art.

So, the great human enigma from an artist's perspective is related to the interaction between technology and humanity, especially the way it influences artistic perception and expression.

In this sense, the artist might be fascinated by the duality between machine and man, similar to the duality between light and dark present in sunsets and sunrises.

The Eyes Reflect The Gaze That Explores The Search For Identity as I try to transform what I see into a deep and personal experience. In this sense, the painter could explore questions such as: "What defines me as a human being when technology becomes increasingly sophisticated and enters my emotional sphere?", or "How can I render in my art this complexity of human nature, caught between biology and technology?"

Through art, a painter can try to unravel this enigma, much like how John Connor tries to humanize a war machine. Paintings of sunsets and sunrises could symbolize complex experiences, inner conflicts, and the inherent beauty of the human condition.

Always and everywhere, sunset and sunrise are visual metaphors for the cycle of life and the continuous transformation of human emotion and consciousness. They represent moments of transition, crossroads where light and darkness, knowledge and ignorance, meet and intertwine. As a painter, rendering these moments means capturing the essence of what it means to be human, with all the complexities and contradictions that come with it.

The Eyes See Only What Sight Offers Them

Whatever exerts an influence from the outside imposes a certain intensity on the sensibility in the field of open reflection.

I got closer to myself, more than usual, when the waves of the ocean came closer to the shore, becoming shallower and shallower, appearing friendly. In the spirit of welcome transparency, I stepped barefoot into the ocean water, calm, measured, unseen, despite the fact that I was just a speck of sand in a vast and limitless space. Paying attention to what I was saying, the waves seemed to hear the echo of my heartbeat, with the same acuity of the gaze of a sorcerer who penetrates deeper and deeper into your being before submitting to a hypnotic treatment.

And if I got closer to myself, without betraying my heart that whispered to me with a trembling voice "you only have this dream once in your life", with the mention that the waves looked at me with clear eyes, but somehow suspect, this was due to the impressive view we got of the ocean. It seemed to me that I was no longer so small and insignificant, like a poor grain of sand, but that I was finally part of a magical infinity that does not circularly close in on itself, but withdraws from the ontological expanse to leave a place for the separate being.

When you look at the world from an infinite universe that you have inside you, everything changes, acquiring a wonderful shade of symbol, an element of communication that expresses contents with ideal meaning.

Leadership: Can your creation represent you in order to identify the impact that a reality "independent of the knowing subject" has on the need to outline a horizon related to sensitivity?

The waves of the ocean cannot be calmed without the warmth of the sun. And I cannot be part of an infinity of distances if I do not recognize myself as the cause and principle of an infinite universe that contains countless worlds, filtered through the gentle light of the sun. This happens especially if I don't create the impression of infinity that fits on a sheet of paper complete with a simpler version of a sandcastle. Sensitivity winks at me in the name of creation, because it is my connection to the infinite.

Besides, I realized that no matter how many waves would rock at my feet, their eyes fixed on the sky as if they were afraid of forgetting something in the vastness of the world, oh yes, their thematic center would have to be necessarily framed at my "eye level" as an artist who knows how to filter the light at the same time and create a mysterious effect of otherness, a fascinating effect of "painting within a painting".

Let me tell you something else. If the sun is just a bright spot on a dark background, as is well known, then the waves without luster will not be able to impress at all with the quality of a pleasing image to the eye, because all beauty in art is produced with the help of light. So, it is important to recognize that the waves cannot provide an artistic orientation based strictly on aesthetics if the light space is seen against a dark background (a cold opposition), thus cannot be considered as an "original phenomenon" through which colors are produced.

Leadership: Can you form in your mind an image that is to be transposed into a plane of alterity, and at the same time represent the actualization of a completed reality with a "painting in a painting" effect?

Furthermore. The waves are by no means to be imagined as having pre-existing colors, the blue-green emerging everywhere as a fertile zone of creation, nor as the revelation of some sacred reality, but rather as thematic content by producing colors as soon as the sunlight is fully correlated with the number one requirement imposed by sight: whatever exerts an influence from the outside imposes a certain intensity on the sensibility in the field of open reflection.

Therefore, the waves and the light, represented in the plane of the universal as the ideal unit of length of the creative impulse that breaks into what is real, will behave as photosensitive structures in the eyes of the beholder, not just as points of reflection. And if the artistic form takes as its symbol the ideal unity through the opposition between light and chiaroscuro, within the gaze, then art can serve to represent a vision that is not naive about reality and that is no longer under the threat of solipsism.

And as painting is especially based on the unity of the opposite, not merely on the formation of the multitude within the unity, it follows that everything that is changeable about the space in which the eye reflects its color, together with the objects of its representation, may constitute the very difference instituted by painter between ideal and real. Of course, in a perfect painting, painted with mastery in the choice of colors, the waves must have a meaning quite independently of the chiaroscuro ratio, especially if we consider the meaning of the symbol.

In leadership, you must cultivate a "distanced" view of yourself in order to better understand that what can provide you with a mental and emotional refresh is the very tendency to break away from the everyday, from what you know.

The Eyes See Only What Sight Offers Them whenever you try to transpose yourself into a painter whose vision looks, participatively, beyond all appearances, to that distance that the perspective gives in a painting.

How beautiful is the distance ! And how sublimely it is expressed in creation as a mysterious muse, poetico quodam instinctu, in whose adoration I tend to mirror myself sometimes, excessively...

The Eyes See Only What The Mind Is Prepared To Understand

On Septembrie 22, 2021

When you make a choice, make it so that you reconcile the mind with the soul, reason with wisdom, to find the way to your true SELF.

I'm having lunch with friends before the long-awaited mountain half marathon that will take place tomorrow. We cooked, we opened the bottle of wine, we enjoyed a meal together. The wine has had its effect, I am cheerful and lucid, as you can see. Tomorrow, waking up at 7 o'clock. Of course, we'll be playing Catan until midnight.

But while everyone is waiting for tomorrow, and while tomorrow is left to wait, no one pays attention to the discovery that attracts the attention of one person: Myself. Everyone is waiting for a fight, a motivational form of self-affirmation, a competition that does not arouse any interest in me. My focus on getting a place on the podium, a fact adjacent to a whole that makes me strong and achieve what I set out to do, takes second place when the horizon does not see the reconciliation of the soul with the mind, the reconciliation with the fire of glory, with the start towards maturation, making the agreement between them.

So, together with my friends, I discovered a deeper meaning of life, not that of a winner, but that of "wonderful fulfillment", that satisfaction that you feel when you are deeply connected to minds that despite any pragmatic calculation know how to preserve the cohesion of an already existing whole and individualizes it in relation to other groups. The joy I feel because I did not miss the chance to talk interesting things with my friends, is enormous.

Leadership: Can you reconcile your soul with the possibility of insufficient motor experience, without feeling in retrospect the disappointment of having achieved a passing success?

On that quiet evening with my friends, before the day of the competition, I reflected better on the difference between a time of emotion and performance, and a time of transformation that comes from within my being. In the middle was that festive experience of an honest, lively, flexible sociability, that experience of a simple, restful happiness that completes the consciousness of a new beginning of the road.

Running is not the story of my destiny, it is not the effect of a predetermined destiny, but only a passion that accentuates feelings that warm the soul and give new powers. I think that the drive towards a better destiny must not be diverted by a momentary passion that in the long run leads nowhere, at least in terms of a lasting meaning of life that opens up countless possibilities. Even starting in a hurry in thoughts can be the disadvantage of the idea of individual destiny that does not share the destiny of others.

Is it not so? It is difficult to reconcile the soul with the mind, illusions with reality, destiny with one's own conscience. And, more than that, I think it's impossible to make good decisions when you have unrealistic expectations. I think that the way you live in your body, the way you reconcile your soul with the world are things that recommend you, much more than a title won by virtue of a competitive framework that wants to reach the landmarks of a passing success.

Leadership: How do you define the time of becoming that your being goes through, in the sense of an individual path of the self that expands to a wider scope?

Relevant here is the fact that I discovered with a glass of wine a virtually impossible mission. It is the equivalent of the discovery that Alphonse Bertillon, assistant clerk at the Paris police headquarters, made in 1880. Profile and front photography of all people, to create a unique identity for each.

I allowed myself to believe that a glass of wine (Busuioacă de Bohotin) served with friends is like a kind of unforgettable photo. During tomorrow's race, we'll see each other again. We will not compete. And I think now, after dinner, I've already won the first battle.

I will no longer follow with interest the experiences of others on the mountain, not even mine. Running is a challenge, a photo that generates dynamism, tension. And, as a follower of exact thinking, I will not use a magnifying glass or any chemical reagent to judge the footprints of those around me.

I'll do something else. To the amazement of the others, I will try not to arouse any interest in the competition tomorrow. My friends will remain unanswered. I will be a thief: I will give back what I am obliged to give. With all my imperfections, I will give back from the experience I gained, because I was not born learned either.

And my experience in running is a great discovery: a man who compares himself to others is always a man who confronts himself, without being able to stop what he is doing. He is no longer a free man; he is a prisoner of the ambition to be above all.

So, I will give back from what I do with pleasure. I will give back what passes, what is rightfully mine, what was offered to me by the nature of circumstances: I will give up the desire to be victorious. What will remain is the lived experience, the friendship between the runners.

Consequently, the time of becoming that my being will go through tomorrow could be defined as a chain of unitary sequences, a chain of small sketches with scenery, which I will be able to admire retrospectively as a story of full maturation, of assuming present and self-discovery.

A discoverer is a man who captures with his eyes a polished image of the soul: the moment when he puts others in the foreground, without remembering that he is a strong man, more plentiful and more powerful than all.

The Eyes See Only What The Mind Is Prepared To Understand when the important things you focus on are passed through the filter of lucidity and maturity, with the restraint of the ambition to push your limits and see yourself victorious.

The real winner is the runner who has understood that what matters most in a competition is to be at peace with yourself, to feel that you are with everyone else, rather than to be the center of their attention.

The Eyes See Only What They Are Ready To See

On September 05, 2021

A true artist knows how to create an image that in the distance seems identical to the one nearby.

A man is running on the beach, but not so close to the shore. The sun shines on his path, the sand warms his feet, the sea does not cool his feet. This man feels the sand full of shells, sees the sea to his right, hears the waves, the whistling of the summer wind, and I suppose he lives with the present in his sphere of ambitious thoughts.

The sea is in the same place. The same sand, the same shells. But the tracks of the runner's footsteps, no matter how pressed, are erased as fast as the wind blows. And what's left? The memory of a sensational image? The wonderful interweaving of living elements: the footsteps, the sand, the shells, the sea, the wind, the gaze fixed on the horizon? Or, is it just the illusion of a time flowing in a story context?

I don't really think we can separate the individual from this living whole without destroying the cohesion of the whole. So we have to look at this picture differently. Let's say, that a great creature moves in a background that is permanently the same, but the way it is emphasized may be different, its meanings may differ, and the immediate consequence may consist in an exceptional performance, renewal and entry into a new stage of life, which dominates a fabulous show.

At the same time, we must consider a simple performance of the isolated personality that has consecrated its entire existence to the service of a moment of reflection present within a temporal flow of spiritual energies which, being assimilated by the soul, changes its structure.

Leadership: Does the perspective that your creation offers consider the induction of the feeling of renewal of one's own self, with the help of a fragmentary experience corresponding to a strongly controlled image from the outside?

The running that the person practiced could designate the occasion of a moment of existential grace, in no case a serious moment of physical wandering. In this case the individual represents an extension, a temporary fragment close to the divine spirit, an Eritelynzta(a living example of renewal of one's own self), but which offers the opportunity to reminisce about episodes from his small existence and to reunite with the one he once was.

And in the same way we must look at the attributes of an artistic subject capable of provoking interest: through a kind of intense experience of the present moment, converted into a suggestive and realistic image. It is the expression of a subjective perception of time oriented towards eternity through the permanent commemoration of a present that works from the inertia of the past.

In another case, the image of the runner, debated in many forms of systemic wisdom, is the personification of a feeling in its own dynamism and its transposition into a spiritual dimension, because through sport one can respond well to the hardships and sufferings that man faces.

Leadership: Have you learned to obtain the attributes of an artistic subject capable of provoking interest: through a kind of intense experience of the present moment, converted into a suggestive and realistic image?

Any element must be somehow resized, superlatively put in the following equation: what meets the dynamism is a suite of relevant emotions that evoke memorable events. Whoever lives by attachment to the object of desire or thought, has existed and will truly exist through what he inspires. He who lives by what he does lives by himself. And what is in motion remains unchanged in a background that suggests an unlimited, Edenic space.

The next time you see a man running on the beach, consider it an infinite possibility to form new relationships with other elements from another background.

The runner is significant because he represents a universal in the plane of the particular. Especially because it is the same great creature who now writes these words not only for himself, but to create an image that in the distance seems identical to the one nearby. I'm sure you noticed. I was first of all a runner who later wrote about him as if he had before his eyes the image of another man whom he was to represent in a quick drawing.

As an artist, I became the author of a unique creation, based on the excellent possibility of being what I feel and what I think, as a reaction to what comes from the outside, being only the brain's reaction to what the eyes see and sometimes, it's hard to understand why it's happening...

Here, we distinguish two attributes of an artistic subject capable of provoking interest: the manifestation of a personal way of integrating a new image in the surrounding reality, and the manifestation of a greater receptivity to the interpretation of a form of alterity that I emphatically call: "The Other".

In leadership, a suggestive and realistic image is the equivalent of perceiving a double of your own being: one seen through an active culture of movement, and one seen through an outside eye that follows its every movement.

The Eyes See Only What They Are Ready To See when the artist tries to capture a reality that, viewed from any point, would always prove identical with his own. A true artist will never try to capture the distance of a dream or a new horizon, without first mastering the reality near his own being.

The Eyes See The World, The Heart Feels It Deep Down

Art is a form of transposing personal trials and triumphs into a visual image.

The painter was sitting in front of an old easel, the wood of which bore the imprint of years gone by. It was like a kind of silent witness of the past. In her soul, a small cyst, the result of a slight, badly scarred wound, made its presence felt. It was a latent pain that only surfaced every once in a while when some unexpected event made her bump into memories. He wasn't looking for a solution, he didn't want a cure. He had accepted that pain as a part of himself, a reminder of a past story, which, perhaps, he no longer wanted to forget.

Brush in hand, eyes fixed on the immaculate canvas in front of her, she explores the contours of any imperfection due mainly to focusing on the pain, not the final image that is about to come to life in the painting. From time to time, with a hesitant and uninspired movement, he finds that the background of the painting still reverberates with echoes of the past through a kind of "Inytatis Onnaccit Atensadeios", a hidden pain that persists through memories and trembling emotions. Is it the result of a stain of intense color, applied with blind passion and allowed to dry too quickly? Slowly, with great care, she seeks to erase this mistake from the canvas, sensing that only her hand can remove this imprint of personal history.

Her sad but soulful gaze scans the surface of the painting with that mixture of curiosity and melancholy, amazed to discover the layers of pigment accumulated over time. Focusing on the details of the painting reveals inner truths. She had forgotten that there was an earlier version of herself buried beneath the recent layers. Why did he choose to revisit this unfinished work? An unknown hope guided his hand to the brush. With each touch, she compresses time, rewinding the film of life, as if she could rewrite the story of her past. In a way, he hopes that through this magic of art he will be able to relive the original moment of creation, when passion and pain came together in perfect symbiosis on canvas.

Leadership: Are you able to accept change in your work, bearing in mind that this acceptance implies an intrinsic relationship between your original vision and the inevitable maturation of the perspective from which you view the world?

The novel "The Muralist", written by BA Shapiro, is like an image of this little painter that I tried to evoke in words. Alizée Benoit, um promissor artista jedeu nascido em França , working on a mural late one night, reflects on her artistic mission:

"Every line, every color is a silent protest, a cry against injustice. I don't just paint for myself, but for everyone who doesn't have a voice."

For Alizée, art is an act of resistance, a means by which she can express her revolt against oppression and injustice. She is aware that her work has a greater meaning than mere aesthetics.

Disappointed, she realizes that the woman in the portrait has evolved. She is no longer the fragile muse of old, but a mature presence with well-defined contours and complex nuances. Irritated by this inevitable transformation, the painter feels the thirst to revive the original intensity of the work. By what miraculous intuition did he decide to return to this painting? Rummaging through the layers of paint, like the cold ashes of a long-extinguished fire, he hopes to find that primordial spark that will reignite the flame of creation. Is it possible for the subtle phosphorescence of a refined composition to match the raw brilliance of the first inspiration?

The retina's sensitivity to hues and textures facilitates a deep connection with the artwork. With each carefully applied touch, the painter recalibrates her vision, rediscovering the original purity of her artistic concept, now enriched by experience and technical mastery. Thus, the portrait becomes a mirror of her evolution as an artist and as a woman, capturing the essence of her transformation in one timeless image: "I am what I have become."

Leadership: Can you return to the original intensity of your creation, bearing in mind that this return involves an exploration of the subtle connection between the representation of an inner transformation and your actual maturation?

I believe that every line and color in her work represents a "sediment" of silent protest, deposited layer by layer, compacting over time into a "sedimentary rock" of artistic resistance against its own turmoil. This transformation captures not only the evolution of the subject in the painting, but also the maturation of the artist herself. I believe that art itself is a kind of manifesto of the soul, and if I had been in her place, if I had projected myself beyond the canvas of the painting, I would probably have discovered a world where pain and beauty coexist in a balance perfect.

Come to think of it, Alizée's desire to revive the original intensity of the work is like a geologist digging through layers of rock, looking for fossils of primordial life. She hopes to find that "primordial spark" buried deep in the artistic "sediments" of the canvas, like a rare gem hidden in the depths of the earth, to extract from the pain the lost beauty and meaning of her original creation. In fact, this symbiosis of pain and passion in creation reflects the duality of his experience of living and painting simultaneously, turning suffering into art, and art into healing.

Each carefully applied touch is like a new geological formation, recalibrating the artistic landscape of the canvas. Thus, the portrait, the sincerity of her soul transposed onto the surface of the canvas, becomes a "geological map" of her evolution as an artist, with different "layers of emotion and experience" representing distinct periods of her development. The strokes of the brush rewrite personal narratives, and art, the only escape from the labyrinth of deep-rooted suffering, that oasis of free expression, becomes a mirror of his inner transformation.

Leadership resembles an artistic process, where layers of experience and suffering form a map of personal evolution, reflecting both authenticity and creative release from self-imposed mental constraints.

The eyes see the world, the heart feels it deep down every time it opens its doors to emotion. Perhaps the painter, becoming herself the subject of her painting, will remove her soul pain through a creative explosion, through a pictorial metamorphosis. Inner vision guides the creative hand to the point where the nuances and textures of the work will reveal stages of self-discovery.

The Eyes See What The Colors Dictate

What you see around can be perceived as an artistic reaction to the emotions you experience most often through the process of comparison between feeling and the creative condition.

As an instrument of reflection and intuition, in the real plane of a metaphorical image that reveals ideas and feelings, the eyes cannot deny that any artistic form that's out of the ordinary represents, in turn, the whole course of art in terms of changing modes of perception. And only to the extent that the four components of the picture are relevant in the painting: color, drawing, light and chiaroscuro, the artist will be able to achieve a real expansion of the creative space outside the representation of various ideas, feelings or situations.

All these can always be traversed along and across, and sometimes across the board in shapes and colors, taken qualitatively in isolation, wrapped in metaphors and symbols. For this reason I cannot abandon art, deciding to see everything around me as a theory of color and contrast which states that "it's easy to paint anything brighter when it's in the sun", unless some sacred sign that appeared unexpectedly in the sky will make my perception of what is happening around me vulnerable.

Of course, in order to highlight the significance of the four particular components that underlie the creation of any painting, simultaneously with their meeting and joint action in an all-encompassing whole, I will have to briefly indicate the absolute significance of each one. The drawing can be perceived as a projection of the artist's vision in space or in a plane. The color is given by the intensity with which a form, a reinterpretable construction or a figment of the imagination is presented. Light shows reality in a fabulous way. And chiaroscuro is the contrast between light and shadow.

Leadership: Can you provide an image of how to fulfill the role of Creator, considering that everything in its content can in turn become a form or essence?

To re-melt any of these components within the painting, as a difference in the display of reality, in such a way that they are not mutually exclusive, therefore assigning them a particular importance in the so-called "anatomy of artistic knowledge", would practically mean to represent the forms of things as patterns of manifestation of the soul, not as decorative objects floating in the sea of my consciousness. They should also be seen quite independently of the other potencies of nature. At the same time, I must consider the fact that all that is in the content can become a form or essence in turn.

Yes, it is very difficult to guess color after color, from the proximity of the vision that does not manifest inside you, and not to miss the right shade even once. It is even more difficult to penetrate into the depths of the artist's soul, full of mysteries, and to realize that there is another combination of colors that suffers enormously if it is not highlighted at the moment when the eyes, full of suffering, perceive some lack of contrast in low light conditions. Therefore, not only the colors, but also the soul must pass the fiery test of analysis, observation, change, transformation.

Let me be more explicit. The content of an image acquires that form of "representation of beauty" when it is displayed in a painting of great chromatic beauty, the artist focusing on a subject that is never exhausted. At the same time, the content of the image can acquire that essence of a holy gravity that floats over the fierce spell of consciousness, when the artist convincingly reproduces the spiritual world, taking as a point of reference the most sublime aspirations towards the universalization of the experience of beauty. Such an artist becomes a free being, not being affected in any way by the reality he conceives in his creations.

Leadership: Can you perfect your creation through lifelike image quality, imparting a rich spiritual content to your natural propensity for sensitivity?

What I often see appearing or disappearing, and which due to its transitory nature creates the idea of illusion, has nothing to do with reality itself, but rather with those colors that cause suffering. Because what I see in most things is just a chain of causes and effects that colors in particular produce when my mental and emotional state cannot stop the suffering. Of course, the color highlights the power of my sensitivity to resonate to sincerity, to generosity, to love, so that the miracle of this world unites my creative essence with divine grace. How do you resonate with the wonders of the world?

For example, I see a color that I like, but I cannot reproduce in the image (painting) exactly that shade that stirred my senses. And I'm not Buddha, I can't go up to the origins of suffering, then walk the opposite way and finally show the "Way of Liberation". But if I could introduce that color into a participation in the divine nature, liken it to the triumph of the particular spirit over the universal, and if I could subtly filter the light that determines the color perceived by the eye so as to create amazing ambiences, then perhaps I would end up increasing my interest in the art of simultaneity which spiritually gives enlightenment.

The quality of an image depends on the intensity of the dominant color that remains unchanged over time. But color is not always a release from a negative feeling that happened in reality, it can also be an alternative to black. I must have it alive in my mind, in any kind of combination of nuances, simultaneously with the eyes of the spirit that must not be directed in another direction (of the nature of things that are used in a whole). What's more, I have to introduce this color into the minimal dimension of the isolated word, as in an enigmatic poem, so as to create the sensation of the mystical and the occult.

In the leadership formation process, we must accept the reality that the artist's eye depicts in an image whose sensibility vibrates at the call of divine grace.

The Eyes See What The Colors Dictate when you pleasantly catch a similarity between your emotional states and the external reality of the world. What you see around can be perceived as an artistic reaction to the world you live in, with the mention that reality is associated with the ability of the eyes to focus exclusively on the creator of beauty face to face with divinity.

The Eyes See What The Soul Is Able To Feel

The perspective from which you look forms your perception, and perception forms your experience in relation to the perceived element.

I look at a painting hanging on a plaster wall, in a white, completely empty room. Still looking at it according to laws that seem to break the optics, I feel that the painting looks at me with the same steadfast expression, through the eyes of the painter who made it long ago, through the continuation of the existence of a soul that never dies. Isn't that awesome? The painting itself looks at me through an affinity of style, through the emotion that I give birth to, so through a specific transfer that occurs between art and the viewer, through an addition of rare, unfettered enlivenment, received through the play of the brush, through the grace of colors, which reveals my identification with a certain spiritual reality, during a moment meant to last an eternity.

It has something more than any other artistic creation, a special life, an intensity of colors not found in ordinary life, an enlivening that makes me "alive", even if I, the visitor, am an unexpected guest. Looking at it as a window to another world, inspired by an eye that perfects its vision through the relationship between credibility and incredibility in a hypnotic reality, in which there is dream, there is imagination, I feel how something fills me with the sweetness of longing for confession. So I continue to say what I feel.

I know I'll never see it again, so I need to see it well now, more than ever. A new world leaves itself open and invites a journey beyond appearances, open to the affective dimension of my existence. Now this renewed tendency caught by my eyes, springing from the consciousness of the meaning of an image that is reflected in the perception of my entire vision, reflected endlessly as if it were perpetuated between parallel mirrors, ensures my freedom from the constraints of a daily life assumed to be too stiff.

Leadership: Can you unleash your emotions at the sight of a decorative object, so as to transform a neutral space into a space of potentiality?

And just like that, I begin to resonate with a decorative object that refreshes an almost empty, sterile and cold space. Keen to look is the man who looks through one eye (of the soul) at the image that softens him, hypnotizes him with a "beyond the real" and transposes him into a playful dream where every mystery seems natural. Somehow, a visual background accompanies my movements in a realm of imagination where anything is possible, especially the reciprocity between a subject that cannot be exhausted and the sensitivity of a temporary suspension in a moment that lasts forever, against the background of the infinite reversibility between an object that makes felt its presence and the visibility space of art.

And by still looking at this particular painting, as if I were looking with bewilderment at a star in a dream that begins and ends at the same point, I feel that I experience the same distant intimacy as the heroine of the novel Exuvii, that "I see you without seeing me", derived from the need to escape from a self-imposed captivity:

"I had that strange sensation that I was looking at myself from the outside as I look at myself in a dream, thinking that I was a kind of spirit, a kind of lucid air, quite different from the one who sleeps in a shell of flesh. In hollows the body discovers itself, but here, in this almost empty space, a space devoid of landmarks that only those who learn to choose enter, techniques of silence, of running away from people are experienced. Here it is not the brain that tells the story, rather the body that remembers, listening directly to his ideas."

The decor means everything, that authentic intimacy without which the dream would not find its canvas, as neither the words their veil nor the soul its life. Through the eyes of a viewer entering a completely white space, the painting can be perceived from a perspective of deviation from reality. But this is exactly what makes an artist get closer to art: he manages to unshackle his emotions that encouraged him to create, transforming a neutral, banal space into a space of potentiality, a space of endless possibilities of expression. And every single element in this space is at first an illusion, then emotion, and finally reality.

Leadership: Can you represent an object in its absoluteness, extracting it from temporality, so as to conceive it separately from the whole?

In the same way, the painting that must represent an object or another in its absoluteness, extracting it through the drawing from temporality, will be conceived separately from the whole, with the thought of the life experience gained on a discrete background of color. For the artist finds his artistic expression by avoiding what is visible or superfluous.

And when the past intertwines with the continuous present, in the artist's attempt to find his obsession that inspires him to create, it is very possible that the wonderful way of communication with the outer universe Tarevissthesis, has the function of "infinite mirroring in a semi-transparent landscape" that intensifies the spectacular realism between the temptations of the fantastic and mystical psychology.

For example, in the case of a self-portrait, taking the artist's figure as a model, the force of expression will be much greater, making the bones appear more prominent than the small folds of the skin, and the tendons of the muscles (the most elastic tissues) will stand out more prominent than active or resting muscles. And even if this is how beauty is distinguished almost entirely, based on the relationship between sight and reaction to what we see, then the artist succeeds in bringing out the real character, or the surprising hiddenness of man at the intersection of experience and experiment.

To an even greater extent, for the representation of the hidden soul behind a sober figure, all facts and modeling actions intuited at the same time, extracted from temporality, will be taken into account, avoiding what is accidental and superfluous. Nothing should be embarrassing to the representation of such a face, considering that in every part of the human body it is frankly revealed, that in a splendid picture, the hero of a glorious deed. And, therefore, one must intuit by sight, by perception, and by intuition, to what deed his character served, and with what temperament he was endowed by nature.

Art participates in leadership development. I say this remembering that perception is what you look at, and perspective is where you look from.

The Eyes See What The Soul Is Able To Feel when you are trapped in a neutral space where even the illusion you think you are experiencing becomes reality. Because this private space itself becomes a projection in the sense of identity, a unique way of manifesting the relationships that the individual establishes with himself. You feel something wherever you are, with yourself. And every thing around, no matter how trivial, becomes a sign of the reflection of the other You.

As writer Cătălin Manea well said: "The perspective from which you look, forms your perception, and perception forms your experience in relation to the perceived element."

The Eyes Show You Everything That The Soul Experiences

What you see when you look at the outside reflects the inner space that increases the contrast of the reality from which the outside is fed.

There was a lot of mud, the weather was very cloudy, sleet was expected. I didn't rebel against the expectations I had about the weather, I didn't hide my disbelief, I didn't detach myself from my own self, but I silently accepted a situation that I wasn't mentally prepared for before the running competition. Important is the image that my eyes caught a few minutes before the start, a representation of the alternative reality showing the same athletes, subdued and calm, but eager to start an honest adventure, without any constraint.

My possible inner drama can be manifested in the way I render now, only through the gray color of the weather, the feeling of the irremediable infiltration of a chiaroscuro space from which the light has been consumed, in a kind of abstract watercolor background capable of facilitating an escape from the hiding of a world, which is not the reality of everyday life. Now, more than ever, I realize the truth that any man can take the risk of a thrilling adventure, but rarely can man triumph over a self that is unable to manifest itself with such force as to block any kind of change.

One could feel the wet and viscous coolness of an aerial "glue", from which you do not detach too easily, penetrating you little by little, consuming you completely, starting all the rush and all the rush of young blood towards the unique meaning of a feeling much too intense, an emotion shackled somewhere deep that drains you of vitality. It was the tragic infiltration of the black in the light of a very narrow stirring space, from beyond the "crust of reality", where devastating passions and doubts bubble up, extracted as if from an abstract, unreal, apocalyptic canvas painting.

Leadership: Can you give a new form to the feelings that remained captive in an image viewed retroactively, so as to amplify the importance of the moment that moved you the most?

Stoic, attuned to the voice of nature, I occupy a safe place in the middle of the painting, like a torch in the middle of the storm, as if waiting to unleash the hell felt only at the level of emotions and thoughts. In fact, the reality in the space of my self, representing the hidden truth, invisible to ordinary sight, became bearable through a kind of mixed vapor of mercy and patience. I knew that I had to risk an escape from a setting that is difficult to admit, a setting that is soulfully related to nature that always surpasses itself, one the artist thinks of down to the smallest details to create the unique atmosphere.

Along the same lines of thought, Ion Frunzetti observes in his criticisms that: "in Rembrandt's art there is a constant ebb and flow of the line upon itself, an oscillation of the brush strokes that separates the shaded part from the lighted part of the form. Considered reduced on the plane, does not this shape of the clear spot in the picture mean, an ignoble remnant from its incessant tearing, by the claws of the spots of darkness? Do we not discover in it a fleeting existence destined to crumble under the attacks of the shadow's greed? Do we not feel absorbed by her, by the tentacles of darkness?"

Here is my attempt to escape from a stormy, mysterious chiaroscuro, truly worthy of a painting by Rembrandt, a chiaroscuro that unceasingly coalesces and dissolves in the field of extremely strong tension, passing through my heart like a thick fog, as strong as blood from an open wound. Rather than a struggle with myself, it was a kind of latent antagonism between instinct and will, a gradual and unresisting occupation of an adverse "domain", as art is seen as domination in its pure state. Thus, I found myself between two extremes, as in any running contest held in unfavorable weather.

Leadership: Can you see yourself as you are beyond what you think about yourself, consistent with the emotional and aesthetic evaluation of a work of art in which you reflect your feelings?

The work of art reflects the experiences of that artist who exposes his vision of an often overlooked reality. Reality itself, with its subjective experiences, is exposed in art by mirroring the vision in a vision that becomes ambition.

Yes. The hardest thing is to find yourself artistically in a running competition, as a whole, like a little DaVinci capable of awakening an emotion in the heart of the viewer. You lose track of a harmonious, definitive, static enlightenment, only to find it in the fog, in the form of a thin tear on your cheek, and finally you reach a place close enough to the work of art that you manage to see yourself differently, more accurately, from another perspective, that of aesthetic experiences.

An aesthetic experience means, in the realist context, that a person has quite remarkable features that the observer can experience when they are in a similar place. It is something related to the senses you receive when you experience a living reality, capable of suggesting through a continuous metamorphosis that prolonged, linear temporality, constituting the meaning of a state of downright surprising firmness, in all your vulnerability.

Leadership: Is the hidden living triggered by a representative event the result of the study of sensitivity or the senses experienced in the form of your fascination in front of a creation that never ceases to amaze?

Practically, the aesthetic experience highlights that sensitive reality expressed by the degree of intensity of the beautiful that is released by the awareness of one's own thoughts and actions transposed in a certain area of art. And this aesthetic experience, divulged through the expressiveness of the image in which I incorporated my feeling, will, intuition and emotion, stands out now through an original creative trajectory, fully manifested, that of an unfalsified internalization that is externalized as an act of confession, of revealing the sensitivity of the athlete and the artist, alike.

If I can say it differently, aesthetic living aims at the possibility of continuous renewal of one's own consciousness and personal attitude towards life, in the space of a creation where universal feelings find their eternal meaning in precise outlines. And immediately, the aesthetic experience captures that intimate, and sometimes painful, relationship that you have with yourself, through a continuous relationship to light and color.

Aesthetic living itself is the result of the study of sensitivity or the senses experienced in the form of your fascination in front of a creation that never ceases to amaze, considering the composition of an image that supports you regardless of what you want to convey. Equally, this aesthetic experience, highlighted as a sensibility articulated on the subtle levels of color tones, without being alien to the negation and gloomy melancholy of a moment left in the memory, springs from the human need to express the relationship between Self and World.

In leadership, man's tendency to decipher can be captured in relation to the expressiveness of the image in which he has incorporated his feeling, will, intuition and emotion, so that he draws inspiration from the two extremes: a rebellion against his expectations and tacit acceptance of a situation for which he is not mentally prepared.

The Eyes Show You Everything That The Soul Experiences on the plane of two contrasting realities: a reality in which the soul's experiences keep you captive in an image viewed retroactively, and a reality of aesthetic experiences that push you to another level and into another form of art.

Only the attraction for the highest beauty, expressible through feelings, can be captured by an unforgettable image. And these feelings that vibrated in me then, striking, unsuspected, flooding me in a certain moment and context, ended up moving the viewer of the final photo. It was the beginning of turning myself into an unforgettable creation...

The Eyes That See Will Open At One Point

On May 27, 2023

Art does not represent the visible, it is the power to make visible the continuity between body and soul, in a marathon of emotions.

I ran with my friends in the field of rapeseed, and I ran with bathed breath, with an open heart, as if I had followed in the footsteps of a painter who set out to portray life and its beauty as faithfully as possible, amazing in a way. For the first time after a long time, after a kind of break between two alternatives: abandonment and mobility, I felt and tasted that childlike freedom, that philosophical concept whose meaning is "the absence of constraints", a fact that makes it possible to obtain the spaces of autonomy, openness to the world and new experiences (unforgettable).

And what a festive air all the memories of that wonderful day have, captured on a light-colored canvas by the painter of an impressionist painting. A painting full of vivid colors, bringing positive energy, meant to remind me of the joy of living. Obviously, the external impact can only be determined by the consciousness of one's own value, instilled by that force of renewal that is always active, especially by that pure spontaneity that only the painter can see when he uses value and chromatic accents in order to dynamize the plastic rhythm and chromatic vibrations.

And I ran, and ran, for almost a whole day. Each of us has experienced a moment of intense peace, yielding to the temptation to use time as an enchanted mountain, a space without beginning and end, wanting to transform it from infinity into something more tangible and finite, beyond the comforting purpose of an Etacecituben Vorgeneh Hugahanat, the intrinsic part of an always bright present. It was as if we were part of an ambitious project to restore the work of a perfect painter who, totally identifying with impressionism, awakening a feeling of amazement, esteem, pride and nostalgia at the same time, chose to see, to amplify the beauty and light in people, in all surrounding things.

Leadership: Can you integrate yourself into a painting that marks the debut of abstract art, convincing the viewer that there is depth where in fact there are only appearances?

There was a vivid yellow everywhere, surrounding us like a bright ring with an irregular outline, symbolically represented in a painting that perfectly conveys the sense of integrity and brightness of the visual perception of nature. It was an escape from a world that promises only indifference and obscurity, a moving abandonment in a free and vast space, according to the style of an art that captures life from a completely different light. In fact, everything happened in correlation with the revelation of another world, of a mysterious order, of a space-time continuum that, once glimpsed, can hardly be forgotten. Just like in an Eliade opera.

I felt that I existed, that I lived in a kind of duality between the narrator and the protagonist, because there were those artist's eyes that were waiting to suddenly transport me to another space, in a rift of reality opened between two distinct worlds, of which one is the memorized story, and the other is the resonance box of the echoes of an entire generation of young artists. I think we were all artists in an outdoor painting, in the moment of impressionistic explosion, succeeds in convincing the viewer that there is depth where in fact there are only appearances.

The unique individual in himself means a hundred thousand to others, that is, in the eyes of others he sees only himself, reconciled with the idea of freedom on the model of permissiveness, distinguishing himself in a picture in which the others remain closed, waiting for him to set the tone. In that moment of great joy, which everyone was waiting for with great impatience, running through the field of rapeseed was the proof that there is a depth inside me that houses a fragment of a huge painting, a miniature world that wants its whole, worthy of a spirit of great harmony.

Leadership: Do you know how to see in a physical activity that close connection with art, as an opening of the perspective towards a "stop frame" in time?

I don't know why, but running beat time, at least it seemed to me that time went crazy. No one was focusing on running at a moderate pace for long distances, no one was focusing on breathing, on rhythm, flexibility, correct movement. Instead, everyone seemed to be gaining experience in the field of outdoor painting, because everyone seemed to see in the surrounding yellow a source of expressive effects, a window to harmony with self and other, a visual area that allows the display of favorable attitudes for the act of creating a painting addressed to connoisseurs.

That's how it is. The exercise of sight is subject to a creative force that does not act blindly, calling nature to refreshment, but comes from the beauty you have in your soul, which immediately delights you with all the colors of nature, as it looks exclusively at living itself, a fact that matters of the dynamics of the perceptual act. Pay attention to the meaning of my words because here, my eyes come alive again with small colorful details that enlighten me, my heart warms and beats again at the sight of places that brighten my day. All the better. I continued to run without stress, and I did so until the end. It turned out well.

After all, running includes central and peripheral vision. Conceived in the realization of a Self Universe, the very act of my seeing seemed charged with the simplicity of the canvases of the painter Rogier of Brugge, of which the writer Carel van Mander said "were worthy of attention and appreciation, because to do something on such a large scale, you have to be a good drawer and a clever man. Otherwise what on a small scale might easily become a successful work, on a large scale may fail."

Leadership pushes even further the parallelism between art and a physical activity that strengthens character (and produces joy), if we take into account the upper limit of skills transformed into creative talent.

And art does not represent the visible, but is the power to make visible the continuity between body and soul.

The Eyes That See Will Be Opened At One Point. I say this because no one knew how to see in a mundane running experience that close connection with art, filtered through a painter's canvas, as an opening of the perspective towards a "stop frame" in time.

It is not easy to be an artist, and only very few truly understand art, just as there are many runners who fail to integrate into a wider, surrealist horizon.

The Facts Speak For Themselves

On February 03, 2009

Improve your leadership ability, by equipping your potential with those "alert pieces" that can keep you alive.

In the movie "The Great Escape (1963)" MacDonald (played by the actor Gordon Jackson), has instructed the encampment's runaways – namely, how should they react if, after the escape, the German officers would identify them at the control points.

- Keep in mind very well ! Do not speak English. Speak only German and only what I have taught you. The German officers will use a trick to verify your identity. More than likely they will ask something in English. Whatever it is you do not answer anything. Pretend yourself that you do not know English.

Towards the end of the movie, MacDonald with another runaway, manage to get close to the border with Spain. However, when they had to enter the bus that should have pass them the border, are stopped by two German officers that require passports. After a short conversation in German, and after they have checked their documents, which seemed to be fine, one of the German officers uses the trick: "Good luck".

Happy to have escaped so easily of the control, MacDonald replied to the officer while boarding on the bus: "Thank you". Suddenly, he realizes the mistake made, but it too late. He had already fallen into the trap.

But the facts are more precious than words.

A moment of inattention has cost him life ! Precisely he, MacDonald, the one who instructed the runaways on how to proceed in order to escape, warning them not speaking in no way in English, fell into the trap. How do you explain this thing? Well, MacDonald was a good teacher for the other prisoners, he knew to instruct them, to guide and to put on guard, but when it came time to put into practice what he taught others to do, he simply forgot his own advices.

Leadership: Do you get involved in something going on outside of your own choices by not having the idea of customizing events?

Are you leaving your guard down even when you have to make the big step? This scene from the movie is useful to remind us how vulnerable we are when you leave our guard down, and when we do not respect the principles of which we are headed. Frankly speaking, many leaders become seriously ill from this disease of "forgetfulness" if I can call it like that.

Someone said that the premise of the circumstances' impact on human attitudes and options cannot be questioned. In such a case, we may consider to be ampler the configuration of actions and deeds subject to assumed utility, but also to self-value transferred in the space of events and circumstances over which man can interfere.

We must not consider individual conscience as the basis for everything that goes around, with complete confidence in favorable decisional factors. Let's not make from our personal goals a total abandonment in the hands of Divine Providence. But to focus our attention on correcting errors during our rush to a new beginning, as an extension of existential construction.

The events you organize can be customized by taking on a multiplayer role, in which teams are made, relationships are formed, and a feeling of adherence to a "story" that deserves to be lived to the fullest is generated. At the same time, they can be customized with "circumstantial" roles where your position becomes unstable due to imprecise direction and weak "off-road" skills.

Leadership: Do you accept a request of intervention in the event of an extreme situation, but without validating your dependency on controlling the situation?

To customize events means to assign to your actions a value of the type "separation from the initial context of approaching the problem", meaning, to accept a request of intervention in the case of an extreme situation, but without validating your dependency on controlling said situation.

The dependency of maintaining control of a situation, this term that suggests that nothing can work "without it", creates a constraint towards the mission you are called upon to fulfill. And through this constraint of the type "Finish what you start", you are re-conquering a world only partly congruent with your adaptive needs. You start depending on what you do not know awaits you, anchoring your actions near what it means to survive by using as few resources as possible.

Leadership occurs when you back into something invisible and you push with all of your strength into something happening outside of your own choices. When you let yourself feel overwhelmed by the strange, ill-intentioned sensation, experienced by your skill to properly articulate yourself in a context, by which is directly or indirectly made the error to omit the essential. It means to grant "autonomy" to the small territory of uncertainty in the absence of an observer to fix reality or create a new one.

There can be no question of the "judge's" burden to make capital decisions as long as you can see nothing but immense confusion and you cannot undo the previous situation.

To experience leadership from a better angle of approach, you must advance in the crowded "traffic" of situation changes, get to the initial observation point, where alarm signals are pulled in case of side-slip, and select integration rhythms of safety sensors in case of something "unexpected".

Leadership: Do you reap the fruits of your endeavors to adapt to a circumstantial role, to the extent in which you have drawn lessons from the representations of your position towards the impact of events?

Are you listening in the car that kind of music that makes you vibrate? If so, then you are probably familiar with that powerful feeling, in that rush of adrenaline when listening to certain tracks, you press the gas pedal and feel that you are your absolute master. This is the moment when, not being blocked by any other machine, you can maximally release your potential.

Your capacity of focusing yourself on what it is important to do, is like a song that makes you press the gas pedal of your potential when you are put in alertness. If you get stuck when you have to you press the gas pedal, your leadership will never catch a great getaway.

Your success in all that you enterprise, will not be influenced insomuch by the ability of preparing yourself thoroughly, but more on the way you are acting, on the way you are relating your practical potential on the level of knowledge that you have gained. Your real training begins with the knowledge that you assimilate, but the test of your perfection ends with what you know to do with them when you have to put them into practice.

If I think about the movie "The Great Escape (1963)" I consider that of all the runaways, MacDonald was the weakest link. Even if he understood very well to instruct the people, he was the only one who failed the "practice test". He failed the test of his perfection !

Put in time on the move your own functioning system, otherwise you risk waking up with unpleasant surprises. Always equip your potential with a well-developed practical sense - with those "alert pieces" that can keep you alive.

Does your position's representation towards the impact of events have as a starting point an escape from a situation of insecurity, and a boomerang effect as a finite point?

Conclusion: Be careful on how you are directing people and what advises you give them, because if what you tell them does not resonate with what you do, you may lose your credibility and you risk to not be followed by anyone.

The Fascinating Part Behind Leadership

On March 12, 2020

The content of spiritual life is a peak of the artist's coming of age creation.

I often walk through the Palas bookstore. I browse books from different fields. I prefer fiction. And fiction does not need secret expressions and codes to at least earn the merit of being browsed, or even deepened by those whose curiosity is quite high. I learned one important thing, often ignored by many writers. The beauty of a book is not in the secret language, as is the case with the Da Vinci code, or the esoteric methods of Kabbalistic information, in fact the artistic language is the beginning of a creation that must be outlined as a lesson in maturity. It teaches you to be more lucid, more open-minded. Better. Wiser.

When I was a student, I read Prus' "Pharaoh", then Mika Waltari's "The Egyptian", then Wilbur Smith's "The Magician". Especially books about ancient Egypt, such as those written by Gerald Massadie. But I also reread "Ulysses" by James Joyce and "The Name of the Rose" by Umberto Eco. I felt like a pharaoh from an Egypt found in another phase of evolution, permanently at altitude in terms of the way the world works, then I was under the magic of an adorable cliché: "god-God" that still makes me to feel connected to the nature of space-time content. At one point I was a slave who became king. However, I got stuck at a certain point, namely when the Pharaoh becomes the slave of a magic that is visible only in terms of a "game of confusion".

I learned one thing. In vain did you understand the secret language, so secret that many do not even realize it if they read the Bible 100 times. What really matters is the triumph of the final lesson, or the conclusion. More than anything, the story matters. Its depth. Its simplicity full of depth. Its relevance. The fantastic. Morality. In the face of such language, due to its hidden effects, from symbolism to craft, it is possible that reading acquires the sense of image autonomy and mutual relationship between it and the referent, the image being the enlarged version of your Ego, while the referent is the projection of your Ego into a new reality.

Leadership: How fascinating is the prospect of looking at life experiences in terms of the suggestive capacity of artistic creation to convert the latencies of worldview into the scene of a character writing his own novel?

When I read John Fowles, or Victor Hugo, or Alexandre Dumas, I identified with the main character, I experienced the same emotions full of tenderness, I felt the same pain or joy as his. Mystery. Love. Teaching. Challenge. At other times I felt that I was touching things I knew I would leave, but which I would never forget. Because they remained there, pleasing to my soul, deeply imprinted in my conscience, and because my soul likes, loves, admires their depth immensely.

So here is the secret of beautiful writing, of fiction full of simplicity: to know how to incite the reader, not to try to bring him back to the center of an interpretive issue. The path the character traverses, which you can know from the back of a solemn temple, is more important than any secret writing. For secret writing lacks emotion, it often lacks storytelling. And the story is everything. Or at least, the life behind the story is what really matters.

Life beats film, beats any story, because life is the transposition of a story into a film in which the viewer believes himself to be the main character, in order to personalize the main character as he pleases. This is also magic, a way of delighting the sight to which many a times something seems to be one thing, and other times it seems futile.

Leadership: Is the perspective with which you look at your fascinating life experience left to your ability to convert your latencies of expressiveness into a creation that unfolds horizontally?

Be the story you read about others. Be the writer who writes the story. Be the writing without which the story could not exist. Learn to be yourself, learning from the lives of others how to be a story. That's all. A creation that unfolds horizontally is the straight path you follow, evolving from the confessions of a fictional character, to understanding the way of living a life that surpasses the story.

The latencies of expressiveness are given by the power of your soul to connect to everything that means "unique and accidental event", by the mastery of the art of probing more deeply the various psychologies, so that the radius of creation that measures the representation as such of the final masterpiece acquires the characteristic of wisdom. Let us not forget the definition given by someone on the internet, "expressiveness is the linguistic representation of imagination and affectivity".

That is my only wisdom. That's all I learned from all the good books. And I'm glad I read and experienced only the excellent ones. And I am glad that I understood the wisdom, so seldom acquired only by reading and writing, by the fact that I knew how to distinguish between quality and kitsch, between a plea for the natural and a compilation of incisive visions.

And due to the fact that everything I read that was good could be contained in a single book, such as "Duma Key" by Stephen King, as an explanation for the writing creation, I feel obliged to consider myself the main measure of evaluation, judgment and appreciation of some findings with which one can understand the "cognitive surplus" element in philosophy. The wise man is the content of the book he has in his soul, following his advice as a look at his own writings.

Leadership, in the vision of a writer, represents a step in the spiritual ascent of the world recognized by gaining a new understanding of knowledge that starts from the experience of life (condensed in a format of expressiveness) and continues with the story of a story character who raises life at the level of the masterpiece of creation.

The Fascinating Part Behind Leadership is the aspiration of your creation to express itself in one word, "STORY", related to the following lesson of maturity: you cannot be the guardian of high wisdom until you imitate the best character in the book that concerns you in a special way.

The Fatal Gates Of The Consciousness

Fortify the foundation of your leadership, by establishing a concordance between your attitude and your true spiritual background on which underlies your conscience.

The movie "Tears of the Sun (2003)". The commando teams led by Lt. Waters together with more than 40 locals were going to the withdrawal area Alpha, on the border with Nigeria. Nevertheless, a tragic incident occurs - one of those fatal moments that the destiny creates in its incomprehensible course and decides, in one stroke, the human fate. Suddenly, they are attacked from all sides. Michael 'Slo', one of the team members is seriously injured.

- I should not be like this, boss. It should not have happened ... addressing to Waters'. And, with the last forces, seemed to add the words that the shot firer chief, Francois de Louviers-Maurevel told them at one time to King Charles IX: "My life is in your hands, do what you want with it."Leave me here to save yours.

Leadership: Can you penetrate the truth of your own self and accept it with the conviction that everything that happens to you is a challenge meant to prepare you for an all-encompassing perception of reality?

These words could be accepted by some without remorse, but not by Waters, who was responsible for the safety of his team - the words had two meanings: one of accepting the sacrifice to save the others, the other one accusing, because it reminded him, constantly, of his ethics and professionalism.

In his devotion, beyond corrupt, Waters hold a deep respect and deep gratitude. He enveloped 'Slo' with a look full of understanding, and then squeezed his hand. On his face was reading the inner disorder. Like a terrible storm crowded in his soul, opening in this way the fatal doors of his consciousness.

Waters should have penetrated the truth of his own self. And to accept it. A sincere "I'm sorry. It's my fault" - could not redeem his mistake and could not absolve him of the moral consequences. The death of 'Slo' touched the most sensitive chord of his conscience, and his behavior was in agreement with his spiritual background, on which underlies his conscience.

The toughest reality that took shape for lieutenant Waters in such a moment is that he has to assume his choices and not let himself be influenced by events, regardless of the mood and health of those that are to blame for having followed him in a dangerous mission.

Leadership: Do you accept the truth of the conscience through an agreement conditioned by the confession of the mistakes and overcoming them?

I address you one question, future leader, and think well because its solution is needful for you. Is there any sin that can be forgiven to you - a sin so great and so serious that no one would dare to forgive, not even yourself, and not even God? What I suggest you is nothing but a general test which is related to your general state of consciousness.

Do you accept the truth of the conscience through an agreement conditioned by the confession of the mistakes and overcoming them? Or by assuming and fixing them? Or you accept to be the prisoner of a moral and spiritual crisis?

The consciousness is the foundation of the leadership, it is the one that marks the significant difference between the Ego assessed as a result of moral or emotional constraint, and the ideal Ego, to which every leader aspires, the latter being a projection of a positive self image. The challenge in your case as a leader is to initiate the change and to facilitate the development of your own being, even when your moral authority does not guarantee your success.

Just as a poison can be fatal and to the one that prepares it, even so, could be diminished the quality of a leader if he lets his conscience handy to the compromise between fulfilling his moral ideals and emphasizing the negative convictions, which are thinning the emotions' wall of defense that guarantees its operation at an optimal level. With what convictions do you fill up your consciousness when you combine in an unbalanced way your values and beliefs?

Someone said that the consciousness of death helps us better understand life. Likewise, we should plant in the garden of our mind the awareness of the mistakes and its consequences to better understand the leadership and to avoid a possible conviction of our own personality, of the inability to live up to the level imposed by our and others' moral expectations. The history shows us that the leadership development is based on the existence of the mistakes, more or less serious, on their recognition, but also on their ways of preventing and correcting.

Leadership: Can you create a clear vision for yourself of the values you want to transmit in relation to a perception of spiritual troubles that are apparently lacking in depth?

Plutarch, that famous writer, compared the gifts of nature with some wonderful flowers, but temporary, while he considered the virtue as a beneficial herb, with an everlasting fragrance and healing the wounds without fail.

Do you consider that you have to take attitude towards the degradation process of your conscience? I believe that the substance of your leadership should not to be sought only within your being, as it is stated so often, but equally in your way of assessing, externalizing and transmitting your feelings.

At the emotional healing and the development of your consciousness you will gradually come, by sincerely and joyfully planting seeds in the hearts of people, leaving them to bear fruit and flourish there, but at the same time, conscientiously taking care of protecting your own moral code.

The virtue, in this case, means to choose what is right, from what is wrong, not to focus your emotions and your consciousness on the mistakes that cannot be avoided. The virtue can heal your moral wounds if you integrate into your leadership that range of values typical to your process of evolution, not of involution - values that lead to a fuller understanding of your true spiritual background, on which underlies your conscience, by suppressing the defects that can lead to your negative transformation, and encouraging you to adopt a healthy attitude, or at least more optimistic, and a more deliberate behavior.

Spiritual troubles, apparently lacking in depth, can be understood as being a result of going through the blows of life, at different stages of the career, which amplify your pain but not the cause of its occurrence.

The consciousness that invokes virtues has as a symptom a passing pain, not one that lasts.

The fatal gates of the consciousness marks the way you relate to your inner state, the way your control your emotions in difficult situations. It highlight your good parts that you do not take into consideration because of the unfavorable circumstances - which reduces your state of mind and your self esteem, impeding you to channel your inner strength to a positive state. And, as someone stated, the character is given precisely by the way you react in front of the unfavorable circumstances.

In leadership, it is essential to recognize your mistakes, to beware of not repeating them, to assume the consequences and to develop your consciousness - to guard it against the negative emotions, but also against the "attack" of non-values.

The Fatal Solidarity, Whose Punishment Flings Its Condemned

On December 10, 2012

Play the role that fits you best, without deviating from the path that is beneficial for your development and of the others around you.

Someone said that life is woven of various threads, the good one being along with the bad one. What about a character in the skin of another character, or a soldier entering the rank of the enemy? Who of these two human types, of these two personalities united by a simple stitch, by an irony of fate, was the good one, and who was the bad one? Llewelyn Moss or Carson Wells?

An unfortunate event, or better said, the fate had rushed with a loaded gun on the two protagonists, regardless of how they acted, putting them face to face, as though together, they could glimpse the mysterious aspects of an alchemy. However, the boundaries between these two natives living under the sign of unpredictability, of these two continents with a past and very different point of view, were separated by an ocean that they could not pass it.

And this ocean, frightening and cruel, to all those who ventured on its scope, which must be crossed at any cost as quickly as possible, lifted up its waves higher and higher above the two ones, without any sign or any glimmer of hope that it will appease too soon. This turbulent ocean was Anton Chigurh.

Why should not we show us stronger, why should not we conclude an alliance in order to drain this ocean of any kind of force? Carson Wells gave to understand this to Llewelyn Moss. I suppose this is not the future that you've imagined when you set your eyes on the money, isn't it Moss? Let's share them, and I will help you survive the storm.

The interdependence and interconnectivity between the two ones, between these two human systems under pressure, each of them under the responsibility of the other one, seemed to strengthen as a result of clotting a strictly necessary solidarity.

Leadership: Are you prepared to shape yourself as a man of value from the position emerged from the duel: "Two against One" or from the duel: "One against the world"?

But a ship, no matter how solid it would be conceived, can always be struck on the larboard, risking to sink if the crew fails to stop quickly the leak through which the water rushes. At least until it reaches the nearest land.

Like some hunters, who are tracing the hunting, both condemned to the fusion, the two brave rowers start - but on their own - an investigation to track down Anton Chigurh, the merciless assassin. Submitting for this purpose a huge effort in horrendous conditions - survival becoming the heaviest burden.

By themselves in a continuous whirl with negative consequences, of seeking and punishment, Llewelyn Moss and Carson Wells are soundly shaken, then thrown down terribly. Definitively. Deathly.

Like a strange blow of fate, as a consequence of the two ones wicked solidarity in trying to rise to a higher level, as a harsh punishment for having the audacity to put equality into two unequal forces as a way of being in the world and to react to unforeseen situations, Anton Chigurh managed to attract the luck by his side. Thus, earning the right to access, triumphant, the opportunity to fully integrate the human group that knows only evil, and so often the victory.

Leadership: Do you shape your character in accordance with the characteristics of feelings you represent by going through a process of harmonization with the decisions of a justice of questionable billing?

For your leadership to be improved you must go through a process of transformation. But not a process of degradation. Not that process which, from a poorly refined instinct, without the participation of the ambition or of the truly remarkable will, Llewelyn Moss and Carson Wells went through it in haste.

That false collaboration between them that made huge leaps through the fog, the artificial solidarity that had in its equipment only selfishness, stubbornness, lack of principles, refusal to change, greed, indifference and possessiveness, it costed them their lives.

But always when two are fighting, the third wins. The only winner was exactly the assassin, Anton Chigurh, who took advantage of the lack of close collaboration between the two ones. He managed to move to the next level of excellence (but in relation to the Evil forces) because he backed the access to their world, because he found a place on edge of the abyss, in which it was obvious that they will tumble at one moment.

Leadership is a reaction of mitigating the transitory effects towards a status of autonomy (that of not depending on anyone), when you force the detachment from the immediate circumstances that arise when two fight and the third wins.

Comparing a human type with another, studying the rivalry between them, leads to a new aspect of the individual. A connector, which sets a good relationship with an Alter-Ego, helping to produce a different kind of being.

With the safety of a clockwork mechanism, Anton coupled the power sockets of the excellence with those functional qualities governing leadership, as well as with the effects of the past actions, to a more special gasket - steadfastness and the strength of principle. Reconsidering the fund of skills as a unifying element of a vast change. An alternative to bypass the danger by keeping the ball in the air through successive blows.

I am not defending any of the character, good or bad, but I confine myself strictly to the lessons concerning leadership that can be drawn from the way in which the action took place, and how it were presented the characters in the movie "No Country for Old Men (2007)"

Leadership: Have you become the prisoner of a world that you cannot perceive instead of serving a certain circumstance to strengthen your position of superiority over what is about to represent you in a role of great power?

Going all costs before towards achieving excellence, without detecting and annihilating that worn cell from the structure of the "Man" within you, the dusty feature, covered by a dense accumulation of steep values, addictions, and practices foreign to your way of being , it is like being the prisoner of a world that you cannot perceive.

You lose yourself in labyrinths, avoiding the straight road. You despise your own sense of orientation through an absence of response to any factor of stability. You become less and less concerned about yourself; at the same time, you cannot imagine at all that someone else might really need you.

And the problem can become even more complicated than that. You are tricked by your own "justice" that creates you a false impression. A mixture of shyness, panic and aggression that separates you from yourself, from the area where you want to reach. A type of Carson Wells or Llewelyn Moss, who ceaselessly attack each other by a false solidarity. A separation of the role that suits you best. A weak trend of improving the relationship between the partners. A partnership placed under a protective shell, but in fact difficult and hostile.

Or the leadership that directs seriously all its resources towards the human dimension, it is primarily a matter of time and fairness. A way to test your ability to not limit yourself to the standards of a world foreign of the true leadership, in which the gap between you and the others is deepening more and more, in which you are always surrounded by another role, and in which you appreciate the others after a code of dishonor or putting them into question.

The only circumstance that helps you to strengthen your position of superiority over what is about to represent you in a role of great force occurs when you are forced to act differently than your conscience dictates or when you are able to see something good in a person that you cannot stand.

The fatal solidarity, whose punishment flings its condemned shows what happen when you break any connection with the leadership of quality by the absence or inadequacy of a sound and lasting solidarity.

Just as a football player needs to lay under contribution not only his physical resources, but also the intellectual ones, so and you, not to become the victim of a negligence commited due to forgetfulness of self, you must put your qualities of a "Man" in the service of your progress and of the others around you.

Play the role that fits you best, without deviating from the path that is beneficial for your development and of the others around you.

The Feeling Of Being Reduced To Essences

On April 09, 2008

You have to feed on the essence of an artistic affirmation perspective in order to understand the value of the creation that best represents you in terms of a clean-artistic vision.

The lines and colors are shaped, transformed during the crossing of Mexico. The hardness of the lines and the harshness of the colors soften to the south. The cruelty of the central plateau is attenuated. In the north, red birds do not eat their prey as soon as they kill it, but stick their beetle or worm on top of a leaf and wait, in order to devour it, to be dried by the heat of the sun. There the horses are driven to crush with their hooves the tests of the rebellious pawns after they have been buried in the scorching ground. There is a world of cruelty. To the south, the sharp maguey leaf becomes lacy and turns into the curls of the vines. The bright color gives way to shades of green. Cruelty dissolves into indifference.

*That "day-dreaming", that thirst for daytime semi-drowsiness, continues to remain for director Sergei Eisenstein a means of perceiving the environment, bringing into consciousness strange visions, metamorphoses of reality. In this paradise of graphic art, the artist begins to draw. A lot, an enormous amount. Records what he sees. Then, overcoming this first phase, through the abstracted, intellectualized line, the drawing captures a very sensual relationship, at the same time delusional, between human figures in unusual situations. The feeling of genesis of the world that he experiences everywhere, during his stay in Mexico, this feeling of reduction to essences, to the primary elements, is probably also the basis of the essentialized thinking about the life-death relationship.

Leadership: Does the act of assimilating the artistic means necessary to cultivate your creation fall within the essence of some perspectives but also limits of receiving the visual-artistic message, taking into account what you need to know at the abstract level?

Developing the capacity to receive the visual-artistic message is the first task that a director must fulfill, knowing that the variety of the complex in which the notions, expressions and meanings that support and promote a modernist artistic current are rooted, depends on the content it provides to spectators. In his screenplays, the director not only captures human figures in unusual situations, through successive metamorphoses of reality, reflecting the horizons of an impressive creation through vastness, diversity and depth, he rather captures the relationship between the nature of thought and the organization of human experience data.

And what is this artistic message, expressed through images, other than the result of using the intrinsic effects of art emotionally and mentally, being consonant with major themes of reflection, including the harmonious relationship between man and nature. Or, as someone said on a website: "The artistic message is that ideational aura in which the author dresses his work to make its content a vehicle to the soul and spirit of the receiver."

Here we see two perspectives of the artistic message: the consciousness of the vision and the metamorphosis of reality by returning to myth and legend, that is, by overcoming the spatio-temporal coordinates. And as limits we capture, in an accessible plan of visibility, the inability to focus on understanding the role of subjective experience and the invalidity of a progress in terms of harmony between the setting and the atmosphere, between the characters and their motivations.

Therefore, it is necessary to take into account the artistic message, finding the harmony between sound and image, when we place ourselves in a plane much closer to the viewer than the characters are in reality.

What you need to know at an abstract level for your vision to encompass the meanings of an image or countless moving images (as in the case of movies) is how you can approach the shapes and attitudes of a human figure through a means of perceiving the environment. In this case you can use an artistic process through which, based on common features, two terms are joined, in order to highlight the first.

As for the art of directing, more important than the images extracted from the experience of life is the story in which life stores all the images around a personality that has ceased to be a promise and has become a certainty.

The Feeling Of Being Reduced To Essences is distinguished by the relationship between what we see and what we want to see at the level of an authentic creation that evolves through a message with artistic content: "What you express in a compressed way (reactions, emotions and states) is what gives nature a level of knowledge through images."

Take into account the essence of an artistic affirmation perspective so that you can understand the value of the creation that best represents you in terms of a clean-artistic vision. Remember: an artistic affirmation perspective has as a novelty support the essentialization of an idea that is to be transmitted through the images made both visually and technically. And a clean-artistic vision is an image you can't look at, even if you see it only once, possible to be modeled at any time by the way a photographer thinks.

The Feeling Of Reduction To Primary Elements

On December 19, 2012

Creation involves a search for the fundamental core, the basic elements and principles that are at the origin of a phenomenon, process or complex creation, so as to provide a deep understanding of subtleties and hidden meanings.

Lines and colors are shaped, transformed during the journey through Mexico. The hardness of the lines and the harshness of the colors soften towards the south. The cruelty of the central plateau is softened. In the north, the red birds do not eat their prey as soon as they kill it, but stick the beetle or the worm in the top of a leaf and wait, in order to devour it, to be dried by the heat of the sun. There the horses are driven to crush the testicles of the rebellious peons with their hooves after they have been buried in the burning earth. There is a world of cruelty. Towards the south, the pointed leaf of the maguey laces and turns into the curls of vines. The bright color gives way to green tones. Cruelty dissolves into indifference.

That "day-dreaming", that thirst for diurnal semi-somnolence, continues to remain for Eisenstein a means of perceiving the environment, bringing to consciousness strange visions, metamorphoses of reality. In this "paradise of graphic art" the artist begins to draw. Very, very much. Record what you see. Then, going beyond this first phase, through the abstracted, intellectualized line, the drawing captures a very sensual, at the same time delirious relationship between human figures in unusual situations.

The feeling of the genesis of the world that he tries all the time in Mexico, this feeling of reduction to essences, to primary elements, is probably also at the base of the essentialized thinking about the life-death relationship.

Leadership: Can you develop a holistic view of things, starting from the essences to be able to then integrate the multiplicity of aspects and details into a coherent and profound whole?

In the cultural landscape of any region, lines and colors morph and transform, reflecting not just geographical but emotional changes. This is what the director needs to make a masterpiece. The harshness and cruelty of the north, where even the leaves witness violence, gradually transforms into the maguey of the south, where the metamorphoses of reality become frequent. This process is similar to an allergic skin reaction, where visible changes are responses to external stimuli, with each region reacting differently, similar to individual sensitivity to allergens.

A cinematic creation stimulates introspection, awareness and understanding of fundamental relationships such as those between life and death, because in art there is often a tendency to explore and convey essences of the human condition, deep existential themes related to the cycle of life, death, suffering, love, etc. Through cinematic techniques such as symbolism, visual metaphors, powerful images, art can provoke introspection and deep reflection on the great existential questions of the human being.

Leadership: Can you make the effort to discover and understand the depth, roots, sources or substrates from which a reality springs, beyond its immediate appearances?

Authentic art tends to convey universal and intimate truths about human nature, forcing us to confront the fundamental turmoil and questions that define our experience on this earth. Stories and characters in films can reflect and explore the boundary conditions of existence such as death, suffering, sacrifice, etc., leading the viewer to meditations on the meaning and value of life.

A talented director, captivated by this "paradise of graphic art", expresses his feelings and perceptions through drawings, using an abstracted line to capture sensual and delirious relationships between forms. It reflects the genesis of the world and the dynamics of the life-death relationship. The artist identifies and utilizes cultural elements that can minimize emotional dissonance and maximize artistic expression, thereby enhancing the perception and appreciation of his work in various contexts.

Leadership facilitates an "essentialized" thinking, focused on the basic elements and principles, the generative nuclei from which the whole derives.

Moreover, this sense of reduction to primary elements provides a more comprehensive view of the genesis, origins, and primordial processes underlying complex phenomena or creations.

The Feeling Of Reduction To Primary Elements represents the effort to discover and understand the roots, sources or substrates from which a reality springs, beyond its immediate appearances. It is a gateway to basic truths and meanings, to the meaning-generating cores of a work, thought, or complex human experience. It is an attempt to simplify, to reduce to pure forms or expressions, to essentialize creation by eliminating excess and preserving what is truly defining.

The Feelings Of An Artist Fascinated By The Meticulousness Of His Passion

On September 29, 2019

Learn to look at the world through what you have inside you, because only in this way can you see the reality of your own vision of the world, in its essence.

The rose. An eternal model of sensitivity, un mediatore tra il regno celeste e il mondo terreno. In his attitude and figure there is stillness and grace, a proof of clarity in adapting the view from light to darkness, breathing an air of ancient nobility, of sincerity, as if it should revisit its past in the present of a history that must not be allowed to repeat itself, but only shared by the magical power of art.

Its life is the story of a world made to live discreetly, through style, sottigliezza estetic, which slowly extinguishes to start another, just as suggestive, whose prophets are not always of good artistic faith.

I speak first of all about roses in the technique of using the brush because they teach me to understand myself in a way that I have never done before, without feeling the urgent need to be understood by other people. After all, this is also a way of revitalizing the aesthetic feeling towards the nature which, within the scope of my own personality meant to ensure the uninterrupted, connotativo e sacro, of modern art, can be translated by increasing the interest towards the representations of a consciousness that has broken out of the turmoil of the time in which he lives.

I cannot hide a smile from the beginning when I think that everything I have managed to recover from the high voltage of experiencing a moment of maximum sensitivity, by cutting a sublime image from a perfectly clean and polished decoration with the need to talk about myself, a pure, spontaneous configuration, evoking the physiognomy of something capable of symbolizing the radiant energy of a well-known artist, has as a correspondent the need to communicate a very accessible aesthetic content, which enchants the sight, the mind and the soul of the viewer.

Leadership: Can you project the clarity of an image into an artistic perspective onto the world around you, in relation to the composition of an aesthetic that gives rise to a particular catharsis feeling?

Part of the life of the rose I dedicate to the passion of living fully in joy, comparable to a reflection of my inner state in a simpler, quiet and profound universe, to which only few have access. As if, together, we were a being with a purity of particular invoice. Therefore, one would say that my world is a reflection of life experiences lived under the aegis of a sustained artistic activity, under the aegis of a living, unmistakable approach to what is meant by "the oldest known figurative work".

But at the same time, the art of extending the meaning of the rose, of clarifying the particularly profound significance of an expectation that marks its existence, makes me enter the skin of Miranda Gray, the character in John Fowles' "The Collector", which is captured in the "work" of an entomology artist:

"I need to climb the stairs again and open the workshop door. Seeing him at the work table, looking over my shoulder, as if he hadn't been bothered by whoever came in. To see him standing there, his smile barely outlined, looking at me with those eyes that understand everything so quickly. But it's useless. I think of the price before you paint the picture, aware that I must be the model of a new art that echoes a state of ingenuity, the abandonment of any artistic fabric."

The rose creates the conditions for deepening an art of the intimate modification of the being, as a reflected extension of the self in the true light of a disturbing and mysterious presence, dominating the destinies of all those longing for art, for symbolism, for strong sensations. I smiled at him, as I smile at an artist who knows no boundaries, struggling with all my might to claim that I like everything about him. He gave no sign that he might disappear from the avant-garde current in the near future.

His mere presence immediately acts on me soothingly and positively, like the purity you can find in dealing with a sensitive subject, to the inner power given to you by the contact with nature.

Leadership: Can you form an affordable vision through a life experience between something that feels eternal and an ephemeral moment, without breaking away from the object of your creation?

The rose. I describe it as the end of an endangered art in today's society: the art of ennobling a culture of the present by negotiating with history, and creating the feeling of stability, spiritual connection, belonging to a higher purpose, in search of an atemporal ambient beauty. I feel the intoxicating smell, I feel the emotion, un elemento importante nell'esperienza artistica, placing the breath of popularity in the level of sensations and instincts that a colorist of great virtuosity, an artist caught in the throes of an overwhelming passion, can never suppress. Just like seeing a person who is very attractive.

To turn art into a kind of aesthetic delight means to model a lesser-known reality through the form, color and movement described by the tenderness of a flower, a butterfly, a beauty that overcomes any sense of wickedness. So here I am, interpreting the role of a painter who controls the most cheerful color through spirit and reason to capture the moment when the rose crosses its own path, graceful and noble, elegant and romantic as a poem addressed to the stars, for an exceptional recognition attributed only to a perfect being.

What Miranda Gray told the butterfly collector remains, in the full glow of roses, a learning and edifying experience: "When you draw an object, you see it come to life, and when you photograph it, it dies."

The real value of a painting is a recognition of the rose in the glamorous being that shines of life, beyond appearance and color, provided it is not immortalized in an ephemeral moment.

A diverse range of feelings from pain to comfort, from acceptance to contestation and then again to recognition, dominates the work to which the artist devotes another page of his book of life. The astonishment of everything that means "surreal" becomes an axis of knowledge, more a clairvoyant judgment than a lucid intuition, which I assume as a journey into a universe created by nature harmoniously, revealed by symbol and portrayed as a sensitive and immortal character.

The Feelings Of An Artist Fascinated By The Meticulousness Of His Passion (such as peace of mind, serenity, joy) are closely related to the feeling of identifying with a wonder of nature – to live with it as if you were looking in a mirror that does not reflect images, but superimposes ideals of beauty over facts of life, culture, spirituality, artistic orientation, always refreshing and long lasting.

The passion of an artist, without however joining in a current of sociological thinking, consists in the unlimited description of a deeper image, a total sincerity, part of nature, part of the human being, hidden in the dynamics of life. His meticulousness, meaning that he is quite adept at choosing every part of the whole image, which he can often change by changing the color filter, background and objects attached to it, must be approached as an unwritten law of artistic evolution. The painters are the keepers of an ancient, sacred art, which few can comprehend in its true depth.

The Feelings Of Living Characters Are Born From The Evocation Of Events

Leadership in directing is based on the ability to transform abstract ideas into vibrant and engaging visuals, evoking authentic characters and emotions that deeply enrich the story and script.

Once assimilated by the director through all his pores, the entire work that this script represented will allow him to make his film moving casually in the revolutionary world that he was painting, inventing facts, non-existent episodes in the script, but in perfect accordance with the atmosphere of 1905. Eisenstein wrote that only in this way can the bushy and at the same time laconic scenario be understood - which, as we found, many of commentators on his work have otherwise never succeeded - the way he created his film. "Only by relying on this work was the director able to mark with simple sequence numbers such scenes as "the cruiser passes by the fleet without firing", or "a tarpaulin separates those to be executed from the others".

To the great surprise of the cinema historian, the director was thus able to transform, during the casting, the short phrases of the script into unexpected and thrilling scenes. Thus the letters of the script became images, but the real emotional charge was not contained in the summary notes, but in our feelings. Following the evocation of the events, living characters were born from these feelings.

Improvisation in directing requires a deep understanding of the script, in order to then use your freedom to invent new episodes and scenes that perfectly align with the atmosphere you want to create.

In the field of cinematographic creation, Eisenstein recommended exploring the script from the depths of consciousness in emotions. To determine the deviations of authenticity and narrative coherence of the film scenes, he used parallel plane sequences, from experience and imagination. In this case, the pacing error could also be checked with sets of four parallel scenes in different temporal domains of the narrative, such as past, present, future, and universal.

To increase interpretive accuracy, a director can build a partially digitized cinematic cue system so that each frame can be analyzed in relation to the whole. In the director's mental image, the emotional indicators are read on the scale of intensity values, graded on the narrative background, because emotion is the foundation of the cinematic experience. Above all, the degrees of emotion on the narrative scale, a digitized scale constituted by a mechanism with montage sequences that were interconnected by means of a fluid script. The rendering of reality through the cinematic image was done in sequences where the number of meanings appeared completely. The hundreds of emotions were read on the scale of a mental dial, next to the landmark of authenticity on the graduated scale of historical reality.

The process of cinematic evocation involves combining the laconic script with the emotions and experiences of the creator, to transform the written words into unforgettable images.

Due to the 'in extension' arrangement of landmarks, the parallel error between fiction and reality was eliminated, knowing that each frame contributes to the overall narrative. The montage scale was actually an interpolator for the levels of significance assigned to each sequence. It should be noted that the precision of creation could not be increased by achieving a finer scale of details, but by raising the precision of execution of the montage and the scale on the emotional dial.

The historical authenticity dial comparator could reach quite high values in case of accurate historical reconstruction. On Eisenstein's creative drum, only the whole values, that is, the hundredths of emotion, were to be read, not the intervals in the divisions of reality. Thus, during casting, the director could transform the short phrases of the script into unexpected and exciting scenes, creating vivid images from the skeleton of the script, where the genuine emotional charge was not contained in the summary notes, but in his feelings and artistic vision.

Creating a film is not just about following the script to the letter, but also adding genuine emotional charge so that the characters become alive and memorable.

From the evocation of events, the feelings of living characters are born naturally, especially since each emotion is experienced intensely, on the principle that art reflects life in its most authentic forms. For this reason, the director was able to adapt the scenes, knowing that every detail contributes to authenticity, thus shaping a deep and captivating story.

The Fiction Of The Man Who Becomes Aware Of Himself

On December 14, 2014

Find the courage and determination of reinventing yourself, probing the possible facets of an impossible direction.

My creative power placed me in the reality of a timeline called eternity, from the point of view of a polyvalent (critical, algorithmic, lateral) thinking that now boasts with the fact that "it lived by its word". I had found the means of being a universe in itself. I was afraid of the power these revelations had over this extraordinary creation, the steps man follows on his ascension to God, this model of convergence between two separate developments: one of contrasts and one of paradoxes.

In all this mess of the mind enthralled by the work of thoughts, I was seconded by the deep emotion of the medic that is forced to fight against death, wherever he finds it. You have to die in order to be born in a different way. If you want to test your limits in other dimensions, if you want to snatch the eternal ornaments from the hand of God, for that infinite knowledge understood as an eternal process of resembling omnipotence. Who could have saved me from the danger of reinventing?

Secretly, in my mind that prepared to cross the area of freedom of expression of quirky thoughts, the words of Alexandre Dumas rung out: "Above you, you see, is an always clear sky full of stars, an expanse of azure where at every step God raises up a gold dust, and every atom is a universe." According to Epicurus, atoms need to be unchangeable and unique, because otherwise, if division would continue infinitely, then everything would collapse into nothingness. And then from this nothingness everything would occur again, something which is, impossible.

Only by probing the possible facets of an impossible direction, in the presence of a Quick Connection time that I perceived as being infinite, as a dimension of individual knowledge seen as a measure of change, I could reach that height of an approach focused on performing development.

Leadership: How do you approach the accelerated crossing of a time that is constructed almost exclusively on its abandonment, by approaching a creation that exceeds the power of encompassing the ordinary mind?

The creation I kept showing that I was fully capable of was nothing more than a support for the propagation of a vision that might have affected history in a practical and concrete way if I had the ability to stop in a dream to examine what happens without moving, without changing anything. It is a kind of simulation of a reality beyond every experience of the world, beyond the gears of the visible world, so all that we have sung and attributed to a poetic value has to pass through a memorable experience of "escaping into a new identity".

The consumption of augmented reality can be the beginning of innovative tailoring of visions that complement each other by the accelerated crossing of a time that is constructed almost exclusively on its abandonment. To abandon something familiar, following a different path of defining yourself and broadening your horizons, means to accept change. Or, in other words, a time that is built upon its abandonment is a way of encompassing the universe of a new world without taking its boundaries into account.

Basically, you live in a present time that continues to advance slowly, but not entirely, without taking into account something you can never return to. To abandon the present time doesn't mean to cancel it out or to ignore it, but rather only to experience it in a completely different way, in a context favorable to the affirmation of values of perspective that you don't feel yet.

Because an oversizing of the content of experience in what concerns using reality and customizing it with new expectations that later become, by their amplification, impulses for designing the fulfillment of a new role at the height of a new self-consciousness takes place.

In leadership, fiction contributes to the formation of a vision beyond time, beyond the immediate reality, beyond the view, through the evolution of the creation that even represents your image of the promoter of "immortal aspirations."

To test your limits in other dimensions, which leads to the formation of the belief that possibilities of expression are innumerable, involves finding the creative energy with which to fill out that emptiness within you that facilitates self-correction, transformation and which gives meaning to existence.

For leadership to operate without major disruption you must better find yourself in your own authenticity, meaning to function by thinking of the content of value that you wish to access and deliver through a creation that is a combination of Shakespeare's "Dream of a Summer Night" and John Fowles' "Magus".

To better understand what I mean, remember the Nobel Laureate Ernest Hemingway. He abandoned journalism, well done and well rewarded, encouraged by the belief that his stories are excellent and that he would find an editor to publish them. And, indeed, deliberately dropping it helped him become first a professional of short prose and later a great novelist.

His aspiration to grow as a complex human being, to be more than just a journalist, to become a great name for literature, is an immortal treasure because the world will always seek to discover the same form of reinventing itself through the spirit, through innovation, through the superior play of intelligence, and to reunite around an idea that urges us to evaluate our inner strength to be able to regenerate more enthusiastic and more energetic.

The "death" of the old way of doing things, departing from the conventions of present time that forces you to keep certain deductions and limits leads to that glory of "resurrection", to the creation of the new man. Switching from the normal assumed by a limited consciousness, manifested by a high degree of value growth.

Evaluate your inner strength to know if you are the master or slave of destiny !

Fiction is an a priori foundation in order to be able to know by intuition what extends indefinitely the scope of motivation of the instinct to oppose the old beliefs and to promote a mentality that can really make the difference between a trivial image and one worthy of all the admiration of those around.

The Fiction Of The Man Who Becomes Aware Of Himself highlights the possible facets of a direction seemingly impossible to follow, by the force of intelligence and the willingness to accede a higher level of consciousness, being the only way of reinventing yourself.

Any stimulus of intelligence beyond measure is a threat to limitative conscience, especially when realistic traditional conventions and the demands of veracity of the evidence brought in support of new theories, hypotheses, perspectives and visions that establish the preconditions for a less common creation are undermined.

Do you prefer to remain anchored in a limitative consciousness instead of experiment a pilot approach of excellent in promoting innovation?

The Fierce Embrace Of The Devil

On August 31, 2010

Increase your leadership power, without becoming a prisoner of your own passions.

Qin Shi Huang Di was a brilliant strategist. He conquered all of China, which even today bears his name. Even so, how did he get the most powerful and feared man in the world at that time? Nothing simpler: keeping humanity "in chess", as well as always guiding himself by the principle: "The end justifies the means".

His empire had to be eternal. He defeated kingdom after kingdom by the force of arms. All prisoners were executed. He didn't admit his orders to be discussed. Everything, even the interests of those who supported him, had to be subordinated to his. Obsessed by the idea to reach his goals at any cost, he always acted mercilessly and unforgiving.

For a man who has the passion of power and glory, but especially that of power, people's lives have no price. Fearful of what people think about his mean and inhumane actions and decisions, Qin Shi Huang Di found a reason to execute 460 scholars, a crime that, above others, lodged in the memory of his people. Hundreds of thousands of people suffered in order to build the emperor a giant mausoleum, an underground palace guarded by an army of terracotta, and a huge wall designed to provide defense to his kingdom.

Leadership: Do you correctly assess the level of experience in judging the character of a superior destiny that assumes a long history, in the light of a natural detachment from the situation in which you are entitled to consider yourself as the victim of a fatal stumble?

Certainly, the devil's best friend is the man who, only if he manages to win by his side can reach his goal. However, once you're under his supreme power, he has the right over the life and death of each and everyone, because the devil never accepts defeat. Once you get into hell, once you're caught in his demonic claws, you can't do anything – You're trapped like in a spider web, which is woven more and more around you, and you're held prisoner like in a hypnotic trance.

The one who imagined that kindness ruled the world was terribly wrong. The Emperor Qin Shi Huang Di became the embodiment of people's fears. He manifested in his actions with all his power and his wickedness. Even so, besides the fact that he was very stubborn, he had a very great power of persuasion.

The people who served the king's interests were entitled to consider themselves the victim of a fatal stumble, because their minds did not filter the smooth running of events through special spiritual richness, through permanent tendencies of high moral value, but rather through a lack of respect for the rules and laws of life in society.

They could not lucidly judge the character of their ruler precisely because their reason for living was not based on truth, teaching, the principle of equal rights, but on the historical syndrome of standing with its head bowed like a doomed person.

Leadership: Can you extract from your life those meanings attributed to the relationship between what is revealed to you as an unquestionable reality and what is revealed to you as far more comprehensive than what the image of an unlimited power can offer you?

I wonder why a man would give his life, with such a big joy, for his leader. Firstly, the leader must fully correspond to his expectations. And a Don Juan of the darkness can twist people's minds with a supposedly healthy reasoning and coherence in thought that they, without being seized by a doubt, immersed in a state of general euphoria, to be ready to give their lives for him.

It's true, in order to handle people, you should be able to penetrate inside them, to freeze their souls so deeply that they are no longer able to properly discern between good and evil. And by his power and art, the devil always manages to achieve this performance. His mental omnipotence troubles so much the good discernment of his servants that they devoted to him body and soul, are signing their own death sentence.

Leadership: Are you able to experience that "divinity" within you, without becoming the slave of that image of the power that breaks the pressure of your own devouring energy, released by a destiny without escape?

The man who lets himself be led by a tyrant is a humble witness to events that he cannot control, because he is not willing to attribute to life the meaning of "glory", that glory gained through a set of free and fair choices, through an elevation of their spiritual force, not in a certain way to refer to someone stronger and with vision. Most weak people serve a self-imposed authority, gained through a spirit of service to certain ideals of enslavement.

Once fallen under the devil's domination, human's life hangs by a thread. However, his future depends on people as well. For he uses people as a support he can freely lean against. For this reason, he can't choose total indifference towards them, by adopting a constructive attitude, he makes sure they will meet some of his certain needs and only then, when they are no longer needed, he gets rid of them. For the good running of his business is influenced only by results, which depend on the performance of his subjects. And the demoralization of people, the lack of productivity and proactivity are the most significant risk factors.

Leadership: Is your inner voice pushing you toward deep inner evolution, transforming you into a stronger, more authentic version of yourself beyond what you thought were your limits?

An evil genius must be killed or locked in a coffer, or you must determine him to accept his hostile fate and resign himself. Nevertheless, the extraordinary power of Emperor Qin Shi Huang Di, his demonic power over souls was too big. There were no cells or walls to stop him. People could only delude themselves, thinking that he is mortal, and some day, they will be able to escape from that hell.

A cold-hearted being and reckless in his passion, always lacking measure, ruled by overstrung feelings, cannot foster strong positive feelings for someone, but selfish or unfair, which will ultimately lead him to failure. The Emperor Qin Shi Huang Di was supposed to be eternal. However, he ended in chaos. Furthermore, he died after he swallowed a pill of mercury, which was supposed to extend his life. Death was the enemy that he feared a lifetime, and which he could not defeat.

Leadership is the aspiration to know an experience of a life without fighting, bitterness and frustration that are draining your energy, with the specification that the will to overcome a passion is the only tool of self-expression that controls its sorrow or suffering.

In leadership you simply must make a slip towards legend possible, by the heroic act of discarding the self that anticipates its lack of fulfillment.

The Fierce Embrace Of The Devil is accepted only by people without faith in a meaning of life, those who would rather accept to be led than to lead their own destiny on the path that fulfils dreams.

In leadership, you cannot succeed based on the principle "The end justifies the means" and you cannot lead with a tyrannical policy because you will end up badly. To value the power without caring for those around you, to sacrifice everything, including people, means to turn away from the notion of leader (who is elected), and to become a tyrant (who is required by force), drawing the dispraise of those around you who, sooner or later, will remove you from the lead.

Increase your leadership power, but without becoming a prisoner of your own passions.

The Fiery Screams Of The Lambs

On September 11, 2013

Act based on the most profound control structures that maximize your influence, in order to understand deeper the origins and evolution of man.

- Early, still dark. I heard a strange noise. Some kind of screaming, like a child's voice.

- What did you do? Asks Hannibal Lecter. This man, sure of himself, this harsh system whose functioning laws include and are derived from the unwritten laws of life, continuously strives to obtain a deeper understanding of the phenomena that act upon the most hidden and most basic senses. Provoking them in the most unusual ways. As if trying to write a new limited validity law.

- I went downstairs. I crept up into the barn. I was so scared to look inside, but I had to.

- And what did you see, Clarice? What did you see? calls the threatening voice behind bars, as if it were governed by a maximal force that is situated almost completely beyond the scientists' power of comprehension.

Leadership: Does the work of your great reasoning constitute a demonstration of the need to create a lesser awareness of the feelings of others in a favorable context of affirmation of beliefs that motivate you to belong to a single controlling entity?

- Lambs. They were screaming. I tried to free them. I opened the gate to their pen. They just stood there, confused. They wouldn't run. I took one lamb and I ran away as fast as I could. I don't know [where]. I didn't have any food, any water, and it was very cold. It was very cold. I thought... I thought if I could save just one... but he was so heavy. He was so heavy.

- You still wake up sometimes, don't you? Wake up in the dark, and hear the screaming of the lambs? And you think if you save poor Catherine you can make them stop, don't you? You think if Catherine lives, you won't wake up in the dark ever again to that awful screaming of the lambs.

We sense in the tension that Lecter generates and continuously maintains with the same intensity, similar to an integrated action regulator, the diligent try to uncover new evidence, shocking details, overwhelming proof, and new insights into the understanding of the reality experienced by Clarice at a certain point.

He maintains at elevated peaks the relevant principles to travel the road towards a new "awakening". He comes back with subtlety to the implicit function of manipulating the signal "of light", that was broadcasted through an invisible network cable that gives energy to the various states of mind, pushing them towards the breaking point, uncovering new details about Clarice's origins and evolution.

A single controlling entity seems to motivate Hannibal to understand the subtext of people's feelings, disguised in an air of moral superiority, namely: the philosophical depth of the value of their lives. His science does not come out of the strain of man's active forces, but from the original reality of nature that man has to accept and fill it meaning.

Leadership: Do the forms of the validation process of your own person generated by objectifying certain aspects of existence with which you fought with work well?

In order to determine the leader's area of influence between some fixed coordinates that would allow knowing and evaluating the potential of all people that were subjected to the implacable force of their own enslaving, emphasized against certain negative reactions, it is necessary to respect a certain form of "opening" and "development" of your own self's validation process in front of them.

Having at their foundation a certain severity and a certain control, these forms of opening and development, given the fact that the influence's transmission environment isn't accessible in order to guarantee a closeness and a consolidation of their relations, simultaneously continuing to be unpredictable and extremely burdening, actually represents a sum of the deepest moods or manifestations inspired by certain experiences that have a positive or negative power of transformation.

That is why supporting these competency structures that allow the efficient counteracting of negative effects, based on a careful, balanced and progressive approach, but also on the principles of complementarity and on mutual support, depend on the will to make a real change in an individual's life.

A more pretentious approach of the "pressure" force is, thus, imposed, so having as goal a deeper exploration of an individual for a more detailed understanding of his origins and evolution, of course through discarding certain suspicions that would jeopardize his knowledge and research.

Leadership: Do you belong to a single form of answer to the question: "how can you govern a life from the philosophical perspective of the value it can bring you"?

There are many favorable initiatives for the chances of maximizing efficiency and using persuasion that we can't always maintain and consolidate within an only direction of influence. But we install them on the small screen of leadership and we screen them in any spontaneity moment by making moves that can get the interlocutor off to a bad start.

That's why the diligent attempt to bring to light new evidence, shocking details, overwhelming proof, and new hidden sides of the clear understanding the reality, become auxiliary tools in order to ease the navigation through the twists and turns of the human psyche and of the concise. It's a highly important procedure, a genuine act of domination, a sparkle that enters an enclosed, shadowed and burdensome space, its main goal being the conscious yielding of an inner intensely consciousness state, through triggering a certain sensibility and straining it as much as possible.

You can't force a man to conform to your own will without first establishing a relation with him. Any intelligent mind that tries to sincerely and fully understand the human psyche in its whole, as being relevant for forming and developing a set of interaction abilities, has to support his development in light of two fully compatible coordinates. A credibility coordinate and a control coordinate. They have to allow an individual to manifest himself in the state that was generated for him in a direct way.

If you can't include in the resistance structure of an individual the signal "of light", as an additional force, if you can't give energy to your moods, pushing them towards the critical point, then you won't be able to reveal the most intricate details about it that would build you and image beyond the intellectual and professional harshness.

If you aspire so much towards an efficient leadership, then act based on your deepest control structures that maximize your influence, so that you have a better understanding of the evolution and origins of man.

You will be able to govern the understanding of life from the philosophical point of view of the value it can bring you only by alleviating the strain of active forces that condition the manifestations and the ability of men to be different.

The use of new methods of investigating human nature can result from the explanatory nature of a science that is bound to use a complex of procedures to observe the phenomenology according to which man cannot confiscate his freedom of opening himself to you, calling upon suggestive, metaphorical techniques, of strengthening self-image and self-acceptance.

The fiery screams of the lambs are those events that occur throughout an individual's life with a major impact on their psyche and that break in great measure their previous evolution.

Uncovering and annihilating the effects of these events that often produces a block, a break even in the voluntary actions imposed by the present realities, needs special methods of knowing and influencing the human psyche, having as purpose a better cooperation with the leader in order to achieve a common goal.

The Fight For "To Be"or "Not To Be"

On March 11, 2011

Convince people of your value, without altering "the music" you are trying to introduce.

The writer George Sbarcea was relating that in a musical theatre in the country was held the audition, in a restricted circle, of an original work written by a young master. During one break, an older conductor made the author the following observation:

- Just so you know, master, you are a terrible shooter !

- How come? the musician bewildered.

- Well, you see: the music that you wrote should have addressed, in your intention, to the hearts of the listeners, and behold, it hurts their ears !

Leadership: Is the effect of an attitude and mentality oriented towards quality by the opportune identification of new valences of expression in the center of the attention you receive from those around?

As it is vital for any organization to create an environment to attract leaders, so it is vital for any leader to create an ideal environment for human performance, based on trust and collaboration, in which they would work efficiently and truly feel that they want to belong to that organization and be led by him. The "whole" of your leadership can convey a special mood?

In other words, the leadership must coincide to people's preferences and expectations. If leadership doesn't form a whole that would convey a special mood, a strong empathy, a burning desire, an achievable dream, then he will never be able to firmly express his points of view, his will and his own beliefs.

Expressiveness, as an important aspect of the creative process is applicable to the way of conveying ideas and feelings forcefully, adapting them to your traits that you want to highlight. Being a "bad guy" is equivalent to trying to value your originality without assigning the role of the active creator that gives the world the ability to focus on what is important.

Can you give your leadership a pleasant "melodic line"?

Just like a musician touches his audience through his music, thus creating a feeling of tranquility, calm and liveliness, so you, as a leader, must touch people's souls with the virtues lying inside your soul, through your own "composition". Try to get to people, making them understand what your leadership expresses, adapting yourself to their reality. Then, their whole attitude will change, and you will be higher and higher in results.

A melodious line is a combination of the sounds of different instruments and voices which, through their height, length and sequence must form a formidable composition that delights and stimulates hearing. But with small corrections. It is part of the cycle of the "What does this imply?" phenomenon, also allowing for the discovery of small imperfections, gaps and limits, at times misleading the listener.

The harmony you have to offer by combining creation and interpretation with the art of improvisation, in a very interesting way, must be profiled on the delivery of a strong and persuasive call to action, allowing for the discovery of the other facet of your personality: one based on emotions and their manifestation.

Convince people of your value, without altering the reality that you're trying to present. Give you leadership a pleasant "melodic line", which would harmonize perfectly with the thoughts, emotions and personal feelings of those that you lead, without deviating too much from their beliefs.

Be mindful of the focus you place on the music you compose, for not just any rhythm and not just any frequency has the same effect on the mind and emotions of the listeners.

The notion of being an "artist" does not mean to create and control everything on your own, rather, it means to adjust the volume and music you listen to by letting it lead you towards new answers and new results.

The fight "to be" or "not to be" meeting people's expectations is taking place inside you whenever you compose a new "partition" – which, if it doesn't sound good, will remove everybody. Little by little, your work will be removed, scattered and turned into chaos if your "partition" doesn't invade people's souls and close them to you.

The results of an effective leadership depend on both the leader, who also has the role to help develop an organizational culture by choosing the right tone to create "the music" accepted by everyone, and the collective that surrounds the leader, which must be receptive to new things, perceive undistorted that music, and especially be able to adapt.

The fight for « to be » or « not to be » depends on the two components – the leader and the collective. If there is good timing, then collaboration becomes effective, and the battle is won. Otherwise, sooner or later, both the leader and the collective get lost.

The Fight Of Doubts Against The Beliefs

Earn the people's trust vote, by ensuring a balance between their deepest emotions and the surrounding reality.

An unexpected scene has happened in the patient's room, locked up so carefully. Valentine has left alone. Fever seized her over again. She was continually pervaded by the same thoughts and premonitions that she would die. For almost ten days, her health condition was more and more worrying.

Suddenly, she seemed to hear a strange rustle. From behind the door appeared a human face. However, nothing could surprise her in her condition. She was aware that all the phantoms that surrounded her were due to the delirium. Because of the fever, she was fully accustomed to these fantasies. He remembered that the best way to make go away these annoying phantoms was to drink the medicine.

Leadership: Can you give a new meaning to your own creation, assuming your role as an unconditional protector following the formula: "Be seen without arousing suspicion"?

Valentine stretched her hand to take the glass from the crystal bowl, where she knew it was. However, during this time the phantom made another two steps towards the bed, faster, and took the glass before the girl could touch it. The phantom watched the drink as if it wanted to see how transparent and clear it was.

- Don't scream and don't be afraid, the Count of Monte Cristo told her. Don't keep not even in the bottom of your heart any glimmer of suspicion or any shade of anxiety.

Valentine did not know what to say. She was afraid of the phantom's voice that was a reality.

- Listen carefully. For four days I'm watching over you and protecting you. I've stayed hidden behind the door every night. I saw the people who came to you, the food prepared for you, and the drinks that were given to you. When the drinks seemed dangerous to me, I emptied your glass and replaced the poison with a beneficial drink, able to flow life through your veins instead of the death that was meant for you.

The most valuable creation of a wizard is the mystery with which he can envelop everything in an attempt to change pre-established events. He has the power to rise above the laws of destiny, in an obvious attitude of waiting for the right moment to impose his state of power, represented by the vision he proposes about life.

Leadership: Do you call upon the most careful judgment that you are capable of to surround what happens to you in a context of direct interaction with all that exists in a broader horizon of significance?

The time of the murderers. The pendulums struck midnight. The Count of Monte Cristo knew what was going to happen so he quickly told the girl before hiding behind the library:

- Don't make any gesture Valentine, don't utter a word. He must think you're asleep.

Otherwise, he will kill you before I could come to help you.

The door handle grated, and the door swung in the hinge. The floor creaked on the other side of the room. Somebody was approaching her. Trembling, anxious, with a heart seized by an unspeakable horror, Valentine pulled herself together and pretended to be asleep. However, when she heard the unknown person pouring the drops of poison in her glass, she dared to half-open her eyes. The woman, the murderer, was exactly Mrs. Villefort, her stepmother.

The significance you assign to events that occur during your life is anchored in the vicinity of far-reaching effects of the exchange between what you can keep good in your inner world and your outer world, without fueling it with the suffering of the impossibility of determining a new judgment based on the cause.

Leadership: Do you dare bring to light what really defines you, in an attempt to present yourself to the world as a reflection of forecasting events that unfold before you?

There are two types of people: those who want to kill, and those who want to save, those who want to make evil and those who wish good. To which category do you belong?

The Count of Monte Cristo saved Valentine from death Valentine, by watching over her like a guardian angel. Only he could save her and only he saved her. He knew how to foresee all the plots, guessing all the movements of his enemies.

What do all the great leaders have in common? They have the power to foresee the events, to analyze and to approach them in a pragmatic and realistic manner, in a more appropriate manner of the future challenges. However, this is not all. They are able to convince people that they are on their side, breaking all their doubts.

At first, Valentine had doubts about her savior, but they were quickly dispelled. His strong presence removed the distrust that he initially inspired to her by his mysterious appearance.

With his great power of penetration, the Count understood everything that was happening in the soul of the girl, but he found the proper method to turn on a light of hope in her heart, causing her to believe in his loyalty. Having the Count beside her, Valentine could sleep with the confidence of an angel lying at the God's feet.

What defines a wizard is that he cannot fix the path that unites the emotion springing from truth with the image springing from a vision extended beyond the limit of the real.

Deep emotions can ignore the reality, while the reality could freeze any emotion.

In leadership, it matters to be a trust factor not only from the professional point of view and behaviorally, but also from the emotional and spiritual point of view.

You must ensure a balance between the people's deepest emotions and the surrounding reality. That is to prevent their feelings to gain ground towards the reality, and at the same time, to make sure that the reality does not put too deep mark on their emotions.

Leadership: Can you ensure a balance between reality and sentiment, in spite of some disarmingly harsh appearances that in fact hide a hard to unravel mystery?

Leadership has to do with the capacity of building quality relationships with people. In order to inspire a strong sense of safety to Valentine, the Count had to take a side in order to convince her of his power, and to determine her to keep a positive attitude. And only the tenacity and courage were his allies in this endeavor. At the same time, he had to read what was going on deep inside the girl's heart, and to remove any doubt about his person.

The leader plays an important role in people's life, the role of the savior. Moreover, his courage is undoubtedly contagious. However, in front of many eyes, the leader may seem cold, and this coldness can be taken as an expression of hostility, stirring fear and mistrust. Contrariwise, a proactive attitude and a persuasive language can influence people in good, and they will give a better efficiency.

If you if will anticipate, and if you will manage to counteract the negative effects of the events that occur over people or over vulnerable groups, your leadership will gain ground.

The last fight of doubts against beliefs is given when you try to reveal a hidden reality behind some appearances of normality.

Conclusion: If you want to have success in leadership, you have to do two things above all else: to remove any doubt that people may have on your ability to lead, and make sure that you are recognized as a major resource of confidence.

Earn the people's trust vote, by ensuring a balance between their deepest emotions and the surrounding reality.

The Figments Of A Mind Where Art Abounds

On January 09, 2015

Position yourself in the concrete plan of discoveries, adjusting the meaning of realities beyond life experience.

I felt that I was near a great discovery, sown from the overflow of a revealing load. The small syntax fireworks of the "While" construction, from the expansion procedure of the horizon of projecting images beyond the prison bars of reality, were successfully saving me from almost any mess. Yet, at one point I realized that the equation whose unknown was the "argument of duration", in the virtue of which were defined the exceptions from the field of logic, became increasingly more uncertain due to the unpredictability of its effects.

Like a meticulous collector of dangerous temptations, squeezed in a discreet place where they could unleash their sweet poison at will, I was drawn by the dizzying vortex of symbols that could give meaning to life experiences lived fully. Tempting, I clung to an apparent strangeness, determined by a full sum of objective factors, but at the same time marked by the sum of the forces of reaction of the thinking model unrestricted by any limitation.

I saw myself more and more in a way that eluded others. Somehow, I found myself in the position of the Caliph Harun Al-Rashid who, regularly caught in insomnias, wandered alone through the shadows of Sarai looking for his beautiful robes that, once found, he would caress with the purest of words. But the day wiped away the words of the night.

And the same happened with my amazing discovery. It had to be examined as a sort of convention of the modality of exposing reality, one with a reverse causality, therefore, one that would not lead to the nude of appearances. But I had to be careful when I attempted to share it with others. For such a creative art, une drôle de façon de l'expérience, could lose its impact the more I tried to unify the finite reasons of creation with the fictions uncorrupted by any finality.

Leadership: Does your experience of drawing new realities validate the completely extraordinary applicability if discoveries embedded in a distant horizon of time?

Finality is an essential characteristic in leadership, involving a set of correlations between the value of expression, freedom of thought, connotations of fabricated ideas and the content of truth you generate. This entire set depends on a certain conception of philosophy, formed around the basic elements of life in the middle of which lies the human subject, which you most propagate over any formula of change.

Leadership is a consequence of what is called "idealistic intelligence", played out through the creation found at the border between life and fiction. Which, in turn, is reinforced through the meaning attributed to the culture of discovering a new way of understanding the world, of giving it color, of personalizing it with a new interpretation. And if you want to test the limits of your thinking's acceptability, share your vision of the world with others.

The experience of drawing a reality beyond the ordinary, in which the argument of duration is a result of its extension and implementation, is considered to be inevitable. And because the conditions of exposing finalities can always be rewritten, this experience becomes an adventure of the spirit – from perception to self-awareness, and from reason to revelation. And it validates the completely extraordinary applicability of discoveries embedded in a distant horizon of time by unifying the finite reasons of creation with the fictions uncorrupted by any finality.

Knowledge that springs from the encounter with reality beyond the experience of life, through contact with the creative power, in the guise of a surreal combination of old and new, real and imaginary, can prove the surpassing of your limits of development.

If you want leadership to have sufficient poignancy to brand development, position yourself in the concrete plan of discoveries, adjusting the meaning of these realities beyond life experience – meaning, close to a higher reason of creation, able to produce a radical transformation of the world.

The experience that blends all the elements of the reality from which the space of a new discovery is formed abounds in that creative force of the talent of seeing yourself as a story-maker that deserves to be at the heart of a new concept called: "Follow Me ! "

The Figments Of A Mind Where Art Abounds highlights those fragments of thoughts, moods and life experiences, finalized in an act of creation that brings new interpretations in which can be found images and aspects of a world in constant transformation. If you manage to expand your horizons, through creation and conscience, then you will be able to say that you've begun making "art".

The Final From The Realm Of Exploration

On May 14, 2012

Make proof of your own greatness, without getting lost in the labyrinth of a personality with extremely low empathetic endowments.

The movie "Meet Joe Black (1998)". The last dinner together with all the family members, with only a few days before the long-expected event: the anniversary party of the great businessman Bill Parrish.

Nevertheless, Bill was the only one at the table that seemed not at all enthusiastic about the event. This man ordered in all and everything, he controls even in the moments of relaxation, in the family, every nerve on his face. On his imposing figure, forged like from an alloy resistant to changes, reflecting the perfect combination of two human types, identical by the strength that spread around - of the scientist, which do not defy any laws, and of the judge, which sanction without pity the slightest mistake - you cannot glimpse any smile.

Leadership: Are you about to develop a selfish and despicable mentality in an attempt to hide your vulnerabilities and protect yourself from further disruptions?

The eldest daughter, Allison, prepared the mini-cake, and he, the only man whom she truly admired, did not want to taste not even a slice of it. Like someone would have stuck with the power of a single thought every gesture, every thrill of his heart, decisively crumbling every trace of feeling. The poor woman, the unfortunate victim of an overwhelming indifference, exhausted by the inner storms that were rising up all her being, draws the sunglasses on her saddened eyes, hoping to hide the tears that flow freely like a river of living water from which emanates all her power, and to which no one dares to touch.

- "The goddamn party ! " Did you hear that? He does not care at all ! Why did I do this? I'm trying to throw the party for the century only in two days for my father, and he doesn't care about ! "He does not give a shit ! " She exclaimed firmly.

Just as Sigmund Freud has failed not only his academic career, but also the medical practice by his opposition to the mechanical method of neurology, in the same way the great Bill Parrish, precisely as a mathematician in all his plans, authoritative in all levels of his spiritual life, was about to lose the last frost of common sense, the last shred of respect for all that meant "we" in the bosom of his family - by his careless attitude towards his daughter's endeavors.

Leadership: Are you getting lost in the labyrinth of a personality with extremely low empathetic endowments?

A leader, who has the power to produce the change, and who produces it with that frenzy of the discoverer, captures completely material manifestations, the less apparent ones, of the inner world, moral and spiritual of those around - but first, he loads by himself, fully, relentlessly, the moral and spiritual batteries that feed his existence.

Just as a writer sneaks into the beings of his own thousands of characters, and gets lost in the labyrinth of their existence, living their lives, in the same way, a man as to get closer to excellence in the art of leadership must first communicate his emotions in a positive way, to recognize both of him and of the other ones - without losing himself in the labyrinth of a personality with extremely low empathetic endowments.

Personality can be a proud indulgence, almost despicable to the unknown ones that block you in your decisions, or it may be the essence of a reality from which you cannot escape. It depends on how you respond to unexpected action and the unexpected shape of any reference value.

Suddenly, the man with a heart of stone, the man uncrossed of any emotion - or perhaps, by an impure one, unfiltered by rational and moral, he, who crossed the crisis of "ingratitude" - opens his heart to a single agreement of will. Sesame, open up ! In the eyes of the great Bill Parrish, before so cold, in a moment arises, like to an order the spark of understanding, sparkling like a diamond. He felt, like as the sun gently caresses the earth, his whole creature renewed by excitement and positive energy.

But who? Who stirred up the little room of his soul? Who, what, with what force has repaired to him the major defect of the heart, making it to pump again, continually, soothing, a huge amount of liberating emotions, with very high vibrations, such as joy, love, reason, acceptance?

Bill accomplishes the miracle: takes a slice of cake, tastes it with that pleasure of the man who finds and sips the healing fluid of the unknown disease that affects him, slowly closes his eyes, and breathes deeply, feeling as if the cure is making instantly its effect - then, Eureka ! How good is the cake ! And what beneficial reaction is having the medicine that sweetens the human nature ! For in the next moment, Allison thrills of joy, wipes her tears, appeases his troubled soul; then his gesture is welcomed and followed by the other family members, who dare to taste from the same wonderful cake, from the same type of living essence.

Leadership: Do you suppress your aspirations to virtue by seeking at any cost a moment of disconnection from what your life had been before?

If you do not want to limit yourself only to the status of leader, but being a man of quality, then do everything possible to not get sick from the disease "from yourself run ". Assume full responsibility for all the emotions which silently limit your performance. These transmissible emotions, that you live in along with other people, are trying you at every step, at any age, attacks you in the most critical circumstances, by hindering your power of empathizing, and making harder the crossing of your optimum way towards excellence.

Self-fleeing, far from the limitations of the ignorance to the world around us, is a strain of instinctive experience of new experiences, a strain that does not succumb to any attraction. It is formed when you fail to optimize the possibilities of addressing and affirming your autonomy as a man of great intellectual finesse.

Are you effective in the areas that you need to endow? Trying to wake up the echoes of your own Ego, without finding the answer to the question: "Why I am not compatible by the way of thinking and feeling with the other people?" It is like you would like to heal the diseases of the soul strictly on the medication way, without previously applying any spiritual therapy.

If you stand against the reality that makes you be as you are, just like a smart computer that performs well its counting, trying to cling at all costs, in a selfish way, to an approach which does not define you, disagreeing yourself to the deep human side of you that touches and excites the others around, then the boundaries between the leadership and your life will become permeable.

Virtue is the quality of staying at the height of your own greatness even when you descend to the level of a consuming experience.

The final from the realm of exploration designates that launch pad for yourself, for your Ego that is constantly hitting by your refusal, like to a wall built of indifference, of unconsciousness, shallowness, or from an unhealthy sort of numbness - to comply yourself with the most precious emotions and feelings, to go forward faithfully on the way towards greatness. Explore your Self before making changes to the spiritual complement of the other people.

An artist would say that it is not important the picture from the wall, but the whole environment, the range of positive or negative experiences of your consciousness that shapes your personality – because exactly the consciousness, this cornerstone of the leadership, loads your interior space with the beneficial fluid of the change and your spiritual development, dictating how and what to do, to behave, say, to love or hate - what specifically you should bring to light, and what to keep hidden.

Make proof of your own greatness, without getting lost in the labyrinth of a personality with extremely low empathetic endowments.

The Final Stage Of Weakness

On November 22, 2013

Maintain the balance of your whole being by identifying the roots of personality variations modified by strong inner vibrations.

In front of a good man, people raise their hat respectfully and without any suspicion. But nobody suspects that this kind, isolated man is more haunted, more oppressed and more at risk than a beast. He wears the stigma of existential shocks, an immense inner fire, which frequently cancels the balance of his mental sector.

A momentarily insanity, or a strong unexpected drive aren't the characteristics of this peaceful man. They belong to an evil power concentrated in doses of ruthless courage. An exhilaration feeling of personality throws this poor amateur towards another existential dimension, towards metamorphosis and violence, like a projectile precisely launched by a catapult on the fertile land of transformation. And satisfying incandescent wishes fueled by acutely felt electrifying sensations hurts his ethic-moral character.

The destructive power of the catapult is felt in the peak moments of "falling in love" with one's self, of passionate joy that bursts from the depths with poorly regulated pressure. Only then, the mentally ill can use his inner vibration to acquire a state of spiritual wholeness. At the same time, the transforming mechanism is regulated around an oscillator that fluctuates over normal values, coupled to an only source of renewable energy: the paranoid obsession to adopt a different appearance.

Leadership: Can you create an Ego different from the "product of a harsh reality", placing yourself in a position of flexibility to the moods that trouble you, but also urges you to do a good deed?

The man with double personality, the only one who tires his ambitions, overworking his body, almost always displays a reserved and modest attitude. As if he'd keep for himself an immense secret that nobody should discover. It's a reality. Jack Gordon, alias Buffalo Bill, must have been fueled by an underground fire that remained hidden until the end. It gave him a kind of insane, quasi-sexual, unstoppable ecstasy that makes the differences between the two opposite beings.

Countless internal backgrounds can't regulate the life-giving pendulum that oscillates with different amplitudes around its two axes: feminity and masculinity. Because of this, his orientation and capacity to adapt to any surroundings are measured mainly based on the periodical processes of toggling on the inner tensions that trigger the energy flux necessary to fuel personal ambitions.

Just like knight Gaudin de Sainte-Croix discovered the toxic venom that could kill only through its smell, Buffalo Bill discovers the thing that unites him with spiritual wholeness by activating a secret stake, an additional option that reshapes his affective needs and "left" inclinations. If Saint-Croix dies because of the venom, in the middle of his experiments, for Buffalo Bill emotional and psychic instability bring him to a dead end, when he can no longer identify with himself.

Leadership: Are you aware you're being pushed towards abnormality in your searches for personal fulfillment, according to what keeps you from being truly virtuous?

Do you draw your fuel from an underground fire that remains hidden until the end? Do you feel that insane, uncontrollable ecstasy that drives you away from who you truly are and takes you to a turbulent area?

The first duty of a leader is to protect his functional territory. So that in the deepest phase of his evolution, he doesn't fall prey to those unbearable extremes, which he ambitiously manifests. When human nature can't be controlled through the influence of negative thoughts, he can no longer subject himself to the "quality" category. This should concern him. Thus, what is being defined as leadership, suddenly takes on a new meaning, an irrational color with a very narrow efficiency palette, which works only on certain approaches.

An inner world built on unhappiness, seized by a loud unearthliness, which acts outside its self-imposed limits, and which seems so real that suffocates you, represents, I would say, the main cause of the inability to counteract irrationality. In earnest, countless differences and impediments, appearances and realities stand in the way of one's own study of the leading potential that finds support on a solid attribute of knowing the self and human nature. Of knowing the laws that rule our life and the extremes we fall prey to.

As a leader, you supervise the balance between good and bad. You can lean the balance towards the normalcy of comprising life at its limit or towards abnormally, with its abundance of lacks and needs. If you're aware of the abnormally you're driven to in your searches towards self-fulfillment, it means that you have taken into account the configuration of all those life aspects that please you or displease you.

To truly be a virtuous man means to honor what you receive from life, but in such a way that when days become difficult or unbearable to realize that these are precisely the references of the experiences that will make you evolve and transform into what you will be in the future.

Leadership: Do you choose to actually change your nature, reason, concept, and state of mind, resonating with the reason for the change you take when you have to take into account the defining elements of the orientations towards new ideals for the decent assurance of your existence?

In his book "Hocus Pocus", Kurt Vonnegut wrote: "Another flaw that is part of human character is the fact that he wants to build, but nobody wants to do maintenance work."

You can ascend on the highest step of weakness by turning yourself into a pillar of involution, building a personality damaged by the countless inner drawbacks. Or you can ascend the steps of self-respect, putting aside the physic and emotional exhaustion tendency, turning yourself into a strong character that fights with his limits and faults.

The fluctuating evolution between progression and regression is caused by the balance disturbance between the defining elements of any of your orientations, with a significant impact from an evolutionary point of view. According to the configuration of your personality and according to your dominant wishes, you can bring, above anything else, a new tendency in the passage from intention to action.

Be careful which dominant side you release along your evolution. Regulate in good time the life-giving pendulum, which oscillates with different amplitudes around your personality. If you bow to some directives coming from outside the limits of the power zone, you will be able to put out that immense inner fire that frequently annuls your balance. Keep experimenting only with your positive dominant side by trying to offer value in new and unique ways.

Maintain the balance of your whole being by identifying the roots of personality variations modified by strong inner vibrations. Don't forget that your orientation and adaptation system is measured at any time, mostly based on the periodical process of toggling on the inner tensions that trigger the energy flux necessary to fuel personal ambitions.

The affiliation of your state of mind to the development of personality can be seen in the way you express the need to assume your fullness of soul in a situation where you are compelled to fight even against yourself in the space of a reality beyond your ability to understand.

The final stage of weakness points out the moment when your own decision-maker is so hurt, that he directs himself towards a negative side of personality.

As any man, you are a mixture of good and evil in different percentages. Ideally, the good should dominate, or at least balance evil. Only your inner decision-maker sets the side on which the balance leans. He is an ensemble of judiciously combined components, earned through education, culture and behavior.

The Fire Of A Star

On December 19, 2015

Learn to maintain the status of a superior being, giving a meaning to the world you don't observe.

I cannot find the way towards what I yet don't know, with respect to what remains after I'm gone, sooner a bright star supporting an entire planetary system than a grain of sand lost in a desert with oasis. But nothing is lost, nothing is gained, everything is transformed. Just like in alchemy, you must first leave the temporary body in order to later obtain enlightenment or the Supreme Truth of the Fire Earth.

With the permission of relative time, whose energy propagates from the past to the future, I have reached the stage of intense focus on detecting a forgotten end of the world, in the face of an intelligent development, as if a physicist tries to demonstrate new laws of reflection and refraction of light with the help of undiscovered principles. It was so that I have kept contact with an inner reason which, spacing out, gives meaning to a blind existence.

No man exists that's not inspired by that certain something, universal fluid, spirit, soul, as there is no book that doesn't give imagination free reign. Everything requires unpacking and installing into a continuous explorer that leads to evolution. And what is evolution if not science, the great passing towards the infinite, this informational prominence related to time, space, life and death, demanding a special alchemy of extraction, with the help of living water, through the action of pure fire?

Should I follow the signs of my own evanescence, as Robinson tried in vain to see the foreign footsteps as his own? No. I cannot risk being in the position of a disoriented man, as a monument of ignorance to all the greatness of divine creation on Earth, only out of the pleasure of scattering into a void of nonexistence alike a black hole. I must face the man within me who says "I'm lost in the beating of the storm."

Leadership: Can you detach yourself from the astral context of the moment, to serve as the fire of a star with the force of irradiation in the likeness of what you experience as a "whole unit" and what you deepen by perceiving an evanescent surrealness?

The way of maintaining a parallel order of reality, plausible enough to give a certain mystical hint, somehow between the oneiric and vision, can be centered on language and the freedom of expression that the new certified status gives you through "story". Thus, you begin to compare yourself with the consciousness of a man moving in real worlds, but at different times and in miraculous realities.

The opportunity of facing the experience of transformation into a visionary of evolution, accessing those functions of consciousness that establish the difference between perception of reality and reality itself, appears when you come to consider yourself a wanderer between worlds, stuck between the hundreds of thoughts that bother you in any speck of time.

In the great dimension of Creation, which the alchemists call the Prima Trimurni Divina, this experience of crossing the worlds through dream, vision or through metaphor, establishes the correspondence with another way of perceiving reality and the world, in a game of appearances. This means, as the writer George Banu observed, to perceive through a person's eyes a world whose primordial existence condition is precisely the cultivation of this entre-deux, simultaneous belonging to the real and the fictional.

What the creator experiences in a unitary way is belonging to a form of thinking of "the world concentrated in a fictional scenario" as a source of identity confusion, because his self begins to be fulfilled in another reality called: "I can be anyone I want."

A wanderer between worlds is characterized in essence through that he seeks to discover something other than himself. He opens the door to a rational action over what constitutes an indication of the temporal frame in which are produced the decisive phenomena of meaning and depending on which he can distance himself from.

A small advantage of those who understand leadership is that unique approach that self-places the subject in a neutral place. The individual is aware of what is happening around him, but only as a result of those wanderings included in a transition of the type "dissolve". A phenomenon of denial of personality is produced – which traps him in the world of an imagined virtual space, he becomes the owner of a state of detachment towards the elements generators of "clouds and chaos."

To break away from the astral context of the moment, to serve as the fire of a star is the metaphorical construction that expresses distancing from your initial condition. The condition of being "drowned" in the world.

Leadership: Does the way you unleash your creative vision affect the reality of your relationship with yourself, in light of the fact that EVERYTHING you experience through the temporary feeling of dual identity can be changed in one direction?

Spiritual father Mooji of Jamaica advised his supporters: "Live as if you did not exist. Look around. Look at these clouds for example. Alike are our whims. You wake up and you don't know if it will be a cloudy or sunny day. The same is our life, our past. And yet... there is something not caught in all this. You always look, you see the sky. You say: "Now, it will rain". The farmer rejoices, but not the man on holiday.

For the sky, everything is all the same. Only the empty man says: "The weather is okay like this". And thus, his mind is never depressed.

The man's mind says: "Oh, the sky is very dark, very grim." But the sky does not know this. It doesn't give much attention to human feelings and thoughts. When man is distracted by a cloud, it is then he loses himself. Only to an advanced being can you say: Live as if you do not exist."

A sense of temporary identity can be modified in one direction only when the reality you are building is based on a motto, the active referent of mystical knowledge: "Live as if you were existing in another world."

The Fire Of A Star is the power of man of not burning out after the always changing shape of the clouds in his life. Leaders know how to distract themselves from the obsessive routine. They know that a man is free when he doesn't trouble himself with pretentious things, when his attention is distracted from the discomfort of the congestion of events.

Sometimes you have to be empty inside, so as not to stay locked on the outside.

The Fire Of The Mind

On August 24, 2013

Keep perfecting your perception of the people around you, so that you manage to open, without forcing it, that closed door, which nobody can reach.

The fire of the mind is never too big as long as it lets you savor the sensation of well-controlled trust with sufficient intensity to produce a certain change. The fire never dies as long as it fills you with that self-wholeness that you can fully experience without being concerned about consequences. The fire of the mind could accidentally light, but in any way it lit, it's a chance to show its power.

Dr Hannibal Lecter figured out immediately, from a single phrase, from a single voice inflection, from the careful reflection on a random matter, or only from a mere gesture and mimic evaluation that relentless part from the FBI trainee, Clarice Starling. He manages to open, without forcing it, that closed door of her past that nobody could reach.

His arguments seem very well grounded. And his persistence to penetrate the wall of her past grows, continuing and perfecting his perception about her personal feelings. The unconventional fuel that fuels his intuition, used to short-circuit thoughts and produce a continuous effect of closure, is different based on her capacity to answer.

Clarice, this sensitive heart that gives Hannibal certain convictions, but also a great desire to bend over the mind for knowledge, is in turn seduced by his psychologist qualities. And that is why he becomes a captivating company.

Leadership: Can you perfect your art of maintaining your authenticity by using the "victory-greatness" ensemble from which to transcend your superiority into circumstantial intuition, seeking the momentary use of subtle suggestion?

Hannibal carries the garland based specifically on the moods and emotions that Clarice can not bear to exteriorize. Complicating her spiritual structure by emitting an energy corresponding to a high-intensity frequency, fueled by a certain negative tension that practically enhances her feelings of frustration, fury and discontent. Holding the supremacy of thought because of her purity, Hannibal steps alone without any kind of effort in her personal domain.

His greatness, as evidence of victory over the human mind and soul, consists in the fact that he succeeds in creating dependence on his guidance, his power and his grace to mirror the typical image of a detective whose intuition (doubled by vast knowledge) does not fail in the field of conclusive judgments in absolute terms. He does not suggest to Clarice a specific action that may serve as a sign of recognizing of her qualities as a very subtle psychologist, but suggests a way she will follow to value her potential, attitudes and behaviors, but especially the positive and negative experiences she had.

The phenomenal psychiatrist knows how to transform a "light stimulus" into a regular and compromising "electric stimulus" with the help of a time cell he often refers to. Clarice is caught in a block of regenerative thoughts of light and darkness, as in an electric field produced by the intensity between two different lugs, which determines an alternative flow with continuous elements, thus establishing a formidable research subject. But being permanently subject to calculi, suggestions and sensitizing procedures, everything within her gets deranged.

The ray of light so roughly achieved perishes. The nerves of the woman submitted to a "welcome" treatment are stretched even further. The chain propagation of some disturbances in her being system, enhancing her stage of discomfort, determine a reduction of her investigator performances, a decrease in her efficiency. Under the action of a suggestion force, Hannibal transmits a series of vibrations that mainly act on the sensitive areas of her existence, as flashes and warnings directed towards her origin.

Leadership: Can you evolve through experiences you had at the boundary between what corresponds to reality and what opposes the attempt to falsify it?

Pushing man to a certain limit, to exasperation, is a trigger of the feeling of helplessness, it is the true response of the ordinary individual to an impenetrable and non-assimilable force. This force implies in itself a rather harsh structure of thought, rather than that isolated detachment of endless thoughts in the context of the cult of "supremacy".

Clarice saw in that circumstance an uncriticized acceptance of an unusual situation, of an individual case that had as finality determining the future necessary actions for finding a ferocious criminal. While for Hannibal, she became, if not an information unity, a personality that needed to be researched as an exercise for the mind and thought through dialogue. Having a relative power, she is taken by surprise by the patterns of complexity of knowledge.

Clarice has to evolve through experiences lived at the boundary between what corresponds to reality and what opposes Hannibal's attempt to falsify it by adding suspense, unforeseen, powerful, intriguing and spectacular twists of the situation, so by using the true quality specific to a thriller. Through this, leadership traverses the distance from vision to reality, which people are constrained to make clear through an individualized psychological test: how long can you resist what you do not like to accept as being hard to bear?

Wishing to discuss, even briefly, about the perspectives of leadership expansion in the world of tomorrow, we can't avoid taking into account an individual's moods, strongly determined, conventionally or unconventionally by a strong persuasion force.

Not few people understand by leadership at the present time a conventional code of rules that would be strongly implemented at every decision making level. The majority seem to perceive leadership as an own existence of entities valid only in some well-determined conditions, so not as a thinking patterns, but as a series of preset orders and their access in certain circumstances that have as purpose winning in every possible way. But they eliminate the essential.

Under what conditions can your leadership be reduced to the psychological dimension so that you can work on the battlefield with the shortcomings of your own nature?

Just like in a game of chess, the key elements at the base of leadership are tempo and playing with force, ignoring the "threat". But in the conditions in which "the power game" acquires a certain value, strongly determined by the moods of both individuals and the leader, leadership is reduced to a psychological nature matter, within a "Acceptability-Uncertainty" relation.

Who carries the garland in this case? Of course, the one who holds supremacy in thought. Usually, that part that easily and quickly induces those stages and emotions that the opponent can't stand.

So, the complexity of psychological creation that no one can oppose brings with itself, inevitably, a multitude of apparent paradoxes, dilemmas, nuances and games, which strip the mind naked. But, the mind limited up to a certain step of understanding considers them rude or far-fetched, or abstract in a strict and uncontroverted way.

At another level of conscience and understanding they become clear, natural because some people's understanding is pretty extended, presenting a certain complexity and another vision that has substance and can give particularity and identity to the individual. But at a leadership level, this war: "Acceptability-Uncertainty" has to end with a rematch always. The actions have to favor the opponent as well, otherwise you are confronted with the situation when you must find an opponent in yourself and forcefully lose.

Keep perfecting your perception of the people around you, so that you manage to open, without forcing it, that closed door, which nobody can reach. The door to their soul. And once opened, don't lock it back through games of perception and role. The shortcomings of your own nature are given by the inability to attach yourself emotionally to others and the inability to be happy for their success.

People will be prepared to respond to your attempts to influence them if the information you provide as a way of psychological intervention lies between their desire to self-indulge and your determination to give up control.

The Fire Of The Mind signals that knowledge capacity of those around you, so that they respond favorably to your actions determined by ideas and thoughts that can be induced through persuasion. "You" and "They" have to operate as a continuous tandem in order to touch some common goals and in this tandem there shouldn't be any loser.

The Firm Impulse Towards Evolution Of The Fundamental-Dubitative Being

Define the "Man" within you throughout the process of transformation, without falling from the height of your own vision over what you are.

I was almost to fall from the height of my own vision on what I was. I sighed worried. If I gave up to the firm but irrational impulse that invariably assaulted me in the short transition of that hours, I would have risked a penalty, an injury, a forced collapse into nothingness. I tried an elevation of my being into something I could not be. Like a dry branch under the weight of a huge will, I was directly breaking my graceful flight toward excellence.

Being distracted by an almost obsessively thought, continually rising in my brain like a column of infinite, putting his imprint on my own soul, I dared to walk a path that was never followed by anyone. In a sphere of obscurity, into the deepest abyss uncharted by anyone, in the place where I hoped to find the answer to my own searches.

Damn. I would not feel regret for putting the foot where no one stepped. But I went too far with speculations, with assumptions, with my researches, much too chaotic, like the man, who soars in the deep mud of a swamp and, on the verge of drowning, clings to everything that it seems to him can keep to the surface. Without too much chance of success.

Resizing a mysterious understanding of my whole life could have made it possible to change the trajectory of my becoming an artist who paints a broad vision, but without being capable of a truly remarkable achievement. I was ashamed of a metaphysical interventionism that could not obtain mobilizing and stimulating valences on my own state of mind.

Leadership: Does the verdict you put on your current feelings makes you come to the limit of your ability to respond with "YES" to the demands of an escape from the faces of clashing thoughts that keep you from knowing your life story?

The story of my life was bolstered by the secondary reflex of a thinking that bravely overcame a day's projections. I seemed detached from a novel by Stephen Crane, a soldier lost on a battlefield, crushed by a parallel sense, an option like: "yes, I will do this" or "no, it would be better not to try". A whole blaze of the vital feeling, of worldly anxiety, basically indefinable.

Clearly, like a fundamental-dubitative being, always hunted by doubts and anxieties, I was blinded by the increasing light of my selfishness to conquer always something else, to chase after the increasing performance, continuing to widen my sphere of existence, to put everything into question. Significant, I was attracted by an irresistible force, impelled by the urgent need to respond to the questions that haunted me.

I saw far into the darkness, in the attempt to progress higher, lit only by my inner world, dynamized by the brightest parts of my vision. Determined by the intuition, by my higher knowledges, I ran towards something that did not suit me. Searching, like a magician in a top hat, a new content, a new breakthrough of the impossible.

This constant in change of my life, a little unusual, became a source of anxiety. I involuntarily manifested, then increasingly antagonistic my own inability to penetrate the impossible, through a sabotage of my own personality. Everything swirled around me with a dizzying speed. I felt a deep anger against my own will, in the desperate attempt to rediscover myself.

Leadership: How do you define yourself during the evolving process of trying to keep your mind constantly challenged by the illusion of a self-contained false self?

Are you running after increasing performance? Do you keep widening your sphere of existence putting everything into question? Are you facing a choice like*"yes, I will do this"* or "no, it would be better not to try "? Are you trying to evolve continuously through a breakdown of the impossible? Do you find a last resort of force through a desperate attempt to discover yourself? Are you starting a tedious and a sterile search of "false knowledges" that cannot satisfy than only for a moment your evolution?

Talking about the man and his continuing desire for change, this trajectory included in his existence that takes a substantial part of his functionality, means above all recognizing his constitutive report with his efforts to "recover" himself. This recovery, the clear recognition of his real progress, of the decision manifested around his own feelings and experiences, is based on the truth revealed by the great French philosopher Denis Diderot. He stated:

"To say that man is a compound of strength and weakness, light and darkness, smallness and greatness, is not to indict him, it is to define him."

The ability to maximize your leadership depends on how you define yourself, as a man, throughout the process of evolution. You are your own "Creator", a pivotal component of self-knowledge that you should not disregard it as a five coin money that fell near a ditch, on a deserted street.

Leadership: Are you tempted to retire in the "Refuge in which there are no mirrors", about the inclination of the mind to deny itself when it comes to over-contemplating the immediate realities that direct the aspects of life?

Regarding this word - "Creator" - so common, with so many meanings; it is preferable to have a certain filter that would not allow a reversion to the status produced in a messy way, but to a revitalization of its own resources and energies. A deviation from a "to be" to a "to become" more prominently developed in a particular direction. But, a direction that does not takes the appearance of a fight with the windmills - an attempt to evolve permanently, blinded by the increasing light of selfishness of always conquering something else.

It is like, breaking contact with the daily life; you would find a refuge designed to self-knowledge. But, a refuge, a dark closet, where there are no mirrors, where you are not allowed to look at yourself. Everything spins in your mind, thoughts are going crazy, probably more stressed than the usual, but in a direction opposite the reality.

Just as reading a book is not enough to produce a change in life, so the lack of a "reflection" on your potential narrows totally your horizons, being unable to produce a trigger, an awakening, a disconnection from the too pronounced tendency towards development, towards the inauspicious evolution.

That means to fall from the height of your own vision over what you are. You create to yourself a singular thinking and that one seen in the wrong way, only with the "eyes" of imagination, a pillar on which is based the entire structure of your psyche, but that does not have any stability. Because it lacks substance, truth, maintaining a caution; a shining star, close to you and very researched.

Come on, stop for a moment and be a "Man". A man who does not lack mirror. Always look at it. What does it reflects? Is it another man from the one I know?

Is it the time to put your identity into question? How do you define the "Man" within you and what it is reflected in his exterior? Is it the man within you a "conductor" of strength or weakness? A source of light or darkness? Do you give evidence of "smallness of mind" or of grandeur in the whirl of evidences towards achieving excellence?

Leadership approached in terms of "refuge in which there are no mirrors" is in line with the idea that man's power or weakness can always be closed in a very limited existential space that shakes through the tragedy of a living at the limit of supportability.

The Firm Impulse Towards Evolution Of The Fundamental-Dubitative Being means the strong spark that sets in motion the change, but a change to the detriment of "Man" that wants himself entirely rational, researching his own knowledge before using it.

Just as hemoglobin binds to oxygen and provides blood the red color, so the man who knows how to clearly define the character in the mirror, can give a higher degree of credibility to his own vision, providing more quality material to support the sustainable development - that very strong color of moderation, of discernment, balance, and self-control, the tendency towards analysis and depth, which plays a key-role in his personal evolution.

The First Chapter Of Leadership

You may influence for the better the way that others perceive you, only if you come for their spiritual and moral ideals.

I wish that in this article to relate you an important aspect of the movie „The Law of the Desert (1991)". Tom Burton, a former CIA agent, had to infiltrate in the oasis of Beni-Zaire from Sahara desert, and to recapture Robert Sanders, the son of an influential business woman Catherine Sanders.

With this object, Tom has posed as an arm dealer, and together with James Ross, one of his team members has appeared before the powerful Emir Beni-Zaire. They had to choose words carefully. One wrong word could have cost the lives of both.

- Noble Prince of Draa, we do trade in arms. We sell to the best buyers, in Chad, Mali, and in the ancient land of Songhai empire. If we would hide this from you, we would insult your wisdom. However, we do not sell to those without flag or without faith, such as Zeralds...

On hearing these words, Amir, looking at them all over, changed his whole attitude. He radiated amplitude, calm nobility, a solemn elegance, indeed unmatched. Something told him that Tom and James were not ordinary traffickers, unscrupulous, soulless, which were not interested in who buy from them. Nevertheless, they respected a certain ethical, an honor of them, and even a plurality of values uplifted to the distinction of a cult; they still had a code that kept of faith and order.

Leadership: Is your potential to achieve your goals limited by the results you got that have a conclusive impact on the accumulation of evidence regarding your integrity?

You will always witness a negotiation that claims to be for the benefit of cunning, but also for the benefit of negotiations that can turn diplomacy into a real art. You may influence for the better the way that others perceive you, only if you come for their spiritual and moral ideals. Tom and James have proven this.

Winning the confidence of the leader is always a process of negotiation. You will take part in a "negotiation" whenever you will express your desire to join the circle of friends of the leader, or his team. For this negotiation to take place and be successful, you must support the leader's thoughts, and he must treat you as if you would act in good faith. In other words, the leader must understand your position (within your thoughts, principles and morality), to compare with his, and finally to accept it or not.

A character from a work of the writer Mika Waltari said: "Blow well to scatter the chaff and keep only the best grains". It was a way of telling that not all people are trustworthy, and that only the best should be chosen and kept.

Leadership: Could your work under the auspices of a single "I'm the same" entity be expanded by including an investigative role on what you can achieve when you catch someone's attention, but don't have high expectations of it?

Proof of your integrity is obtained through the knowledge that others seek in you and that you propose as the main purpose of your life. But at the same time, cunning demands the same kind of guarantee. So, what makes the difference between integrity and cunning? Well, the difference is the closeness between the past and the present that people perceive as a symbol of common efforts to achieve a certain goal.

Your obligation as a leader is to weigh people. To filter their feelings and emotions in terms of rationality, considering your personal values, in which you believe, and that you respect. Likewise, did the powerful Emir Beni-Zaire.

Just as the ultimate goal of a photographer is to ensure its images a true exposure in front of an audience that will ask themselves: "Why?" – Just so and your ultimate goal should be the one to increase and to ensure the quality of relationships with other people, but not before knowing them, not before asking yourself: "Why?"

You cannot accept people around you if you do not understand them, is not it? You cannot give them a minimum of trust if they do not have some influence on your heart, if their vision does not correspond to the values by which you guide in your life. First, judge on the value of people before making up the step to a higher level of association.

Leadership is the agreement between what you are able to accomplish and what you can gladly keep in your soul when you are subjected to trying to access other people's areas of interest.

The First Chapter Of Leadership it is the basis on which could be built a relationship. Moreover, the process of establishing relationships is not always carried out very quickly. First, there is "opening" here you can talk about continuous communication, but subtle, coded, where each one rather observes at the other one what lies behind their words. If the leader predicts the complete features of the other one, and if he will be satisfied with his qualities, only then could produce an association.

In leadership, first you need to know to cognize people, which involve the development of the relations of collaboration and permanent socialization. Learn to observe people's behavior, their attitude and at the same time, learn to interpret their facial expressions, gestures, words and even their silences. Be open to them, receptive to their ideas because in your turn to be worthy of their trust.

You can influence the way you are perceived by others, only if you come for their spiritual and moral ideals.

The First Determinant Of Leadership

On May 19, 2017

Stimulate your motivation to surpass yourself, finding that component of your self-image that you can cross into the plans of the extremes that shake you.

It was more than my capturing in the chains of previously experienced perceptions, whether it is to analyze the fertilization of my thinking in the all-encompassing whole of a waking state – accompanied by a justification of isolation from the real world. Undoubtedly, my beta testing the tendency to interpret experiences of life only in terms of strength will be an attempt to situate me in the state of final deception, towards introducing the limits of hope that kept on shrinking..

It was something beyond the meaning of knowledge that underpinned the consciousness of my time to find a motivation for existence, a psychology of the way to the alternative of freedom without constraints, something beyond the limits of the possibility of infinitely varied knowledge of a science fiction that employs man on a dark path of isolation. It was a gray shade of the way to make changes over which there were certain eternal, steady laws, which were subject to certain restrictions of access applied in a nightmare that is repeated throughout.

In this case, leadership was an acceptance of the willingness to guide me towards an unforgettable adventure, to a great way to live by the subtlety of the psychology to surprise, at the same time, both the general and the particular aspect of the human being inscribed in the ensemble of an ending world.

I, Gerry Lane, a very atypical scientist, was not sure that the virus that terrified the world, turning any man into a zombie, could have a definitive cure. There was only one thing I was sure of: I had to have enough energy to swing at will between a reason based on a logical thread and a reason based on natural phenomena and on partial rational deductions extracted from natural phenomena.

Leadership: Can you dare to imagine the future of your relationship with yourself and communicate it to the world through the way you live your life in the face of an atypical natural phenomenon that is growing faster?

Being caught within the limits of a simple logic, nothing complicated for the genius of staying in the body of the art of survival, with a wide spread in the construction of the apparatus of my own intellectual hegemony, I began to make my destiny so that I feel that I live my life in the most useful way, just as a talented sculptor can emphasize, in composition and color, the deep, human content with a lot of verve.

The forces that pushed the world into cycles of unpredictability of life, change of things, and the laws of science during an authentic, unprecedented individual emancipation constituted elements of a mechanical language, accomplished by welding with the perceptions of value that defined me by a distinct role, at the temperature of such a self-responsibility seriously committed to reality. My future seemed to be an eventual succession within an atypical phenomenon that cannot be explained by conventional science.

Far from me, the lack of motivation from the very beginning of a perpetual exile in the private space of an authentic phenomenology: "That's what I am". The expression of the state of imprisonment, the silence of an art camp viewed from the angle of the pressure of contact between the real plane and a crushing concreteness and that of the lessons it sent to the world was expressed by the color of the extremes to which I was subjected. An extreme of the interpretation of the mood to fulfill the worldly duties and an extreme of patience from the perspective of time.

The meaning you give to superior attitude (of a hero) is a part of the experimental psychology produced on the way to the border crossing point between what isolates you and what inspires you.

It was the time of the desert journey, the time to choose between good and evil, the possibility of accepting a defeat, and the possibility of assuming it with that dilemma with which Jean Valjean, the character of Hugo, strengthened on the path of good in the struggle with the darkness of the wickedness of the world that continually denigrated it.

The first component of the self-image that deserves to be crossed in the plans of the extremes that shake you is the attitude of showing yourself in any situation better than the one you are in. Gery Lane is the hero who finds his destiny by surviving a phenomenon called "That's what I have in a world that tries to hide in the dark", and who manages to keep events in check by fighting against the forces of nature. And in this context leadership is the responsibility that Gery assumes as a survivor in a world subject to death.

And the sense of authenticity that promotes "That's what I am", which I had many times the opportunity to speak of, expresses the belief that even the destination you're headed is the radiance of life that complies with an immeasurable ruminations and superior attitudes. Not always life, through its ups and downs, is the one that is arranged according to the interpretation you give it, qualified as more or less precise, more or less imperative.

Leadership is the heroic attitude you have in the face of that colossal change that can turn you into a worthless object with which destiny, having become ruthless, cynically plays.

The First Determinant of Leadership is the situation in which you place yourself in when you promote the sense of authenticity in terms of a retrospective of the entire process, derived from the great unknown of endless battles accepted as a necessary evil. A cultivated, deepened struggle built on the pillars of delusion, confusion, pride, conscience, or freedom of action.

Sometimes assuming the opportunity to experience a completely different world in the story your destiny creates is a component of the self-image that you are crossing into the extremes that give you a certain vision, and not necessarily a happy one about life.

The First Function Of Leadership Culture

Seek where no one seeks and find where you least expect it.

Eisenstein began his work on the movie script, together with Agadjanova, through serious research on which they were helped by the counselors of the documentary commission. Articles, documents, testimonies of participants are at the basis of this research job. The script condensed a gigantic factual material. The action started off during the Russo-Japanese War and ended with the repression of the revolution, taking place in Moscow, Leningrad, Odessa, Sevastopol, Tiflis. The script, written during the summer, often synthesized in two lines important events.

*Seemingly impossible to be regarded as a starting point for the making of a film, the script actually contained the whole preparation work for the movie, of historical research and, we could say, emotional research. It tried to capture the dynamic nature and the rhythm of the era, the relations between events and the mood of the historical period it was depicting. **

Leadership: Can you produce a true revelation, finding those minimum and maximum references that help your motives of constructing the assembly of creation?

"The work should hold the power to reveal itself", Romanian painter Soring Ilfoveanu used to say a long time ago. But for it to be revealed, announcing a new facet of art – creating uniqueness, in the architecture so firmly constructed of a vigorous piece of art, the artist must first capture all the sources and references that correspond wholly to the necessities of producing a model of vision and artistic interpretation.

Continuing the series started during the final touch projects of certain ideas, sketches and types of experiences, making the introduction of a new line of art and thought possible, and suggesting the inclination towards certain perspectives and towards a certain level of evolutional preferences, leadership can rise to the height of its potential to use all the means of producing performance quality.

In other words, the man who rises to the height of his potential for individual creative transformation, manifesting his dynamism with regards to the act of birth-making of creation, comes under the researching job basis to condense gigantic material of supporting and molding of its theoretical and practical content.

This, in leadership, is called extending your intervention over those constants dependent on one another, with a symmetrical distribution around the forward, which is geared towards overcoming the starting point.

The starting point is the beginning of a very hard to achieve approach, as satisfactory as it is difficult, which aims to identify new sources and references of inspiration for identifying ideas.

Before a good idea starts to gain value, you must assure a way of making a revelation whole and its path of transmission.

The revelation, in leadership, is the result of discovering those unique ways of creating (an addiction of realizations), through research focused on understanding and emotions, using as a pillar of making things whole, the relations between more sources of background of which measurements are determined separately.

Minimum and maximum references are helpful information, sometimes opposite, which contribute to making those phenomena, events, ideas, concepts, insufficiently discerned, whole, but which allow estimate the way of projecting themselves into the possible, in the infinite space which opens up between creation and the world.

The first function of leadership culture has as objective the production of a revelation, based on scientific methods, of original knowledge.

And the revelation, which in turn explores and transforms itself in creation, is based more often than not on the principle: "seek where no one seeks and find where you least expect it."

The First Law Of Science In The Spiritual Plan

On February 06, 2022

We cannot know things as they are, but only as they appear to us.

I spoke in the previous article about the great inventor Alfred Nobel, to whom the whole subject always listened when trying to make a new (much improved) version of dynamite. He was spared any accident while working with the most explosive substances, although millions of people die each year from dynamite.

To some extent, without encountering any difficulty, if I were to measure my inventive abilities through the experience of facing death, how to change a constant representation of the conquest of science on a unitary axiomatic trajectory, then I would probably stumble across an overlooked side, an exception, something I wouldn't have thought I could do. Is it just a matter of faith and inner strength?

However, I am a self-taught inventor, and in this way, I am entitled to accept the way in which my inventions fall into the category of things one does not speak of, but are rather left to imagination. Without exception, working with matter can turn into a relationship between what I project as intention, and the effectiveness of the protection that nature provides me with a single purpose: to broaden the valences of "miracle" beyond visible matter.

Leadership: Can you see yourself inside a version of imaginary events without having to measure your own confrontation with the representation of the truth around the vision you create?

The relationship with myself is a bridge to the miracle of science, a resizing of the image that allows me to reproduce something, to give a replica of the real, but at the same time it is a confrontation between what I consider to be old and the desire for progress. This creates the premises for a constant and visible evolution, which broadens the horizon of knowledge of living nature (as a whole of impact events) and the essence of unseen things.

In this sense, death is no longer seen as a natural fact in the book of life, but as one of the coordinates of a magic that is also a game of sublime guessing, unfolding and connecting with me through an exercise of the imaginary and the dream of crossing the boundaries of human possibilities. Nature cannot be satisfied to add an extra real complicity with the Creator, except by recapitulating my own experience of duplication, so in fictitious form.

"Things are going the way I wanted", said the wizard Prospero in a Shakespeare play at one point. His bold plan had turned into a death-defying commitment. Moreover, he could see everything, but without being seen. The spirit named Ariel, who was also invisible to any human eye except Prospero's, ashamed of looking ungrateful, always obeyed the commands of his creator.

Here the unique features of the law that moves things are highlighted: in order to be stretched, matter must be a force of penetration, expansion, and resistance. Then we have a means of direct knowledge of reality, which only our own soul offers us. And the sensitive activity of the soul, guided by perfect virtue, is the bridge from the spiritual to the material.

Leadership: Do you identify your ability to distinguish between the imaginary and the real by maximizing the interpolation of an image that can only be obtained by rejecting it?

Rather, as the initiator of a vision of the unimaginable, I can apply any law of physics to adjust the size of such a worldly change in a subjective way. And this is because matter has that quality of forming the bridge from the spiritual realm to the physical world. In particular, I like Fermat's principle to apply it against the background of the miraculous: "The time in which light travels the geometric path 's' in any environment is equal to the time in which light would travel the path "l" in a vacuum."

The long search ended in a completely unexpected way. The visionary became a creator, not just any creator. First, I was Alfred Nobel, then I was Prospero, and finally I became the image of the two. I miraculously escaped any misfortune, whenever I played with danger, and I always had the spirit of heavenly phenomena on my side, which I knew how to decipher in time with the help of nature. Moreover, the wrath of nature came upon all who wanted to harm me.

No, I do not consider myself a Creator just because I have been influenced in the process of describing images by what the senses perceived on contact with the "described object". But because, beyond the limits of the visible, we discreetly introduced, here and there, step by step, elements of chance, of improvisation, but also a series of miraculous-hyperbolic algorithms and their extensions in a game of expressiveness.

However, if I were to consider myself an exponentially expanding model of the universe, and if my thinking were projected into the unknown chemistry of matter, in addition to any other immanent law, I would probably casually fit into the tendency to pass from an obscure perception to a clearer one, so from imperfect to a higher degree of perfection.

What binds a Creator to the whole universe of his creation, in the dimension of leadership, is that part of the vision which he uses when he turns his attention to those who see themselves only through a game of contrasting duplication, in the same figurative structure, a fabulous image and a symbolic one.

The First Law Of Science In The Spiritual Plan has as its starting point the following point of view: We cannot know things as they are in themselves, but only as they appear to us. I have a serious reason to say this. I have a book at home that I read all the time, without being able to stop. I feel the need to live in its world without forcing my gaze, because it has that special quality of knowing beforehand to put in its pages all the moments of my life.

The First Meaning Of The Abyss

On August 29, 2014

Perform a correct configuration of the existential parameters, identifying a vision that matches your own individuality.

I never set anything specific in mind, in the anxious expectations of the impact called "the first meaning of the abyss". Why would I? I was not a special being, a king in his own kingdom, but I was always looking for something new. Something that could recreate itself out of the imaginary, from beyond the unknown, but at the same time, resembling normality as much as possible.

It was a necessary stage in the evolution of my universe, through the perception of an indescribable reality. The expansion of a dimension different from the one set in my subconscious. It was translated through an inner change, born out of the experience in the work with matter resurrected from the ashes of a dying star – my secret impulse, the intensity of my protection in an already present future.

Confident, I was penetrated by the idea that it would be thrilling, but it was not so. I hadn't the slightest idea of how it should look like or how I was supposed to proceed in order to obtain something palpable, something communicable, which could be expressed in words. My inner life was full of thoughts, one more sophisticated than the other, more energetic, more easily manageable under the shadow of reality that wasn't caused by some unknown force. But was rather due to the one in error.

I wish I never knew that the great science can transform the parameters of the power of constructing "on-off" alternations, from high to low voltage, from low intensity to high tension. And vice versa. I find, however, that this was interesting. The creation, which life with its many challenges raised before me, was an ambiguous phenomenon to which I was a helpless witness. I seemed devoured by mysterious echoes, caused by the concrete of life and its orientation towards the abstract.

Leadership: Do you have the power to go deep into the bosom of a reality that goes beyond the borders of the admissible, under the influence of a force of redefining the fundamentals of self-development?

Everything that is materialized in the possibility of expressing thoughts, moods, has as a first landmark the individual's authenticity. Resorting to strengthening his position as a supporter of a particular vision, in the sense that the positive effect of the power of expressing his own individuality has, by expanding the existential dimension, the future leader can amplify his field of research. This way, he provides extremely adequate conditions to deepen the relationships between science, experience and the world that governs him.

There are different ways to exercise your leadership, just as there are different ways to perceive reality, verifying and validating the reasoning by which you can rethink your existence. And each has a slightly specialized function, through which inner change is achieved, controlling the trends of searching for novelty in the imaginary and especially in the imaginary represented by the forms of accepting what you truly are.

You want to find something, yes, that's true, something that identifies with your vision, something that suits your own individuality and highlights what you think. A possibility of adjusting the current of "inadmissible" by modifying the force of creation. And this actually means that your inner life is filled with thoughts, one more sophisticated than the other, more energetic, more easily manageable under the shadow of reality that isn't caused by some unknown force.

A reality that goes beyond the limits of admittance is a complex operation of thought by extracting from a complex of traits of an event or phenomenon certain defining characteristics for self-perception and identity in relation to others.

But until you feel somewhat "facing the accomplished deed", until you reach the level of fruitfulness of your own person and of experience in leadership, you must eliminate any error that might invalidate your self-awareness, the identity implied by the affiliation to a new real.

Before rushing through the meanders of a judgment that doesn't follow the usual norms, changing the rules of leadership, perform a correct configuration of the existential parameters, identifying a vision that matches your own individuality.

You risk going deeper in error if you always try to create out of the imaginary new structures of landmarks for redefining your own self and your own role in the process of transitioning from a stagnant phase of development to a progressive one. Thus, leadership will gain a new, unwanted meaning, of supremacy in the sphere of creation and unreality, instead of balance and harmony in the sphere of life and concrete reality.

The influence of a force to redefine the fundamentals of self-development can be seen in the perception that you have of the "ineffable" of a creation that you can bestow on a God beyond your understanding. It materializes in an inward change that encourages, in turn, the confirmation of a new revelation about the reality of life manifested in the variety of your own emotions, needs, insights, searches and failures.

A vision that fits your own individuality is built on the pillars of a hidden reality beyond what is seen, but which can be perceived by contemplating the most obvious things, by carefully contemplating change, by contemplating thoughts born of the experiences of real life.

The First Meaning Of The Abyss refers to that system of self-control set up by each leader, which must dominate both in his existential parameters and in his own vision, the force of creation and his inner life, until achieving the proposed goal.

The abyss is a place full of mystery, full of imagination, in which you have unlimited access, but which doesn't guarantee your victory in the fight against yourself, with what you become in the great equation of life. What meaning will your leadership gain in the case of a defeat?

The First Part Of Leadership

On January 18, 2013

Exercise your power to be the master of events that move you from the comfort zone, without anchoring yourself to a compromise of character that does not correspond to the balanced vision of a path forward.

During high school I read the novel "Hannibal Ante Portas" written by Slavomir Nastasijevic, being a necessary creation in the library of a leader, around the need to learn with the chosen teaching of the great fighters. In fact, one would say that the greatest fear of a warrior is the power to relate to a creation that brings inspiration and wisdom full of chosen teachings.

And the Roman armed units were described. Fat men, stuffed, equipped with heavy and sophisticated equipment, who barely had the power to ride horses. A man who struggles with his own physical weight can hardly justify his position in the field of experience of fighting against others, no matter how sophisticated his weapons may be.

On the other hand, Hannibal's units, weak, uneducated, equipped with small arms, without much military training, but very good athletes. A change of vision does not require heavy weapons to materialize in a spectacular move.

And when a fight was fought between life and death, although the Romans had the advantage of 3 against 1, almost all were massacred in a short time. They had no strength, no agility, in fact, they did not even have the strength to get off the horse to help the wounded.

And look, this is because those who have a lot are so easily defeated by those who have almost nothing, precisely because they have everything... except the power to fight.

Leadership: Is it possible that during your next stages of education, consistent and decisive, you can take a step forward towards building an image of yourself that will produce significant changes to that image?

If you want to be a winner, be wary of being among those who have everything, among those equipped with sophisticated tools, because the strongest character is won only through combat, and the fight has only one reproach: he lacks the best weapons. For a weapon to take the form of a vision and to materialize in a spectacular move (from a change of situation), like a trophy obtained through great efforts, its use must be complemented by a serious practice, by manifesting an emotional reaction in behavior, in various aspects and specific situations.

The best weapon of a leader is the quality of the character of being mature, resilient and wise, determining an attitude more attuned to the achievement of certain goals, taking the place to the right of the image of a swordsman who, with a single sword, must overcome opponents without removing their sword from the sheath. Therefore, character is a weapon that should not only be used physically, but especially spiritually, that is, by creating a very powerful self-image that is projected externally as a true tsunami.

When we think of a feared weapon, we think of an image of the fighter who often conditions his disposition due to its stable or unstable structure. The image can capture a totality of the psychic and moral traits of the individual endowed with wisdom, manifested in his behavior and actions, in his attitudes and position towards others, only if it depicts an unusual event, but which has no serious consequences.

Character is the image that depicts you as a fighter by spirit and attitude, not necessarily as a fighter holding a sharp sword in your hand.

Leadership: Is the image with which you enrich your personality a product of many controllable variables, related to your orientation towards transforming your vision into a reality that does not require sacrifice?

Let us take another example.

Who moves their arms and legs more and with more determination: the one who is about to drown or the one who is fishing calmly in a boat?

The same is true of the latter who have nothing, but who come to rule the whole world: they move their arms and legs more than all others who have everything.

Blessed are the latter or those who have nothing, for they will be the first and the ones who rule the earth.

I'm able to draw a conclusion. The less you have, the more you want. The more you want, the more you do. Little by little is achieved.

Therefore, the first controllable variant of your personalities, the seed that underlies the great achievements, is the very spiritual state you feel when you crave or aspire to something. The second variant, as a natural consequence of evolving trends, a feature clearly positive that you have to use in your favor is that force of resistance you must show in those unfortunate moments of life.

By constantly calling on the attitude that screams "I can become much more than I am", as a continuous evaluation of your achievements that resist the tendencies of anxiety or uncertainty, you will be able to cross the roads of life without feeling hurt or exploited by the circumstances and vicissitudes of life.

The motto of the leaders is this: "I will survive with the need to control my world, without fear of experiencing major changes, to materialize the vision of an escape from the movies, to attribute to me how to be a reality that always escapes others."

The First Part Of Leadership captures the connection between character and attitude, expressed through the three identifiers: vision, desire and ability to make sacrifices. The winning character bears the imprint of an attitude full of dignity, self-control, understanding, being invested as if by nature with the capacity to increase the desire to fulfill a vision that gives coherence and meaning to sacrifices, faith and bold facts.

The First Place

On May 04, 2010

Demonstrate your greatness, by adjusting your potential for leadership according to your ability to understand and control the feelings of others.

A few months ago I was visiting an old colleague from high school. Seeing him again was fantastic, full of stories of all kinds. Even so, while we talked, telling stories, bringing back old memories, I also paid attention to the "Flour game" that his kids played with some other kids, a total of six souls very determined to win. Instinctively, I stopped my look directly on them, following the development of the game.

First, they filled a big cup of flour, they pressed it well, then they dumped it on a plate and put a coin on it. Each of them cut very carefully a piece, in the order they established at the ballots, so that the coin would not crumble. The last one in the race, Matei, who could be clearly seen as the most ambitious among all, won, by eliminating his competitors one by one.

Leadership: Do you exert a constant control over the reality you live in by strengthening your efforts to respond to the affective demands of others so that they can achieve a remarkable level of excellence?

A competition was over, a battle was decided. I followed the little winner with my eyes, with the same feeling of joy, which invades the spectators of a boxing gala, when their favorite fighter wins the great match. However, contrary to any expectations, I could read on his face regret, maybe the regret that, by achieving the victory, the other kids who lost will not appreciate him just as much or, even worse, will want to draw away from him.

He was the only winner of the "Flour game" a thing which, on one hand, I think brought him a great deal of satisfaction, of course, because he had that something, which makes the difference between people, that vivid and active spirit, very competitive, specific to the people activated by a strong desire to prove their worth in the confrontation with the bravest adversaries; and, on the other hand, brought him a great deal of sadness, a deep and heavy sadness.

I am sure that he was thinking, in his little wisdom, to share his prize with the other kids. He seemed invaded by a strong desire to support them, to manifest his interest and affectiveness towards them, to reward them somehow by slightly maneuvering the situation. He wanted to attract his friends' sympathy, or, I would rather say, all their gratitude, thus removing any sign of dispraise or envy.

Even so, the prize he won, a little 50 cents coin, how would he share with the others? Moreover, if he would be able to share with the others, will this supreme humanity gesture replace the eventual feelings of envy or even anger of his friends? Maybe if they played again and, leaving his pride aside, would lose, would the situation change by anything?

Unfortunately, I had to leave, I do not know how Matei acted, but it would have been really helpful to find out.

Leadership: Do you try to build a promising perspective of connecting to the experiences of others by recognizing superiority that contradicts its essence beyond what can be seen?

The deepest desire of a determined man, driven by high ideals, is to be on top. He displays a prominent trait of character: to distinguish himself. Always projecting himself above all others, such a man can succeed if he stays unyielding in his will, to achieve the goals he sets, and to rise above everybody, to outclass them, dominate them. But for how long?

Probably hidden deep under the layers of consciousness, his instinct drove Matei to divert his attention towards his friends' feelings. He proved maturity in thought when, putting himself in his friends' position, looked at himself with different eyes.

This is called empathy: to be preoccupied by the thoughts and feelings of other people, putting yourself in their place, trying to think like them. Only this is how you can understand those around you. If you cannot enter people's minds and find out what they think, if you do not conceive their intentions, especially in important moments, then you are not meant to lead them. For he who does not have the ability to understand those around him will never be able to communicate with them.

What is your most prominent character trait? Does your instinct urging you to direct attention to the feelings of the less competitive than you? Are you proving maturity in thinking? Are you looking at yourself through the eyes of others? Can you predict their intentions? Do you think you deserve to be in their head? What is the hardest decision that you have to take when you win, and what is the hardest one you should take when you lose? Can you control their reaction when they lose?

Leadership is the superiority you gain by contributing to the manifestation of a consciousness gained from the recognition of a victory that does not disclose or permanently challenge its individualistic dimension.

The first place is not always the most comfortable and quiet place, but it is the most desired. However, the question arises, why did some people get on the first place, winning the laurels of victory, and others have not got them. The explanation is simple, the latter either having involved less or not at all for the first place, or they lacked competition experience, or they were not persevering enough. It is interesting, though, that the latter are also, many times, those who envy, denigrate or, even worse, sabotage the one who got on the first place.

No matter what empathy would manifest the one on the first place, especially if he got there by playing fair and proving fair-play towards others, he must not forget: „life is a struggle, so fight". No matter how bitter the defeated one would be, especially if the game was fair, he should not forget that he got that way because he was better and, all the same, he should not forget that: "life is a struggle, so fight". Because in any competition, whatever the nature of it, there are only winners and losers.

Show your greatness, by adjusting your potential for leadership depending on your ability to understand and control the feelings of others.

The First Threshold Of Leadership

On July 10, 2011

Strengthens people's confidence in your leading potential, by restoring the bedrock of their beliefs and feelings.

Bob Spangler was the owner of one Pacific island, he knew it better than anyone. He firmly believed that his hotel built on a firm rock, could save all tourists from the terrible volcano which began to erupt. He has addressed to the scared people:

- Listen to me ! Here is what we need, right here. Believe me, this hotel was built to last. It is built on firm rock. And I advise you to stay. It's your only chance. Do not panic because of distrustful and fearful people.

Hank Anderson, a drilling foreman, convinced that volcanic eruptions and lava will destroy the whole hotel, and all the people there will die, he got out in front of the people and, with a lot of courage and confidence urged to leave the island, that is to follow him in quick.

- Mark my words. Lava continues to come on this side. You will all die if you stay here. Who wants to go with me to equip immediately, and to get into cars.

Leadership: What is the consequence of the psychological impact of the event that provokes you to exceed your limits when it comes to vulnerable people/places that you cannot integrate into your individual path?

If you have not seen the movie "When Time Ran Out (1980)" hereis how things went. After that Hank has addressed to the people, the majority has revolted against him. Very few followed him because "he was not an expert" and, especially, for he failed above all to save his own work team.

The terrible event was that all who remained in the hotel were swallowed by the volcano. The only ones who escaped were those who answered the Hank's appeal.

To gain authority to the people, you must restore the bedrock of their beliefs, you should inspire them a strong feeling of solidarity that would cover any imperfections, and to increase the measure of your skills, providing convincing arguments in supporting your opinions and decisions.

Just as a musical experience can be missed if the musician is focused on himself and not on music, so the wave that can propel you ahead of people may be missed if they do not continue to focus on you all their inner resources that produce their gratitude and attachment.

Leadership is a factor of psychological impact producing consequences according to people's beliefs and emotions. To make people to answer your appeal, to awaken in them that sense of inner contentment, which gives place for setting esteem and mutual respect, to motivate them to put all their trust in you - then you must remove from their consciousness that intense feeling of insecurity and uncertainty and to replace it with one of unity and trust.

Leadership: Does the presence of your points of view in any place and in any deed represent the certainty of achieving goals even when reality does not provide you with any kind of control valve in the art of compromise?

In the demanding space of solidarity, which leans towards a successive force fusion, all emotions, knowledge and contradictions accurately concentrate in a mix of pragmatism, idealism and justice. Their only value is to facilitate the unconditional acceptance of a greater centralization and to better weld this union, whose purpose is leadership.

But if most of individual traits, if the collective mind remains altered despite all supportive measures that predominantly act on the basis of common interests, then the presence of leadership can no longer represent a certainty of achieving an objective.

The change of people's general perception of reality, generated in an amazing way by leadership, can be assigned a value of unity only if there is an agreement of all forces participating in a cooperative action. But if people's beliefs based on rumors or a narrow research have as sole result the leader's inability to formulate courses of action in a problematic context in which a decision must be made quickly, then they put above all the high percentage of doubt, being driven by the sense of rivalry.

Leadership: Do you want to put others ahead of your personal interests, but retaining your own needs is a denial of your own person in a hypostasis that you cannot escape?

Pale reflections of declined evidence. For as pain shows how fast the wound is healing, so preconceptions about the leader's "brand" show how much an invested value produces expected results or how much certain choices deliver the desired results. A single miscalculation on the leader's value, the fundamental inner need of people to align to general belief prevents them to unlock from their dilemmas.

"What do others say?", "What does the majority think?" (and very rarely "What do I think?") remain the same main reasons by which man seeks to subordinate to the "right", i.e. a higher logic, predetermined in the terms of a shaky vision, focused on security, but objectionable.

Therefore, I tend to believe that solidarity flourishes rather in the vicinity of certain situations, of a secure future, which does not baffle the leader's role. If the personal feeling would be greater, if man would focus more on his own thinking and less on the herd instinct, the spread of solidarity probably wouldn't face big problems.

A denial of one's own person in a situation you cannot escape from occurs when the risk to which you expose yourself is maximum and you feel that you are no longer yourself, but a beginning of the impending outcome caused by the course of events.

The first threshold of leadership sets your defining position in people's lives. It is the most important threshold of your progress, and the hardest to reach, by which you should provide a great connection between people's beliefs and your expectations. If you fail to establish a full concordance between the actual level of confidence that people give to you and your ability to influence their beliefs, then you could never lead them to follow you (especially in difficult situations). To get ahead of the others you must create a sense of security in their soul.

Conclusion: To win the trust of most people you must restore the bedrock of their beliefs and feelings. Your skills and experience demonstrated in relation with them are convincing arguments as your history on how to solve difficult situations, when you overcame the skepticism of some and the ill will of others.

However, look-out, always to lean on the evidence, to have accurate information from experts in the field where you do not have control and especially to have a capacity to foresee the imminent danger that can result in loss of lives. To venture, using arguments that do not have a sound basis, risking lives for the sake of your pride and your personal interests, is a misstep that will cost you much.

The Flame Of A Candle Held By An Invisible Hand

Extend your knowledge territory, without getting too attacked to the properties of the reality you identify with.

Led by an amazing drive, I tried to focus all the forces of my intelligence towards a return to the essential that had escaped my sight, to the making up of my own philosophic vision, based only on life experience. But which suffered small alterations under the influence of the various usage conditions of reason. I had to take care while processing every individual request in order to ensure a balanced exchange of coordinates between the reference systems of my molar and intellectual authority.

It was clear that this way of seeing and understanding myself under the aspect of a careful analysis and of an option to extend my basic viability, which any man who felt responsible for his own training is forced to do from time to time, always said the same thing: "Do I really understand what I look for in order to fill the void created by an insufficient configuration of the usage parameters of superior thinking processes?"

I am was surely electrified by that artificial and abstract thinking of a scientist, that the Romanian esthete Ion Ianosi described as stopping the continuous move in its tracks, separating the inseparable parts of the whole, dissecting and penetrating the depths that don't appear in front of him directly, depths which should be understood through the mediating and somewhat mortifying effort of reason.

The man who does not discover from the experience of his own experiences a new theory or a new concept of originality in the field of scientific creation certainly does not possess the clairvoyance of destiny that pushes him to be more than he is.

The stubbornness to overcome any limit. The exploration of depths regarding the scientific field. The methodic erudition rich in precise and pretentious results, like a spring of live water where you drink from and can't get enough. The stimulation of an independent and investigative thinking. All these things prepared my pieces for the solid support that sustained and promoted leadership.

The fault was all mine. Because I had lost my essential. Because I became attached to the properties of a reality burdened by some superior intellectual aspirations with which I started to identify. Because I forgot to be aware of all the good parts and bad parts which, like regions tormented, ransacked by random natural phenomena, made life worth living.

Leadership: Have you enabled the option of extending your substantive validity resulting from the suggestion of a fine intuition of the final work you dedicated your entire life to?

Do you think you can take part in a titanic battle and come back with no traumas from the lands of intellectual overload and moral and emotional worries? Are you the successor of values which help your grow in a spiritual direction, guiding your life towards the lands of a thinking which produces a fundamental change in the way you approach reality?

The right to use and promote leadership brings with itself the responsibility of opening a new creative horizon in human understanding, as a kind of extension option to extend your basic viability and finding an antidote for the feel of unease which might accompany your existence. Can you make peace with yourself against an evolutionary tendency which intensely overexerts your intellectual capacity?

The final work you dedicated your entire life to is the result of the effort with which you have perfected your means of expression in order to communicate truths about yourself, about existence, about the world, conceived in the form of universally valid laws.

The imagination that complements your prejudices or virtues, in the unpredictable abundance of the situations in which the deformation or overshadowing of a fragment of daily life is applied, thus making a comparison with the real, corresponds to the manifestation of your desires to first bring into the consciousness of your own faith the change of direction the flow of events.

If you choose to totally change your vision about what worries you, or more likely, about what happens beyond the reality that controls you, cleaning your thinking of all its conditionalities and claims to have a supernatural character, you won't be able to experience a rhythmic growth of existential beauty. But you will risk remaining suspended in the void, finding support only in the true miracle of the laws of balance, in what really matters for you.

The ability to understand and promote leadership, acquired by controlling the impulses which could impair your existence, keeping you away from the danger of an intellectual creation that would lose its zest over time, is based on the strictly human phenomenon called awareness. To realise the change you make through yourself due to an innovative concept. And only because of this process you can better evaluate your own experiences and emotions. As well as the experiences of others, learning from them.

Leadership: Does the imagination that complements your virtues of creating a new life-building work correspond to the manifestation of your hidden need to feel superior to a new beginning in the world?

In "The Rationale of Verse (1843)", the American writer Edgar Allan Poe wrote the following: "Let us examine a crystal. We are at once interested by the equality between the sides and between the angles of one of its faces: the equality of the sides pleases us; that of the angles doubles the pleasure."

If you choose to research and keep walking on the path of creating an imaginary which opens new horizons to the most advanced knowledge, to enter on the path of understanding a largely disputed scientific field, you will grow attacked to the properties of a reality burdened by some superior intellectual aspirations with which you will surely start to identify.

And thus, you become just like the flame of a candle held by an invisible hand. You reach a certain perfection, in relation to the experimental results, imposed by a force which makes an obtuse angle with the reference axis a what is unanimously accepted, imposed as a unique essential options to be taken into account: the joy of living.

Maybe this angle doubles the pleasure to interact with a dynamically generated space through a knowledge which devours any informational resource. But bettering the "sides" of leadership is the basis of your identity construction, which interacts with the values, with the way you interpret your personality on the field of present and future reality, in perfect harmony with your existential beliefs and principles.

To feel superior to a new beginning of the world is to perfect your imagination towards the inexhaustible, multiplying the forms of perception and expression of reality with new truths that can be capitalized in real life.

The Flame Of A Candle Held By An Invisible Hand highlights this theme of not having to explain to your own conscience, which doesn't want any authority in any specialized field. And which must be educated so that it doesn't turn into a stranger for the joyful experience nurturing you. Do not stray from yourself, no matter how fascinating your ability to reinvent the world !

The Flaming Tripod From Which The Priestess Utters Her Oracles

On January 18, 2010

Only the desire to deserve the praises that are brought to you strengthens your virtue, and those that are brought to the spirit, value and beauty, contribute to increase them. (Francois de la Rochefoucauld)

- Well, on the contrary, said Olympia. The theater is the pedestal, it is the fiery tripod from where the priestess utters her oracles in front of the crowds and pours on them the divine grace that devours her. You, however, want me to get off the tripod and crawl on the ground. You want me to extinguish the flame of divinity in my soul, so that I can become a woman again.

- I don't want that, answered Lord Drummond with a pathos unusual for to the phlegmatic Englishman, I don't want you to extinguish the flame of divinity. I just want her to burn only for me. I want to be the sole possessor of these heavenly gifts that you spread; I don't want to share them with anyone. Ah ! I beseech you, Olympia, do not make fun of yourself, and do not take away any hopes of the bizarre passion that I feel when around you. Don't punish me for loving you otherwise than one would a woman. Let us reflect, if I loved you with a common love, what would I have gained, when you are colder and purer than a marble? Did you not answer no to all the declarations and all the requests that your beauty and genius deserved?

All the efforts, all the insistences, all the efforts, all the attempts to conquer you, were they not in vain? Well, since you don't want to be loved like a common woman, let me love you differently. You were born to understand a heart like mine, to satisfy my thirst as an artist, you who live only for art, priestess of music, for whom the Opera is a monastery and who never had other passions than for the embodiment of great roles and others lovers than Mozart and Cimarosa. In the name of Rossini, understand me and fulfill my wish ! Your genius, your soul, your voice, give it to me only. In return, you will have everything you want from me, wealth, name, even life. Oh ! If you would want to get married ! Being my wife, you would be forced to listen to me and sacrifice to me this terrible rival, which you prefer, the theater !

Lord Drummond spoke with such a convincing accent that Olympia had involuntarily become emotional.

- My lord, she said, you are almost as touching as you are absurd. My power to move people is greater than your power to have me only for yourself. Therefore, I will refuse to please you and I will never be a prisoner of the selfishness that you show. Goodbye !

Leadership: Are you able to commit an unforgivable act and not realize the prejudicial character of its consequences, manifesting the need for a radical restructuring of the fundamental ideas about the nature of the reality you perceive?

If someone thought it appropriate to lay down with tender words in the human soul the few moments of a rather empty and insignificant life, it means that he thought himself worthy of a deed that presents the danger of creating considerable barriers to the process of awareness of emotions. In this case, elegance and refinement present the danger of being used in kitsch combinations by people with a questionable aesthetic education.

As for the form of emotions (emotions being the ones that maintain the unity of the Self), if it is considered that they are imperfect, then it is much better that they do not manifest themselves, so emotions must be hidden until he comes to look for them and find the one to whom the treasure in the temple of the soul was meant. And, further, I would add that an emotion that is not felt as a whole by a great force of attraction, to the extent that feelings are basically sensations, does not appear until after you feel open to new experiences of knowledge, of living and action. It sounds quite strange, but it is so !

Leadership: Do you give yourself a small chance to accept your authentic self even when the thought, idea, intention and nature of reality is the basis of choosing an alternative to how you use reasoning to draw conclusions?

People usually do not want to give a ridiculous form to the emotions they create around them, and if there are mistakes on their part, only then do they try to weigh every word they say. Then follows the persistent request to take into account a triple desire, namely, that nothing of what they experience, of what they feel, should change, because it is the only possibility to accept themselves, to believe that they are loved. However, from what they do, as soon as their practices leave the accepted normal patterns, with their injustice, at that moment the responsibility of the mistakes concerns only them.

Memorable is this confession of the sense of responsibility with which Lord Drummond's words were tempered before entering Olympia's good graces, whence his right not to make concessions of any kind to preserve the privileges of a man of great character or to defend its territory of influence. And, then, Olympia's warning about her mistakes in approaching reality, stemming from the fear of not altering the relationship between them, of not spoiling a certain pattern of conduct, designates a geometry of discernment and self-expression, imagined as the only one that must bear and keep the mark of rigorous thinking and emotional modeling.

Leadership is a satisfactory understanding of the connection between thoughts, emotions and deeds, able to consciously direct bodily, verbal and moral actions, towards the transmission of a message worthy of Plato: "Ugly deeds are followed by shame as a sanction; to beautiful ones, a zeal for honor."

The Fiery Tripod From Which The Priestess Utters Her Oracles denotes that personality who wants to convey a message: "My power to move people is greater than your power to have me only for yourself. Therefore, I will refuse to please you and I will never be a prisoner of the selfishness you show."

Well said Francois de la Rochefoucauld: "Only the desire to deserve the praises that are brought to you strengthens your virtue, and those that are brought to the spirit, value and beauty, contribute to increase them."

The Flashing Of A Mind Inclined Towards The Infinite

On January 14, 2015

Distribute your knowledge as power, setting a new direction of addressing man and the world in relation to science.

I was advancing towards an invisible target, included in the typical of the relationship of determinism between breaking the rules admitted by consciousness and the excess of reason that entrusted me with its own forces. Without being too sure of what I could discover. As strange as it sounds, the consequences of my entry into a cycle type of loop from which I could not escape, individualized me as a rigid mathematical axiom. Reason served me more at measuring the inductions of trance, that state of passive awareness pointed inwardly, associated with a powerful involvement in imagined events.

The german philosopher Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph Schelling, who promised a new direction of addressing man and the world in relation to developing science, said: "The Promethean man does not recognize the concrete real as it was built by God, but rather seeks to give shape to reality in his own likeness, to live as a sovereign and obstinate in an ideal dream world, i.e. in an artificial world."

No wonder that I have stimulated new curiosities for myself before understanding more about science dealing with the study of dreams and reality, perceived as a simultaneous experience and recalling "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland", when the young nineteen-year-old goes to another world, and there she embarks on an extraordinary journey to clarify her future.

The only form of power that characterized my approach to finding a new reason for existence was the vision of creating a new version of the 21st century by remembrance of a world that transcends the concrete creation of reality.

An invisible target is akin to penetration into a dream that is not happening, but which continues to intrigue you through the incredible balance of the radiating imagination and the tremulous truth that could hide it.

The infinite bound by the finite that could give me an idea of what I could understand and did not understand about this world was defined by the curiosity with which I wanted to guess how Alice's reason for entering and inspecting Wonderland, and her joy to look into herself with a depth as never seen before would end.

I knew all too well that on the counter of elements that traces this artificial world a certain path to follow was determined. Transposing me mentally in the space of a coveted ideality, which explained itself subjectively, down to the immeasurable darkness of time, I mainly chased that line of questions without answer that could offer credibility to this world.

As if I allowed my curious spirit to explore everything outwardly, towards the higher echelons of a multiverse shaped by a universal wave of the type of expansion-contraction, with that ingenuity of the Supreme Creator who manages to give life to the relationships between elements. To produce with the power of my mind the flashing of an illumination happened in the long experience of assumed wandering into a space devoid of any other perceptible presence. Now that's a challenge.

Without realizing it, I myself become the extension of a troubled mind that shaped new fictions at the shelter of dream space. A parallel plane of existence, but whose metaphysical dimension was decisive for establishing scientific theories.

Leadership: Can you provide the conditions for abolishing referential restrictions of the world through an extension of the way of making science, taking into account the revelation of a new identity: who am I really?

If you want to raise your science to a superior level and perceive the reality hiding behind the day to day world, or that which is beyond direct experience, then distribute your knowledge as power. The power to create new revelations, the power to surface new truths that you cannot acquire directly by means of pure practical reason, but rather by exploring an artificial world, of a reality beyond the visible, beyond the limitations and conditions imposed by your own mind over experience.

There will come a time when the unknown will become known, and the known will become so commonplace that will not even spark interest. You must be the man of the future capable to regulate the few exceptions from this rule, reconsidering a certain way to go. To do science is to make certain findings, to have a broader vision, to create a discovery, to create something, and to do all this at the level of "the ability to see the world as God sees it" through a multitude of worlds, each more appealing and mysterious than the other.

The referential restrictions of the world are given by the interpretations you give to reality, for example, the fact that everything that draws you at some point ends by suddenly disgusting you, or the fact that everything that makes your life more beautiful can disrupt your understanding of it or of the fact that any discovery introduces you into the territory of the unknown.

Leadership is characterized by the accurate representation of reality, in the virtue of an algorithm of reacting to events and discoveries of life, being determined by understanding, by interpretation and application of a judgment, of a theory based on the anticipation and foresight. But will rely primarily on reconfiguration, redefinition and adaptation of the world to other realities.

The revelation of a new identity: "who am I really?" occurs when the discovery you make about the world appears according to your manner of controlling and intervening on the reality that you never feel like leaving.

It's about the reality of an unconditional existence by the scorched and dusty clichés that artificially determine your life.

The Flashing Of A Mind Inclined Towards The Infinite highlights the radical shift in the way of thinking and perceiving the world, in the context of the dynamics of progress, which can bring you that extra value that you need to reach the stage of director and screenwriter in this age of mixtures of realities.

Whenever you intend to relate to change, whenever you try to mentally transpose yourself in the space of a coveted ideality, remember what writer Mădălina Virginia Antonescu said: "In this age of fragments of life and appearance, reality is combined with non-reality, leading to confusion, and people create their own virtual spaces, where they reign after their own rules."

The Flight Of The Hawk

On February 12, 2010

Expand your horizons beyond your limits, acting unitary and in harmony with your own ideas, aspirations and beliefs.

Endowed with a fantastic sense of orientation, aware of their powers, leaders start their journey towards the fulfillment of their goals with great courage and enthusiasm, constantly having difficulties to overcome. However, they never beat a retreat. And they are never influenced in their decisions by anyone or anything, but they run along, fearlessly, constantly looking out for their moment of glory. And when their target rises on the horizon, they set about like hawks, forcefully and quickly, on it.

For tenacious and determined, serious and hardworking people, there is only one direction, one path to follow, always forward ! Always forward ! That is why they succeed in taking advantage of the opportunities that come in their life that is why they always succeed in reaching their goals.

Leadership: Do your actions coincide in the form of a controversial situation and a commitment that goes beyond trying to manipulate a reality that is not exactly known?

A year before he succeeded in crossing Greenland by skis, starting from the most inaccessible coast; Fridtjof Nansen published his plan in various magazines. All previous explorers had failed, but he had the unyielding faith that he would succeed. His plan has raised many comments from the distrustful and suspicious opponents of the expedition who wanted to show him by all means that it is almost impossible to accomplish, and that would better have a retreat plan.

You cannot fly if you don't flap your wings. Nansen answered confidently to those who tried to discourage him: „The retreat path is a dangerous obstacle for whoever wishes to fulfill his goal, because for the fulfillment of the goal you must give everything that you can, not waste precious time, looking back, when all you have to do is look forward."

Leadership: How well and to what extent can you control the direction of going within the normal limits of the ratio between what is prime in itself and what is prime for you?

Measure your forces before starting off on an unprecedented journey. What is prime in itself, that reality that you cannot accept as a guarantee of the duty to continue what you've started well, has as a first considerate in all actions a trait of the situation that is modified through man's free will.

And what is prime for you is related to that culture of compromise made with the conviction that you will overcome what is happening to you as a useful lesson of life.

Ambitious leaders know how to put themselves forward until the end of their choices. With the admirable philosophy of the man who doesn't believe anything to be impossible, as long as he pulsates with enthusiasm and courage, making everything with passion, Nansen listened to his inner being and started, by his own "wings", the journey which nobody gave too many hopes. What for many people seemed to be a reason for unrest, a clear suicide attempt, for him, the one with hunter spirit and great will to win, it was only a challenge, a chance to know the world and measure his strengths.

Being a man of unyielding will, who looks at danger like at an opponent in a duel, Nansen assessed all the chances he had, he calculated in advance all the situations, which will be put, and went on to meet the danger, cutting all his ways of retreat. Fully aware of the risk he exposed himself to, he went ahead motivated by sincere belief that he will succeed and thus will spread the news about him in a way to make him memorable.

The reason for a long journey seen as a permanent condition of freedom of thought and action has as a background that feature of life that changes with the end of your comfort zone.

Nansen possessed the art of leadership, always controlling the direction he went on, growing up slowly but steady to his own greatness. He had a lot of courage, but besides courage, he also had a compelling tenacity and will, he was like a force nothing could stand in his way. He concentrated at maximum at what he had to do, proving that, through will, everything is possible. And not only that. He constantly set new goals, heading to new destinations, thus experiencing new challenges and new difficulties. Here is the material of which is made a strong leader.

The flight of the hawk

If Nansen still lived, he probably would have given us the following advice: "Open your wings and fly to fulfill your goals. Don't fear anything. Be brave to fly as high as possible after you learn how to flap your wings. And just like a flock of migrant birds which follow their most experienced sister and which flies the first, ahead of others, you will become a guide for those you lead."

If you want your leadership to get value, learn from Nansen: expand your horizons beyond your limits, acting unitary and in harmony with your own ideas, aspirations and beliefs.

The Flight Towards Height Of The Bird With Broken Wings

On January 01, 2013

Rise towards the dominant area of the "Man" within you, in order to hold the full-control over others around you.

He had nothing more precious in this world than a husband, and this husband had nothing more precious in this world than her, the woman of his dreams. However, between these two similar beings, to which any poet of genius would worship all his odes, between these two loving people, devoted, which would seek, expect, deserve each other until the end of the world, had intervened relentlessly the misfortune. As usual, the source of trouble, the spark that stirs the destroying fire in people's lives, money.

And only for this unfortunate price - the consequence of a bad choice, Llewelyn Moss had to answer before their rightful owners, from the mafia world. Let us confine ourselves by saying that his life was in great danger.

In a café, the eyes of Carla Moss stopped before this image of hope: the sheriff Ed Tom Bell, a brave old man. There are spells, miracles that can awake the faith even when God is incomprehensible. Tom Bell seemed to be the long-awaited miracle. And the presence of this solitary angel was announcing heaven, the release of worries, relieving of any anxieties.

For hours and days, maybe weeks on end, had reigned in her soul - so kind, so gentle and loving, that state of tension, heavy as an autumn haze, almost unbearable, which can be compared only with the unbridled free fall of a bird with broken wings, before the fatal impact with the ground.

Like the poor Lusa, transformed by the wizard Kașnur into an owl and sentenced to life in loneliness, poor Carla Moss had to overcome the limits imposed by her own gloomy thoughts and feelings, by her own transformation which did not give any sense, no longer unified harmoniously her whole being. He just needed a single word to break the curse of her painful fate, and to regain her spiritual freedom. But exactly that magic word had faded from her mind and soul.

Leadership: Is the state in which you judge a certain moment of your life, being isolated from the reality around you, under the coercion of the implacable necessity of living in a representation of the denial of any distinction of value between the role and delusion of your background?

The only thing supposed to be true and steadfast, impossible to change, was her will - this Sesame of the transformation, the magic word that could open to her, the helpless, the cliffs behind which could be glimpsed, friendly the prospect of a change.

"I am the only one who can help you, who can save your husband." Tom Bell told herwith asincere determination that brought her a kind of relief,the touch of the holy wind of change.

And this magic word of the will, fallen like a premonitory thunder from the height of the sky, "I can" the sign of redemption, this simple word, but valuable, as if endowed with the unusual power to breathe life into even a marble statue, it was enough for the appearance of Carla Moss, poorly and sad, scared of the blackest nightmare, to acquire a healthy aspect, bright and filled with life.

An escape from hell, un voyage dans la lumière, a transposition into another reality, alleviating sufferings and curing soul, had the miraculous power to banish from the unfortunate woman, at least temporarily, any inner storm. This woman's background consists of a peaceful pro-life manifesto, shaped over the freedom to choose, the enthusiasm with which she accepted the notion of "love", in no way included the pain of an event requiring immediate attention.

Leadership: Do you treat everything in the terms of a single parameter that results in the meaning of a particular trend reversal moment in the overall picture?

Leadership development is based primarily on a process of change and orientation from the inside to the outside. Anything you can do to enhance what connects you to other people around you, helps you know yourself better and to be constantly in touch with yourself. Once this priority becomes the first nature for you, in your life will happen an amazing thing: you will regain control.

You are accusing yourself of a retrograde mentality if you show yourself tough and intransigent toward others just as that character from a novel by Jown Fowles, whose consciousness has ordered to tell his former partner: "I studied, examined and tested you, I've used you and I've learned from you, it was pleasant and interesting, but now I want to go."

Do you possess the sense of relativity of things, of loss, of adventure? Are you treating everything in terms of a single parameter – the present animated by diversity? For such an approach is not in accordance with the essential requirements of leadership, but only with the terms of a functional present, contorted and myopic.

Leadership: Do you have the most important premise for capitalizing on your own qualities, taking into account the will to be someone else?

To hold control over what you are, over what you feel and over the reactions in the following moments, means first of all to dispose of the most important prerequisite for the refinement of your own qualities. And only these qualities, well-finished and sieved through judgments and emotions, can confer an aura of humanism to leadership - those qualities, embedded in the inner structure of Sheriff Ed Tom Bell: cohesion, coherence, uniformity in feelings.

The only thing that must be true and steadfast, impossible to change, is the will to be someone else, a core of mobilization and impetus to manage the situation: "I can"- this Sesame of the transformation that can remove the cliffs behind which hides friendly, the bright outline of your personality.

Are you a person, who has the gift of transmitting hope and reliance in the hearts of people around you; are you a symbol of human values? Remember that you are the long-awaited miracle of your transformation that is proven only if will change the world around you.

Leadership: Are you what you are due to what you can be in a situation where the notion of "reality" has the connotation of social degradation and the return to the anonymity of the inability to reinvent yourself?

The role that you assume, as a leader, involves an essential reference to that entity, called your own Ego, or better said to the possibility to be someone powerful - that cannot be managed than only through reason and realism, but also through a close cooperation of your qualities and abilities of a "Man" who can change the emotional states of others around you.

Are you a great man, with a deep inclination to do good, or one that protects the inner center of his universe by not recognizing the events that can bear you on the verge of fatality?

A prolonged sprint towards the great performance, towards the finish line. A constant and well-dosed struggle in efforts and positive reactions, the basic ingredients of your own becoming, which have the appropriation to reveal another horizon, another real value to which to aspire, as a first necessary frame of your existence – of your real nature, of your authentic being.

In this respect, it deserves attention the statement made by the German poet and writer, Heinrich Heine: "Each particular man is a world that is born and dies along with him."

This "world" is nothing but the product of a deep change, the essence of your own becoming, and the result of attempting to rise above your own mediocrity. Not like a man that is categorizing his fellows, but rather as a man, who seeks to take out all the best of them - that unpolished diamond which is part of their nature, and which can be translated as: "I am what I am due to what I can be."

However, there where the meanders of the facts are particularly intricate, there where the values are hidden deep and difficult to remove, where the appearances are uncertain, the mirror of your mood states should be of the purest crystal, shining strongly, helping you to overcome limitations or blockages of any kind.

Leadership addresses the need to reconcile yourself with all the dimensions of life and reality that exist simultaneously, condition each other, allowing you to recognize the difference between what you feel about someone and what motivates you to endure the experiences of your weaknesses and the freedom to choose.

The Flight Towards Height Of The Bird With Broken Wings prefigures an attempt to rise above the pain, above your thoughts and emotions, a regaining of freedom only through a full-joining, with all your being, by the chance of change, induced by others. It designates the continuous battle, despite the impasses and adverse events, towards the peak of the desired performance.

To be able to hold the full-control over others around you, you have to climb towards the dominant area of the "Human" within you. Take away the hard shell that surrounds the perimeter of your being, and see who you really are. Remove the core from you.

You could be an "angel descended from heaven" or "a bird with broken wings in free fall". Or, at worst, you could be an unseen character, who observes the all how they put on stage the show called "existence" without taking part in its display, and without getting involved, without making any effort - a passive man which like a star loses his shine, and leads his existence, fully anonymous.

 Note: "No Country for Old Men (2007)"

 Note: Lusa – the character in the work of Wilhelm Hauff, the daughter of the Indian maharajah. Transformed by the wizard Kașnur into an owl. The curse could be broke, only if would be found someone, unhindered, to take her as a wife. And only the caliph Rashid from Baghdad, transformed in his turn in the owl, broke the curse: "Yes" I want you to be my wife.

The Fluid Principle Of Concealed Science

On August 25, 2018

You cannot direct a whole world in a new direction of evolution unless you change the major coordinates of the science that you place your personal image on.

I have always been preoccupied with the deep meanings of things, their most surprising properties, trying to put them in a wider perspective to prove my expressive autonomy in unrivaled art. Like the great chemists, I have found a formula of integration into the configuration of a boundless world, a mysterious territory that radically changes the concept of identity, a high place where you exist only through erudition, clairvoyance, interpretative competence, inscrutable spirit, profundity and refinement.

The invisible matter, fermented in the conditions given by the active complex of epistemological elements, the controlled dynamics of a reflexivity that demands the need for intellectual rigor and emotional coherence, which is meant to be constructive by mixing divine things with natural things, sacred with what is profane, all of these are the "red activity" of completing an artistic search.

Of course, you will ask me if I have drawn lessons from the examples of others in the sense of devoting myself to untiring and all-encompassing supervision of the sources of other thoughts, or how I have managed to preserve my ability to look at everything through the glasses of subjectivity despite the color of time, the feeling of the existence of a great absence or of passing pleasures.

I can tell you that the influence of the surrounding world, the pressure of social constraints in the so-called moral consciousness, manifests in particular on reactions in the state of unacceptability of the too far-sighted views on the relations between life, creation and story, which sometimes prove to be illusions with no core in the use of means of literary expression.

In other words, if you trust in the opinions of others, you will not be able to imagine life without them, so you will remain captive in their reality, you will experience the experience of their journey without using your own reason, intuition and experience, to assert your individuality and to move away from contemporary conformism.

Leadership: Do you integrate your life experience into the core knowledge of the WHOLE by capitalizing on the relationship between the anticipation of a new direction of art and the realities of a world diagnosed with the Ego's rising dependence syndrome?

As is often the case, especially given the tendency to make science understandable to all, in order to make it popular, even if the effect of methodical pressures on the textual plan becomes sensitive to the reactions resulting from the breakdown of the asset "FIRST SIGHT" I constantly hit the realities of the same world you are exploring and looking for new forms and ideas.

But I cannot accept the terrible imaginings of too general theories, the shriveled shadows fluttering on the surface of the memory space of the time elapsed from the trinity, along with the already exhausted possibility of the events that occurred in the logical sequence of a text dropped backwards into the avant-garde literature.

In the immediate vicinity of the most desirable teachings, as useful as it is hard to learn, all the sacrifices afflicted with stoicism resemble the aesthetic fixation of a story in the minds of men. A process explained by changing the complex structure, which determines the decrease or increase of the decomposition reaction of the already-created, meaning that of the constitutive components of a cognoscible reality.

Just like the ancient alchemists who have started to establish a philosophy of narrative form and formula, making numerous experiments on the distillation of fermented plaque, reaching to the strengthening of the covalent bond between the reactive intermediaries of life and the emotional intensifiers, I have succeeded in taking shelter under the authority of an artist who unlimitedly extends his concepts of intelligence and creativity.

My ego is in everything I write and is never overwhelmed by the nuances of a true passion for transforming the sand from the golden hourglass.

Leadership: Can you ensure the accessibility of a copyrighted work through an interrogation on the meaning of your own personality validated by the occasions of being at the center of a triumphant avant-garde?

A good friend, an IT professional, praised me this morning for innovation in the context of this changing world. He clearly told me, but in a way that only artists can convey, in the immediate vicinity of a speech expressing the taste for beauty, quality and originality:

- Nicu, you have reached such a high level that everyone has come to envy you. With your web application launched under your personal brand: www.neculaifantanaru.com, you have demonstrated sufficient capacity to implement all the benefits of technology in terms of programming language, design and content. The only question that deserves attention is this: where are you willing to venture into the search for new dimensions of the cognitive act?

How did you manage to learn so many things and apply them so well without the help of anyone?

Like a chemist trying to determine the solid particle motion calculation in the different forms of the substance, you knew how to use the most chosen 21st century science like nobody else, combining the programming languages: html, php, java, with design rules, SEO, CSS, data analysis, content marketing, text processing and so on and so forth. You knew how to combine them cautiously, without pride. You are also considered a master in the use of the "Regex" syntax. In fact, your app has been around the world and it is becoming more accessible every day by tens of thousands of users each month.

And not just that. You have proved an almost divine skill, but show a fine taste of beauty as only artists are capable. Certainly, you were the best student the Alexandru Ioan Cuza University has ever had, since it was established up to this day. But you were an autodidact, a book luminary who had the holy thirst for embracing the artistic ideas of: "depth of space", "consciousness as a state of matter", "living nature" or "illusion of reality".

Leadership: Do you lean on the meaning of your perceived existence as particular information that highlights the essence of an encyclopedic validation?

With great mastery, with patience and intuition, you have outgrown all your colleagues, all generations before you, and there is no teacher to prove more skill in using science, information technology, branding, marketing, storytelling, etc. And now, in the 21st century, the notion of "Leadership" has become unanimously synonymous with your personal brand:

"Neculai Fântânaru".

It's a fair pride, not arrogance on your part. An important requirement from your conscience, the essence of metaphysically valid thinking through which you give the others a bit of you, the primordial landmark of an understanding that begins with "I know what I can do" and goes on with "I have the means" which links the opportunity to proceed, on your own, to reevaluate some varied aspects of poetic work.

You knew how to charm the world with the grace of your eloquence, because of the scholarly-writer's preoccupations, the talent that was given to the engineering work in the field of computer science, the most sincere erudition you put in the service of cordiality, the need to understand what is beyond the usual understanding that the whole activity of all teachers fades away from your visibility in the world due to the Internet.

You have certainly been favored by the encyclopedic knowledge assimilated throughout life, contributing to the formation of a multilaterally developed personality.

Let us not forget that the science to which your name relates, the directions of an overly delicious and troubling culture, like a lantern illuminating in the darkness of a confused and complex world, is entrusted hopefully to the idea of "imprinting" in collective memory of a novel way of encompassing and advancing a prodigious doctrine.

While some are propagandizing the reputation of an institution for personal interest, without having any other lever to make themselves known, you have become known all over the world through your personal brand. When people want to know news from the field of leadership, they do not search the internet for a certain university, a certain faculty, a certain professor. They only search for "Neculai Fântânaru".

Your name, synonymous with the great science of leadership, has become more important and more known worldwide than any university. That's why your value is really BIG. Most likely, the meaning of your existence is equivalent to an uninterrupted exploration of thinking between awareness of self-worth and evolution-oriented knowledge management experience.

Leadership is that "Big Picture" that responds to the "So What" of a Brand that synthesizes in a deep and powerful spirit the essence of a science without boundaries, but one that is hard to master.

The Fluid Principle Of Concealed Science applies only to a branding process that falls between two major coordinates: the self-image, compatible with the authority of an artist who unlimitedly extends his concepts of intelligence and creativity, and the highest teaching extracted from what you live through a revolutionary art.

The Flux’s Source Of Pure Substance

Use all your actives and all the needed resources for developing science, so that you never fall pray to abjection and regress.

A very important factor that has contributed to the perpetuation of my scientific line was the fear of falling prey to abjection and regress, a form of abandon holding me back because I could not turn this emotion into a constructive one. Innovation kept me in a permanent strain, mobilizing all my attention, forcing me to use all my actives and my immediate inspiration and creativity resources in a crescendo of inner feelings, of emotional interrogations.

But innovation, the finite element that could be experimentally determined based on the systematic observation of transformation, both in unity and balance, of codes and symbols, no matter their field of use, is based mainly on the relations settled between two or more entities. My mind couldn't keep up with other obligations, because I was dividing my attention in nearly equal percentages between the entities that I struggled to come to meet and control.

Similar to the hero of a well-known novel, I was focusing my sight on two close things, and then I would notice the common characteristics with the same flowing gesture, without ever stopping. At first, the equivalences between these two entities weren't rising to my expectations. And initially, the struggle to find similarities raised a huge doubt. But interpreting details in terms of observational selection and confusion between correlation and causality often gave birth to ideas and theories in eager rivalry interesting.

Leadership: Are you committed to being loyal to yourself and building a relationship that supports truth in a demonstration of the need to assert a science that will later be called "metaphysics"?

Maybe out of need for adrenaline, or out of the unusual curiosity of trying something new, maybe out of the tendency to make comparisons and objective evaluations, I always managed to make a step forward. It wasn't a considerable effort that came from a freely assumed obligation, but a commitment in the long run. A start-ups accelerator, the source of a pure, eternal and incorruptible substance flux that permanently integrated new particles of vital substance – essential to maintaining the optimum level of simulating creativity.

I needed some time to find the thread in the labyrinth of the interpretative thinking's steps, according to the analogical and contiguous relations, because no Ariadne had given it to me. Thus, I managed to understand science and the importance of its experimental side.

And science is nothing else but the fruit of a mental effort in order to achieve an understanding of the relation in countless hypotheses, calculi, suppositions, approximations and estimations, uncertainties, preconceptions, equivalencies, augmentations, extensions, extrapolations, probabilities – and their respective combinations.

The metaphysics that began to crystallize on the horizon was a sort of ground for the empirical reality that we observe from the affective point of view, designated by the concept of being part of a totality of a being enclosed within itself through a reiteration of experiences, giving me the foundations and causes of establishing a truth called "the coherence of the complexity of being someone else".

Does your leadership meet the eligibility conditions of the excellence created from a sort of a multifaceted mindset in which the affective and the cognitive work together to create an artistic work?

What is the most important factor that contributes to the perpetuation of you scientific line? Does innovation keep you in a permanent strain? Does the tendency of making comparisons and objective evaluations help you make a step forward towards the experimental side of science?

One of the conclusions I have gradually reached, given the facts of a compelling consolidations of those "knowledge sectors" found in my area of potential, and that could closely interest as an act of inspired closeness, of understanding and accepting the results of one's own research, is that only a category of individuals are able to reach an advanced level of insight into leadership.

In order for leadership to fulfill the eligibility requirements of mastery, the individual has to execute the basic operations and obtain some viable results – from putting into practice that knowledge. Only by training your thinking, by staking your curiosity, you will achieve the two essential requirements of your development: creating superiority in a certain aspect or in a constructive approach and perpetuating your scientific line until reaching a point when it will be able to transcend any obstacles.

Under these conditions, building your own start-ups accelerator becomes a necessity, a determinant factor in this pretentious evolution that deserves being fully savored and fructified. The start-ups accelerator has to permanently integrate new particles of vital "substance" for the synthesis of the elements that will encompass the foundation of creating and maintaining one's own value. It doesn't represent anything else but a generation process for new ideas, their development or refinement, so that leadership becomes better defined and much more sophisticated.

The artistic work that arose from a sort of multilateral thinking, in which the affective and the cognitive collaborated superbly, was my connection to a new dimension of science characterized primarily by trying to fit the nature of my being in the conceptual patterns offered by assessing reality at a new level: trying to make science more tangible, to give it a more human touch.

Leadership: Can you ensure your full value by transforming scientific matter into a different formulation once you venture into making a new version of the application commonly called "human being"?

Someone said that self-education makes a man be what he can be. Exactly. The true thinkers and practitioners of leadership are, for that matter, deeply united in their educational steps, being concerned with equal intensity of finding a higher meaning of their own potential. Their efforts are pointed especially towards strengthening the knowledge sectors that could ensure them a full value, through sensitive and pretentious methods of transforming matter that can stimulate progress in the field.

So, innovation keeps them in a permanent strain, mobilizing all their attention, forcing them to use all their actives and their immediate inspiration and creativity resources in order to find new provision sources for their own knowledge capital, necessary to the maximization of the expected results.

The transformation of scientific matter into a human immanence could have provided me with the value of a man who can make the impossible possible, one who can think at a higher level through a more significant proportion of the emotional self.

A fulfillment based on exploring what is happening to you is a mystical journey of spiritual ascension into the realm of truth in the vicinity of a world that makes you feel like you are someone else.

The flux's source of pure substance is nothing else but the result of the individual work undergone by the leader, who, throughout time, enriched his knowledge by using the experience of his predecessors and contemporaries, as well as his own experiences. The result was to give birth to an inedited, intelligible "substance" with practical applications that can be transmitted to others because it's unanimously understood and accepted.

If you want to be a leader whose professionalism is doubtful, then use all your actives and resources necessary to developing your science to lead. Don't fall prey to abjection and regress.

The Force Of Redefining Personal Identity

On August 27, 2014

Take a giant step towards a new science, placing yourself under the influence of the force of redefining the horizons of a higher reality.

I stood in front of a path leading towards a new science. I owed everything to alternative practice in the area of researching the fundamentals of "creative intelligence", of which, now, I could only affirm but one thing: he who wisely appropriates this science becomes himself a sphere of the transforming work of God into the world

Still, I must confess that at first, science was not exactly my main concern. It was merely a process of searching for something yet undefined. One could say that I only loved science from a particular purpose. That of detaching myself a bit from a world full of hypocritical patterns, of the so-called "herd", resisting the feeling of belonging to an empty space, devoid of personality. Undoubtedly, I was dominated by the same founded motivation with which a painter seeks the plasticity of the expression of an idea he wishes expressed.

It was a sort of a burden of a mind subjected to a heightened tension, asking of itself to be assumed, and somehow eliminated, before its potential for expansion moved towards negative values. A suffering due to which I discovered myself as being different from what I was, deep in the bosom of an entity that extends beyond the boundaries of the admissible, under the influence of a force of redefining personal identity. I tended to believe, with due respect to any mediator of science, that within my own mind, a true ocean was hidden, subjected to the tides and agitated by periodic storms. I felt that I was collapsing in turbulent waves.

Unconventionally, I have entered the functional block of unlimited thought, which fascinated through its rarely meth depth, through the complexity of its approaches, updated and designed in the manner in which science was supported by the power of imagination. Incurable, bias had often laid traps for me during this risky expansion of my individuality, being tempted to frame this puzzled phenomenon into many categories of manifestations that seemed secondary. Such as: "the abuse of power."

Leadership: Do you support the acceleration and capitalization of scientific results towards a new consciousness that links the variable of a single transformation into the reality that is revealed to you as a question addressed to itself?

The progress you achieve in the area of leadership is proportional to the time you invest in rethinking your personal identity, supporting the acceleration and exploitation of scientific results towards the direction of a new consciousness. It is that elevated consciousness of man that researches his self, through the perpetual kneading of the intelligence placed in service to creation, finding its unitary doing only under the halo of imagination.

Only through a process of searching for something still undefined, as if you fill a void inside of you, can you realized that breaking of habit of thinking that, in turn, particularly cancels any attempt to put behind everything related to pragmatic realism.

One question is required to be asked without delay: what is your preoccupation as a leader that can fuse your sense of belonging to something broader than the world you are in? The man who tends to perfection, the leader of the present and the future, taking into account the probability of losing himself into an impersonal absolute, will be forced to other methods of self-assessment as well – but especially to a supple acceptance of that "something else", so categorically denied by the paragraphs of science.

A scientific result that changes the horizons of understanding the world is the expression of an unlimited thought, loaded by imagination with new meanings of understanding over the situations through which you pass, from which lies the force of interpretation of the answer to the question: up to which point can you leap with an idea without feeling in any way cut off by the fixed rules of an assumed obligation?

A result can be considered "scientific" because it first indicates what kind of facts should be gathered to make a finding, then because it only looks at the frame in which the solution is to be sought.

Leadership: Do you express your attachment to that area of self-seeking that only gives you fulfillment if the struggle between imagination and rationality is taken in the name of a superior being?

An entire ocean will unravel, in its infinite greatness, in front of the rest of your life. A number of pluses and minuses will offset the lack of a possibility of expanding the production capabilities of a new platform of knowledge. But at the same time, will have to lead a fierce battle between fantasy and rationality in modern thought.

If you want to turn science into a basis for leadership development, over the course of your life, do not limit yourself to passing beyond unanimously accepted thinking, but first try to express your attachment to that area of self-search that confers fulfillment. Try to express your identity through the constant persistence of the modeling and settings in the future versions of personal creation. Only so will you gain the status of "reformer."

Find and strengthen your identitary power, for only it gives you the strength to survive the changes that others have imposed, or that you yourself impose. This power is primarily aimed at winning the trophy at the border between the imaginary and the real, open to a new way of approaching the relationship between what you are able to morally bear by your attachment to a new reality and what are you able to become by describing this reality framed in the parameters of the feeling of belonging to something "higher".

The horizon of a higher reality can only be attained by expanding depth in analyzing the phenomenon of life from the point of view of an intelligence that encountered the school of thought at the right time, always feeding on "something else" in the vicinity of a creation that, incontestably, leaves no one indifferent.

The status of a higher being can be won through the privileged attention that you give to the sense of belonging to something larger than the world you are in.

The Force Of Redefining Personal Identity reflects the tendency to detach yourself from the anonymous mass, having the ability to create something unique, memorable and accepted – am expression of a desire for self-improvement – advancing through innovative thinking to the highest peaks of progress. And the power of creative intelligence that refers to reaching that individuality created with and through the science of intelligent management, impacting those who follow you in achieving a common goal.

The best teacher in leadership is life experience, much more important in shaping personality than professional experience.

The Forgotten Holiness Of Small Things

On March 18, 2021

Great works impress not only by their unity, but by the banality with which they manage to open themselves to the sharpest eyes.

Yesterday I stopped at one of the antique shops on Lăpușneanu Street, a fact that I consider a gram of common sense for any mind that opens to the mystery of Varkishes, the Gift of the Gods, the source of Higher Wisdom. As always, in a corner of the antique shop was placed an older cardboard box containing only books at the price of 1 RON.

But be careful ! PAY CLOSE ATTENTION: it matters how the information is transmitted, how the information is linked to matter, how the information is simplified, how the information is produced in an experiment that designates the exact opposite of the probability of occurrence of this event. Brilliantly structured, brilliantly written !

Here you will find everything you need to understand the true chords of stylistic analysis. You have levers. You have anchors. You have identifiers. You have references. Delimiters. Substitutes. Landmarks. Everything that is necessary for the act of artistic creation. And everyone overlooks this book. And no one reads it... And I'm not telling you what it's called, what it looks like, or who wrote it, just to learn to pay attention to the (seemingly) trivial things that go unnoticed by many. The author is unknown... and will remain unknown.

Leadership: Can the aftermath of your discovery reflect your being in every little detail of a form of thinking located at the level of the "Too Far To Be Saved" concept?

In fact, there are a lot of people who look without seeing what is not very visible anyway, and if it were seen, they would still not see or understand what is hiding the sight of true faith. This phenomenon under the influence of banalities is called ignorance, that continuity of neglect in the face of the value of a polished diamond waiting to be discovered, but no one discovers it.

That's the way it is. The most valuable people in your life, the ones who really matter, are not the top ranked CEOs or VIPs. But it is precisely those who understand and succeed in making the connection between necessity and chance.

In fact, some people have their deep line of sight of the essential under the polymorphic appearance of an inter-world at the crossroads between science and art, being endowed with that ability of painters to make an x-ray of the essential within the work of art. And they go with an invincible consistency on this line, being in full accordance with the laws of a Platonic mysticism, which means that they have a special logic in terms of appreciating the exteriority of things and the background of things that redefine the relationship with chance.

Truly. Books are like people: you can't read them all unless you feel them somewhere inside, if there's something subtle to them that attracts you. Or, in another case, the most valuable man in your life, the real superhero, might be just that unknown guy pulling your sleeve a few seconds before you get hit by a car. Rest assured that Mihai Bendeac will never save you from drowning, Andra Măruță will never help you, and the true values of your cognitive system will never be identified by Smiley in your place.

And, indeed, the most important lessons about life, about creation, about the universe, you will learn from ordinary things, from ordinary people who, like ordinary books, almost always go unnoticed, but appear suddenly in the key moments of your life.

Whereas the interior of these books, if you come to grasp it with the force of the mind, you will feel that it also reads you through the force of universal attraction. It captures you through a constant of spiritual light (the soul enslaved to the bonds of matter that ignores the boundaries of space and time), appealing to the subtlety with which the artist immortalizes his most mysterious impressions, giving his work the value of intimate confessions that become eternal in existence, at the same time, in infinity.

Leadership: Can you avoid a degradation in the character of a revelation about yourself by putting yourself in front of an abstract reality that you can recognize when you meet it with your eyes, but can you feel it as being what you have always lacked?

This is the rare cosmogony of books: they are constantly written, constantly rethought, constantly poured in the direction of understanding small and large things, constituting the inherent logic of a theory springing from an internal (or universal) coherence. It's an older idea that I should insist on. Just as many times, man flees after eternity and does not find it precisely because eternity consists in keeping organized and easily accessible the little things that the world ignores.

We're talking about the great victory of the small things, not taken into account by the big people. It is about the forgotten holiness of the little things that gives the comprehensive and correct image of the "Great Work". Holiness meaning that selection of things, of events, of life experiences that you do not want to part with and that become in time a reflection of your personality in the movement of a free, expressive, authentic universe.

The same observation was noticed by the art critic Victor Ieronim Stoichiță, being founded by the medieval tradition represented by Vincențiu Beauvais which complicated things with the usual ease of the time:

"Especially in those days, attention was directed to the original sin which will always have three causes, namely: ignorance, greed, weakness. To these react three divine forces: sapientia(intellectual force), virtus(moral force) and necessitas(practical force) These correspond to three human activities: science (theory), ethics (practice) and art (mechanics)."

Here is the meaning of this remark: any existential cause corresponds to a force that reacts with the same intensity, and to any intellectual activity corresponds an action of training, information, formation and acquisition of knowledge. And if we succeed in bridging the two deterministic patterns of orientation in the world (existential causes and intellectual activities), we may be able to move forward with an invincible ambition to find and understand sacred things.

A visionary directs his existential approaches towards the authenticity of a world built in those works of knowledge that are not valued directly, but through a kind of intuition of the incidental.

The Forgotten Holiness Of Small Things lies behind the connection between necessity and chance, a fact that some completely deny, and still others are far from the time when everything will be much easier to understand and accept.

Significant fact. Without a gram of lucid foray into a new world, the wisdom that feeds the feeling of the being (unchanged by the effects of modern life) will never fold into a box of vain minds that do not devote time to personal development.

The Foundation Of A Future Orientation

On March 04, 2012

Nature is far ahead of man, and we must understand that understanding it requires a certain effort to become aware of our position in relation to what might be called "the landmark of a new direction of evolution."

One day, 18 albatrosses were captured on a lost island in the vastness of the Pacific, Midway. Taken to various places, the nearest place to Midway was 2,000 km away, the furthest 7,000 km, they were released. They all arrived home in just a few days, the one left at the farthest point covering the distance with an average of 510 km per day. A performance obtained every year, under normal conditions. Albatrosses roam the Pacific Ocean all winter and then return to the same island, in the same place where they build their nest, less than a meter and a half from the old one.

*How do they orient themselves? Experiments and birds caught on various islands in the Pacific or Atlantic have removed one of the hypotheses that ground landmarks played a key role. In the 1960s, the so-called astronomical theory was adopted as a compliment. According to some authors, the major element was the solar arc, the apparent trajectory of the sun. Weren't bird guidance systems more accurate and finer than the most successful electronic devices?

Leadership: Can you choose a good orientation toward research and knowledge of nature, and be honest in that orientation when you turn your knowledge into a stage of spiritual perfection?

When we talk about evolution, we refer to the landmark of a new position in the sphere of human knowledge, so that man can produce a new version of the vision regarding not only the value of one's personality, but rather the value of the experience of knowing the world.

In fact, man's positioning in the process of observing the particular phenomena of the world, highlights the version of the evolutionary personality in an orientation based on another landmark, namely his ability to act to adapt to changes in the relationship with the world and with the universe occasioned by the personalization of the creative process. Rather, it is about positioning man in the face of the experience of modeling the thinking he proposes to the world.

The spiritual is closely linked to an evolutionary creative thinking, it is an optimal interaction between what you are able to discover and what you are eager to become. So, let us rely on science and creativity to offer life, the world and the universe, those memorable and useful experiences of discovering the wonders of nature.

A creator progresses by constantly improving his orientation. The fact that someone has discovered how birds guide themselves, creating future aircraft guidance systems according to their flight model, is a fact that designates the tendency of humanity to get out of a circle imposed by the observance of self-imposed limits, inertia and obscurantism.

Vision is produced by a wide field of knowledge regarding the observation and comparison of the various forms of regulation of nature, by the forms of interpretation of the environment. And the value of creation is closely linked to a vision that promotes the long-term redirection of knowledge, strengthening faith in a new beginning, in a new way of conceiving the philosophy that completes the world and obtains it as a Universe. If a person suffers from the "compulsion to not support the practices of the field of creation", of course he will not be able to observe the changes that nature endures over time.

The stage of spiritual perfection is destined for the optimal interaction between what you are able to discover and what you are eager to become, so as to accomplish the divine will to complete what nature could only render incompletely.

The Foundation Of Leadership

On April 04, 2019

Take time to discern reality and your own thoughts to increase your level of self-acceptance and motivation.

I still look at your photograph whenever I'm alone. Tell me, to which realities or fictions within you, to which image within me responds this suave face with only dream and feeling, only emotion, interiorization and pathos? And of course, that is how Camil saw me sometimes. I think this constant current is called thinking.

I think of the present as if I were living in the past, with that pain that makes me totally forget the reality of the age that I managed at some point to fight through the universe of dreams, focusing on the aspirations of self-satisfaction that had become the supreme criterion of my existence. Once passed, the moment has no way of returning. I was wrong. I still feel myself trapped in a novel by Andre Maurois, as if he writes about me: "Ah, I only wanted to isolate myself to read, write, to live the life of a writer, which I can inhabit with the characters of my imagination."

But back then I understood nothing of the life of a writer, especially when he is desperate that he cannot isolate himself, exasperated that he cannot devote himself to philosophy.

*Writers love their freedom; they love their craft. Maybe they need more love, more models... what seems to be the source of the most terrible despair. I am always sad, but this can only be seen at times, captive in a life of condemnation. Yes, I want to write a book. Just one. About me. And maybe about happiness. About people who want to be happy. I did not find out why. But I hope that by writing I will understand and maybe I will get a better understanding of myself.**

Leadership: Can you prove your belonging to a creation that you have acquired during your own life experiences, in correspondence with representing a previously formed image about how to get closer to what really matters to you?

The decision to write is the first step towards self-knowledge, because everything you tell about yourself gets the outline of a creation based on a rich experience, straightforward and long-lasting. It is a process of reflection on your experiences, saying to yourself: "This is how I see myself even when I do not agree with everything I have experienced."

Affiliation to an act of creation such as writing deepens the relationship between what happens to you and how you interpret every aspect of your being. The first reality of self-awareness, in accepting a particularity of content residing from the production of states of emotional silence, becomes for an exceptional being an adaptable concept of personal reinvention.

It means that you are captive in a space of accumulations of questions and uncertainties, in a present undefined by perceptions, but you manage to give a spiritual meaning to the beliefs that lead you to suffering. Here, leadership, for which emotions do not have to be eliminated because they help guide and direct behavior, gains a self-control valence, a source of power to master one's destructive impulses and adaptation to a changing situation.

Writing expresses the hope of a mental relaxation, an acceptance of everything that means life from the perspective of a lucidity that can no longer tolerate emotional drifting. What you write about what you feel is the image of a changing world, even if you do not always take part in its events. And the ability to continually improve yourself is related to this form of knowledge resulting from conflicting representations of the possible and impossible to bear, which alternate between what isolates you and what inspires you.

To focus on a previously formed image about how to be closer to what really matters to you means to pursue an overall view of the most important areas of your life that have determined you to be genuine.

People who have reached the highest stages of perfection know that the fruit of enlightenment can occur most often through meditation. Or through the creative act that takes place in this state of awareness directed inwardly, when you submit to a different reality (a sort of process of understanding emotions that overwhelm you), supported only by the relationships between information and completely different explanations.

Dimitrie Alexandru Sturdza, Romania's Prime Minister between 1895 – 1909, once said a very important thing: "Man must constantly feel himself living in the middle of time in which he exerts his action, discerning the possible from the impossible, the feasible from what is unfeasible for the moment in which he lives."

But this moment, in the midst of which reality does it best fit in order to represent a true turning point? In a reality experienced effectively or in an imagined reality? For both the first one, as well as the second one, are used by the great sages to store preferences vis-à-vis their inner peculiarities, vis-à-vis what is true or false, vis-à-vis what is intangible, vis-à-vis what they can achieve or show to the surrounding world.

The emergence of a high self-esteem occurs when you identify yourself with the image of a creation that takes the form of a revelation about life that is attributed to events loaded with much more emotion than you are able to express in words.

If you sprinkle in what you try to represent a few grams of uncertainty, the assumption could be made that, regardless of what the present moment contains, you can give birth to new revelations about yourself. You will be able to find new perspectives and meanings of life, a new order, a new beginning formulation, more suitable and beneficial for your development if you surpass the limit of immediate knowledge, learning to see yourself from the absence of what you are.

Absence is a passing to a different level of consciousness, to a different level of understanding and perceiving the complexity of your own dimension. Both in the living reality, as well as in the imagine reality at any point you can perform a search that will return new landmarks for personal development, and new perspectives of the world.

Leadership is the product of your ability to see reality as revealed by thinking specifically tailored to guide you in actions that sometimes appear to be of little importance, but which are loaded with much pride, with much dignity and with much spiritual warmth.

This Is The Foundation Of Leadership: to learn to understand better from the prism of what is happening to you, through the looking-glass of memory, consciousness, joy, or existential anxiety, because you will always keep in touch with that reality of the inner existence that you cannot deny, cannot avoid, and one you have the obligation of enduring by accepting certain compromises.

The only motivation that makes you move forward with your head held high after experiencing the ups and downs of life is to teach others how to look at the thread of life from another perspective.

The Foundations Of The Architecture Of Becoming

On January 03, 2014

Develop your awareness of situating yourself above others, projecting yourself above what you think you are.

Any good child, paradoxically stated Eisenstein, breaks objects, loosens dolls' bellies or disassembles clocks to see what is inside them. Unlike these "good" kids, I was a bad child, precisely because I had done nothing of the sort. Perhaps, this is precisely why I had to become a director.

*And this is because the so-called well-behaved children exhaust, within that period, the restlessness of curiosity, primitive cruelty and aggressive assertion. Unconsumed then, these tendencies erupt later. Instead of the disassembled clock appears the passion for researching the mechanism of creation, damaging objects is replaced with irreverence for authority.

Leadership: Do you fulfill the conditions of forming a new intellectual authority by accelerating the expansion of consciousness, setting the place of a "view beyond sight" on the scale of a more comprehensive reality than you can perceive at first glance?

Leadership can be associated with a way of delineating yourself from the narrow world of those without outstanding merits, through a new enhancing of self-awareness, projected over the circumstances of triggering the need of surpassing your existential and intellectual inertia. Consciousness is the measure of the truth that you acknowledge about yourself as compared to the evaluations and performances of others on the scale of a merit-based respect hierarchy, on the scale of a rarely available career, from where authenticity and personal becoming into the community's system of values transpires.

A simple, well-used use of knowledge does not prove that you have avoided the threat to the essence of your nature, your authentic being, because no matter how creative you are, no matter how creative you present yourself before the world up to a certain point, it is quite possible that you will not be able to pass the threshold of "self-sufficiency". The identity you will address, as a product of interaction with the reasoning that craves to bring light to all that is falsely presented by others, through the distinction between the models of innovation that favors your leadership qualities the most, is in fact a perpetual seeking of the self that begins with hoarding knowledge and transforming it into a product of creation.

A view beyond a first glance has, as a basic consideration, a kind of intuitive understanding of changes at a macro-existential level. A truly valuable person is distinguished by the ability to see through human actions and to discover hidden motifs and meanings of a path that might profit from its essential characteristics of a modest career beginning.

The merit of triumph in any field is due to the skill of enduring that "pause" that exists between the tendency to not pay attention to the reasons of being among other people and the opportunity to discover your talent at a time that takes you by surprise.

You cannot open any window to a new horizon, by introducing during the search of a new identity the idea of materializing prominent thoughts, if your curiosity doesn't reach a warning level.

You will be able to regain your direction of travel and development only in the degree of understanding of what you really are, starting from the first steps towards performance. But especially depending on what the product of interiority represents, which irradiates everything you are in your deepest truth. The product of interiority is a combination of positive factors of lasting effects over the restoration of the mental and emotional balance that allows you to move forward in life.

The parameters that fix or define your identity, essential in designing new constructive forms and structures of getting ahead, are in constant evolution and transformation, indirectly determined by that personal painting of achievements that goes into play the moment a set of conditions is met. The first condition is to recognize the urgency of being on point in what regards understanding of the scientific foundation that supports you on your journey towards excellence. The second condition is to stay away from the effect of negative thinking, such as "What is broken cannot be fixed."

To develop your awareness of situating yourself above others, viewing the relationship of utility between what you choose to become and what you have become by making decisions that influence the existential route, means to believe in your true essence and, by merging with it, valuing your qualities and knowledge in your field of interest.

Leadership is the merit that you attach in a significant way to the process of evolution that begins with what you do not like and finishes with what we call "enlightenment".

The Foundations Of The Architecture Of Becoming are the reference elements that contribute to your way of being, through a differentiation of the constructivism and ingenuity made available for supporting the decision of changing the rules of determining the personal value that doesn't work. In order to find your true purpose in the world, first filter your practice of life by developing all traits or characteristics, constant over time.

These fundamentals are: disinterest shown for normality and the greatness of shining in a special combination of intuition and intelligence.

The Fruit From The Tree Of Knowledge

On August 15, 2013

Create new bridges between leadership and science, so as to be the master of a complex mind and free thinking.

"God's Angel told me in my dream that if I wanted to acquire the perfect science as I had always wanted, I must climb in the world of the Moon, where I would find, in front of Adam's Paradise, the Tree of Knowledge. And as soon as I will taste its fruit, my soul will be dominated by all the truths that a being is capable of."

Countless of times I had the occasion to search deeper within the meaning of these words, whose interpretation I knew best. Of course, my point of view was supported by well-grounded and well-balanced arguments. This important part of the dream of the great philosopher Cyrano de Bergerac, as a supplement for the immune system of my scientific thinking, completed the matter crystallization process out of which alchemy was born and spread its wings.

It is uncontested that this kind of thinking focused on meanings and sub-meanings that require deciphering, that must be measured before placing it in the total amount of positive development processes, requires a certain superiority in knowledge. That I had frequently tried to access, approach, and promote better than anyone else. And if I wanted to tie the relation with science, I had to keep in mind the essential elements of keeping constant the creation and usage conditions for the Work's primary matter.

A certain prudence in dividing matter according to the rules of weights and philosophical measures was required. Or, as my master would say, a certain measure in the ratio between philosophical ideas versus practical reality was required. It was hard to understand myself that way. For a long time, this routine of encrypted thinking, with metaphoric and symbolic connotations, remained uncontrolled. It dominated me. Then, I understood everything.

Leadership: Can you capitalize on your experience of knowledge by extracting the logical conclusions from the fundamental truths that you know can always be endowed with a meaning different from the regular one, without betraying an intention to exteriorize spiritual states?

The truths that I refused to believe before, those truths that could have been covered by clarity and understood only by the scientific mind, were somewhat staggered, seeming hard to digest at first glance. Between truths there was always a new coordinative bond, accomplished by interlocking evidence, conclusions and learnings that participated to my training and accomplishment.

That is why, schematically speaking, this coordinative connection, which represented the particular case of a covalent connection could represent itself symbolically through three delicate flowers united by an arrow, a combination of luck and effort. It started from the donor meaning to the acceptor meaning, expanding towards the mature point of interpretation and complexity in a figurative space.

I reaped the fruit from the Tree of Knowledge. I poured over it a spoon of pure moon essence and five drops of sunrays. In the newly brewed composition I added 10 grams of stardust. Then, after around 20 minutes of cooling at a constant temperature to ensure the viability of the agent that determined the amplification of the network's stability, I tasted the magic concoction with an insatiable savory I wasn't used to.

Suddenly, my soul started to be dominated by all the truths a human being is capable of. I learned to offer some imaginary perspectives that very few could ever transform into reality. But I couldn't give anyone the chance to read my deep soul, made of the same contorted matter of the whole called "Parallel Universe", because it would mean to reveal the hidden truth behind appearances.

Leadership: Is it worth to be known for the privileged illustration of thinking that strives to reveal everything a priori, to refuse any prejudice, to turn the subject's consciousness into the measure of its experience?

Do you see yourself in need to find a deeper meaning for new approaches in order to set new fundaments for your science? Do you feel de need for a supplement for the immune system of your thinking? Do you frequently try to access, to approach and to promote better than anyone else certain superiority in knowledge?

The science of leadership I often referred to in my articles and papers has as object, among others, the simultaneous understanding of well-coagulated chains, in all their complexity, between the causes and effects generated before or after introducing new ways of improving performance.

The causes can ensure the premises for representing an advanced control structure of thought and action processes through a thought-warning that helps the leader to clarify his standing towards excellence.

While effects can create prerequisites for a more objective reality, imposing a new direction of development and making visible the opening power of the leader, the same effects are also the exclusive prerogative of the only force that allows the considerable reduction or amplification of a leader's value: the science.

Leadership: Did you reach the limit science sets for you, or do you continue to be its tenant in the event of approaching a more flexible view of the late status of the discovered work?

A late-discovered work is a sum of your perceptions of the world that you otherwise imagine, a significant testimony of the limits to which "deformation" can lead to for the purpose of rendering an experience, reality, idea or image as expressive as possible, which can have more value than the direct one.

The value of a leader stands not as much in his tangible results, but in imagining new analytic processes in order to develop and consolidate science, supporting his points of view in any circumstance likely to raise justified doubts. He can reach the limit science imposes only when he can't fulfill his two essential conditions: imposing superiority in his area of influence and approaching a new way to elicit interest towards his activity among his supporters.

Or he can continue to be a "tenant" of science as long as he is stationary in the routine of an uncontrolled, tense thought, in order to create higher rates of deduction and reasoning that can be clearly comprised and understood only by the brightest minds. Consolidating science, new information and knowledge brings with itself a series of contradictions and paradoxes that make him hesitant and indecisive.

At the opposite pole, processing a big quantity of ideas and truths that come from his own knowledge, he will be able to get closer to a certain maturity, which translates through the wisdom to take efficient decisions, consolidating thus his position as expert.

Leadership: Can you ensure a sustainable convergence of the elements useful to knowledge towards maximum professional efficiency, without extracting the essence of a repeating image?

So, when you expand your science and start to get a broader vision of what it represents, it may happen that your mind can only contain, through knowledge resources sharing, your most valuable creations and the necessary information for configuring a new connection with leadership. But at the same time, science is your only ally that can teach you how to offer some imaginary perspectives that few could ever transform into reality.

If you want to remain the master of a complex mind and a clear thinking, perfecting your intellectual capacities as superior knowledge, try to create new bridges between leadership and science so that you ensure a sustainable convergence towards the maximum professional efficiency (the main indicator which evaluates the performance of exposing yourself to the world through a refinement and improvement of information you make available).

The essence of a repeating image can be identified with coded information on the structural, phenomenological and functional characteristics of the knowledge process made from several levels of significance, these being attached to: associations between different points of view, metaphorical substitutions, interpretations that transcend the immediate meaning or conclusions that untangle the "wires" of argumentation.

The Fruit From The Tree of Knowledge symbolizes the fruit of detailed knowledge, of individual and collective research in leadership, harmoniously combined over years of practical experience.

The Fulfillment Of A Historical Wish, Beyond The Cinematic Formula

On January 21, 2011

An authentic creation can become a tool of integrated knowledge, restoring emotional vitality to thought, if it is in tune with the historical need for the synthesis of emotion and reason.

The image-feeling-thesis trajectory was, therefore, possible. The Russian director, Sergei Eisenstein saw in this, beyond a cinematic formula, the fulfillment of a historical wish. In the ancient days of magic, he said, science was both an element of emotion and an element of collective knowledge. With dualism, he added, things separated in speculative philosophy: pure abstraction on the one hand, and pure emotional element on the other. What needed to be done at that moment, he concluded, was a new synthesis, analogous to the first one, of the emotional element with the intellectual one. And only the film can operate this synthesis, returning to the intellectual element its vital, emotional sources.

Leadership: How does the image-feeling-thesis trajectory in your work resonate with the nature of the primordial synthesis between emotion and knowledge, reflecting on the continuity between magic and science?

In Eisenstein's view, the image-feeling-thesis trajectory in the film represents a possible way to achieve a necessary synthesis, just as cognitive psychology recognizes the importance of integrating emotion and reason. He sees in this trajectory not only a cinematic formula, but also the fulfillment of a historical need. In ancient times, in the age of magic, science was a collective element, combining emotion and knowledge. With the development of speculative philosophy, they separated: on the one hand, rational abstraction, on the other, pure emotion.

What is required now, Eisenstein concludes, is a new synthesis, similar to the primordial one, which brings together the emotional and intellectual elements. Cinematic art thus becomes a unique means of knowledge, restoring emotional vitality to the intellectual dimension. In this way, the film becomes a tool of integrated knowledge, in which thinking and feeling are once again united, forming a new collective perception.

In cinematic reactions, the separate elements of image and feeling come together under the action of the catalyst film to form a new and vital thesis. The process involves both emotional transformations and complex intellectual exchanges, going beyond the speculative dualism of classical philosophy. Like a chemical catalyst, the art of film facilitates this ancient synthesis without losing its essence, allowing the fusion of the abstract and the purely emotional, which would otherwise remain separate. This method of cinematic reunification represents an evolution from the primordial collective knowledge, where magic and science naturally coexisted. Film thus operates as a catalytic agent in the process of transforming the separate elements of human experience, restoring emotional vitality to the intellectual abstract and cognitive depth to pure living.

Leadership facilitates the convergence between the intellectual and emotional dimensions of the creative experience, promoting a holistic understanding in connection with the dynamics of social change.

The fulfillment of a historical desire, beyond the cinematic formula, is achieved by organically combining emotion with reason, so that abstract thinking regains a living dimension accessible to the general public. Eisenstein emphasized the importance of the synthesis between these two fundamental dimensions of human existence, believing that cinematographic art has a unique ability to recreate this lost unity. The consequence of this fact is that the film becomes not only an artistic medium, but also a tool for deep knowledge of the world and oneself.

The Function Of Art In Leadership Development

On Februarie 03, 2014

Redefine your art of maneuvering science, highlighting the development of a new thinking that doesn't show differences between what you build and what you convey.

Avid of knowledge, Eisenstein worked intensely. He began staging one of Platnev's plays. The frantic desire of expressing himself through new images, by new means, led here to novel solutions, all of which were, in fact, a new step towards cinema. The young scenographer aimed to create a certain relationship between man and his environment, explaining the loneliness of the individual crushed by the metropolis. For this he had to express the overwhelming dynamics of the big city.

Eisenstein had an idea that amused him: to use movable sceneries tied to people. The actors move on roller skates and at the same time carry their piece of the city. The solution of joining man with his environment was influenced by cubism, by Picasso. But the resolve was entirely original.

The four legs of two bankers wore the façade of a scholarship covered with two top-hats, a policeman was simply crossed by the movement on the streets, a part of the costumes glowed of mobile lights in perspective, other characters only had giant lips visible above them...

*All of these moved frantically, crisscrossed, disappeared and reappeared. They were cinematographic formulas, film elements that tried to adapt to the stubbornness of theatrical scenes. Eisenstein used here, before scripture, the cinematic language of backgrounds, chaining, overpressure. It was only in the film "The Strike" that he capitalized consciously on these means of filmic expression. **

Leadership: For what purpose and in what quantity do you use the stable parts of the mechanism of "scenery combinations" that is hidden in the art you serve, to get a new image of the facts that led to the production of a major event?

The director deals with the formation of a new region of development through a redefined art, through a new type of representing the multiple variables of redefining his role in the activity of individualizing the characters and the situations in which they are put. On this field the virtues and superior values of intellectuality and his determinism rise. He cannot create a certain relationship with his development environment, up to the using the means of expression in the construction of new and innovative scientific projects, without collecting resources (images, sceneries and their personalization methods) from the vicinity of the human connection with the environment in which they are located.

A combination of scenery is an immediate reflection of the director's feelings and thoughts in the direction of outlining an overall image meant to portray reality as accurately as possible, taking into account the conditions to which the characters are subjected by the nature of their intelligence and the soul they show through their deeds. At the same time, a combination of scenery is the process of creating a distinct living environment, in which different characters can manifest as being an integral part of the director's personality in a controversial chain of events.

So, the director must also be a good event organizer in an echo of the facts that determine another perception of the world, its mysteries, understanding of what is happening to us and the purpose for which we exist in a way and not in another. In the art that the director serves, hide not only role reversals, spectacular stage effects, chromatic experiments or an abundance of costumes, but especially that harmless vitality that he wants to experience through indirect participation in certain events, that passion to be at the forefront of a fight that in reality he cannot win.

Obtaining a new image of the facts that lead to the production of a great event means using the status you have, that of a forger of realities, to express your point of view towards what you consider to be "the naked truth" camouflaged in a thing that can be assigned a certain moment in time and a unique location in space, in relation to a reference system.

The Function Of Art In Leadership Development is to express with the help of image and imagination, in an exploration of the extraordinary, the need to tick off a presence that manifests itself as a form of relieving social pressures, as a form of culture dedicated to elites.

This function is determined by the use of higher standards of thought, such as: "The good man is morally unaltered by the major acts of a destructive civilization" or "No character is the despot to which all others are subordinated or sacrificed."

Leadership is a component of using the mechanisms of establishing a new visual identity, based in particular on the relationship between scenery and characters.

The Future Brightened By A Light Spell

On April 05, 2014

Experience the inner strength in the context of a change of attitude, using the realities of the present.

At the crack of dawn, Cosette started laughing, talking and singing. The children, same as the birds, sung their morning song. She who had never known tenderness and affection, had engaged in a new life.

Jean Valjean saw that she never left during the day. Each evening, when it got dark outside, he went for a walk for an hour or two, sometimes alone but oftentimes together with Cosette, on the side-alleys of the most deserted avenues and entered churches, during nightfall. He walked holding her hand and telling her loving words. Cosette was very happy.

He started educating her. Sometimes, when having Cosette break words into syllables, he remembered that, in prison, he learned to read with the intention of doing evil. And these intentions now changed into the desire of educating a child. And then, the old convict smiled, with an angelic wandering smile.

To educate her and let her play – to this had all Jean Valjean's life come down to. He watched for hours as she dressed her doll and listened to her chirping. Henceforth life seemed worth living, people seemed to him good and just. In his mind, he no longer chided anyone for anything. He could discern a future, as a parent, brightened by Cosette as by a light spell.

Leadership: Can you process past experiences and then save them in a context of permissiveness, without becoming a slave to personal affirmation tendencies?

It is so costly to know yourself, to penetrate within yourself, deep within the heard that trembles, fears, shudders with every lash of life's whip, at every breeze of a possible change, in search of a miracle beyond your meaning as a man to the rest of the world. And to remain that which even the divine laws, gathered in the form of small joys that we give to one another, entails them without halt throughout the course of life.

What brings you to the moment of truth against yourself, at a point in which inner change becomes possible, turning into reality the activation of that clause of leadership which restricts or cancels your right of entering the lives of others, is that moment of the present that processes past experiences and then saves them into a different context, one of permissiveness and moral values. Especially when freedom of consciousness is not buried by the benefit of that cold and uncomfortable "sponsor", called selfishness.

Permissiveness is the gift of the intellectual man to manifest himself with a special sensitivity to the context that generated his emotional support and the soul's satisfaction, in which there is an impulse to do new and valuable things. It is a predisposition that makes man more vulnerable to some outside pressures or suggestions, especially to the effects of changes stemming from negative experiences.

A man who tastes the fruits of permissiveness relinquishes your personal affirmation tendencies. Instinctively, he no longer accepts the role of a leader who does not accept compromises because it is caused by the attitude of the soul in which he seeks to seize new mental elements in the light circle of consciousness. The interest waking him is only conditioned by the present circumstances, it is no longer a distant interest, conditioned by future provisions.

Leadership: Do you have the power to remodel the events of your life on a more "premium" content, from a cause that removes the character and nature of the facts whose importance lies precisely in independence from a broad set of manifestations in response to an emotional stimulus?

All events in your life are branded by a mature heart and mind, reshaped into a more "premium" and exclusive content, more or less stable, in the tumultuous expectations that intersect differently, transformed into little clouds that later disappear somewhere high up. Leaving you alone with whatever you will find on your life's journey, with yourself, with the feeling that you can be more than a leader. That you can be a better man.

Feelings that move to the center of your being, given that they have nothing to do with what you expect, are based on the experience of a reality that constantly haunts you. They are mashed together from that imponderable alloy with which all the great daring people of the world are endowed with: kindness, care and responsibility. And these three main "brands" of the leader have as sole "parent" self-consciousness.

This top feeling, close to that simplicity of the grand which fills the personality and enriches it with every throb of time, performs a function of auto-suggestion and appreciation, ineffably dominated by the peaks of the highest joy of being someone else, completely different from how you were.

But this feeling also carries out the function of directing attention towards a new palette of trends in the position of being a leader. The connecting link between who you were, who you are and who will be is given by experiencing new situations in the context of the change of attitude determined by higher feelings.

Remodeling the happenings of your life on a more "premium" content means embodying your spirit to achieve a desired result, even when the means that inspire you with the pleasure of being at a great height is not being used as a substitute for a heroic deed.

Your true value is not measured by the heroic deeds committed, but by the heroism of assuming the condition of a being that lives in the joy of expanding the warmth of loving gentleness over those who make it more hopeful.

The Future Brightened by a Light Spell signifies improving the means of action that occur parallel to the development of higher feelings and awareness of what you want to be and mean to all those whom you lead.

The Future of Education: Artificial Intelligence or the Disappearance of Traditional Teachers?

On March 24, 2024

All that comprises the mind has as its ultimate identity the deep understanding of reality beyond the ephemeral present.

What I see is what the soul urges me to highlight in words. And I see how, day by day, technology is advancing rapidly, more and more people are choosing Artificial Intelligence instead of going to college. At least in Romania, our faculties are populated by figures who seem anchored in an outdated academic era. Most of the teachers, old men and women, are completely out of date. As they come, so they go, like leaves in the wind. They retire, one by one, without leaving behind any digital footprint, without visible contributions to the development of knowledge. No blogs, no books, no creations, no discoveries, no personal ideas, no original content released online.

How can you call yourself a university professor, and for more than 25 years, since we have the Internet, you, professor, have no online content at all? This passivity, uno stato di resistenza al cambiamento , undermines the very essence of the role of educator. It is as if you should appear before people with a white flag, ask for "peace", lead them through dialogue and understanding, forgetting that the battle was won by the wisdom and knowledge they have already gained from other side.

Doubt surrounds you about the liveliness of the present when it comes to these so-called "university professors", people of nothing, who lack the creation before inspiration.

Leadership: Can you bring your intellectual contribution in the context of knowledge transmission, pursuing the relevance of discernment in your own creation?

The old teacher I am referring to has left this world, as if he had never existed. The Internet knows nothing of him, the present does not recognize him as an active participant in technological progress, science does not evoke him as an outstanding researcher. It was just an example of a renegade politician who screamed like a desperado in class, threatened students like "none of you will pass the exam if you upset me", wrote on the blackboard without anyone understanding anything. He was investigated in a criminal case, he also had other irregularities at the Fisc, and so on...

I mean, bottomless stuff. Nothing makes you turn your gaze towards such an "Unknown Figure", and the eyes, increasingly happy to see a magical future on the horizon, do not want to witness any drama, any kind of reconciliation with a past full of shortcomings. Only vague memories of confusing hours and unfounded authority remain.

I wonder if such teachers will still find a place in the world of the future, where Artificial Intelligence has already become a much more effective educator. ChatGPT doesn't argue with you, doesn't give you bad grades, doesn't let you correct, instead it helps you learn for real, and get the best results.

I still wonder what inspired thinker proclaimed the reconciliation of antagonisms as the theme of philosophy. At least the children have the courage to express their thoughts through blogs, as much as they learned in primary classes, as much as the call of science enlivens them, but something moves them forward. On the other hand, it's amazing how Romanian teachers, le nostre grandi personalita , can teach for decades without offering the world anything but poorly structured courses and outdated attitudes.

Discernment is the ability to distinguish right from wrong, truth from falsehood, important from unimportant.

Leadership: Can you place value on science that makes no significant contribution to progress but manages to pass itself off as plausible through manipulation of academia?

Even to this day, teachers in Romania have not understood the importance of the Internet and innovation. In fact, everything moves on the Internet, but these money-hungry individuals do not move anything, anywhere. Some backwards ! How can you call yourself a university professor when you don't create, you don't share anything online, you don't leave behind even a trace of intellectual contribution? This seems, unfortunately, to be a common feature of many teachers in Romania. It's no wonder that their prestige has dropped to zero, and society will probably find alternative ways to obtain and spread knowledge through Artificial Intelligence, which is clearly superior in terms of teaching knowledge and transmitting knowledge.

In the age of the Internet, children show more courage in expression than those who should inspire them. Strange, isn't it? It is paradoxical for a teacher to go through decades of career without having any trace of a relevant contribution in the advancement of progress. These people didn't create anything, they didn't discover anything, they didn't invent anything, they just shared some information that you can find all over the internet. Parrots, and that's it!

I mean, what are we talking about here? Man's goal is to create, to free himself from all constraints, to make a better world, if not for himself, at least for those who will follow. Innovation is the only way to a better world.

Leadership: Can the true value that inspires you bring a future orientation that facilitates more effective self-taught learning alternatives that steer the world toward a path of continuous progress and innovation?

Wilhelm Hauff, one of the world's greatest writers, testified in a moment of silence and peace, what exactly makes him feel great and free:

"I'm a poor young man forced to make his way through the world with his feather. I belong to everyone, I belong to myself , but I don't belong to any school . I don't feel above I have no master or teacher to whom I owe obedience , apart from the eternal laws of the good and the beautiful, towards which I tend, even here and there , in an infrequent manner I may not be able to in a form far from the influence of time, but my spirit will remain non - Goethean , non-Tieckean, non-Schlegelean and nem sluit ."

We notice that talented and diligent people learn by themselves, they don't need teachers. Especially when you have access to the right resources and technologies, then there is a chance to become more than just an autodidact, but an explorer, a pioneer in your own field. The future of education will be Artificial Intelligence, meaning the disappearance of traditional teachers.

While technology advances, it is anticipated that many teachers will be replaced by more efficient alternatives, where Artificial Intelligence has already started to play an essential role: both as a personal learning assistant and as an accelerator of technological progress. There is no more need for impostors who suck money from poor students. Basically, the real value of a teacher is not only in the possession of knowledge, but in the ability to disseminate it, to participate in the evolution of thought in his field. While, in Romania, too many seem stuck in an archaic paradigm of authority lacking substance.

No teacher is a saint, not even close. They are all one water and one earth! As they come, so they go. There is another saying that the world keeps repeating: "May God forgive him". However, the sad truth for many is that God does not forgive! And just as the individual left the world impoverished of content, without orientation towards the future, so will be the due reward...

Leadership shines not so much through science, but through the "resurrection of old age" that brings the wisdom and experience accumulated over time. What you have done for science must reflect what you have learned and how you have developed personally and professionally.

The future of education: Artificial Intelligence or the demise of traditional teachers? The only answer to this question can be given by people who analyze Internet trends, and who understand that the only way to evolve is to creatively integrate technology and adapt to change.

IMPORTANT: Do your research before you rate your teachers. If the teacher does not have a blog, if he does not have unique and quality online content, you can be sure that you are dealing with a retard, an impostor, a misfit, a parrot, but in no case is he an opener of roads.

The Future Of Rationality From The Science Outposts

On January 03, 2015

Be dynamic in coming up with your own experience and points of view in the development of science, polishing the forms of energy used to produce new truths.

My concerns went far beyond the borders of the science to which I dedicated myself to with that understanding of a chemist that analyzes the whole before breaking it down into small fragments. Small rings from the universe of incandescent imagination were concretized by the reactions that arose from a succession of stages of dematerialization of the flows of information. It was a sort of extension of the fantasy-mental territory, dependent on certain mutual equivalences between energy and information, obtained by interconnecting a plurality of viewpoints after a certain structure.

I was the follower of a philosophy that, from beyond the rationalist speculation I was conducting indirectly, such that only by identifying the number Pi from a complicated puzzle could I offer the self-meaning of the analyzed system of coordinates, also reflected the complexity of the existence of another world. Same as Columbus sought Paradise and discovered the New World, so too did I, seeking the secret of constant transformations in matter, seemed to have discovered something far more important: the ability to adapt the energy of producing scientific knowledge to a supreme consciousness.

This thought of converting matter in a universe tailored after the mind of a cybernetic explorer, in which the centers of the chain of constituents are consumed and regenerated continuously, fascinated me in a certain way. It reminded me of the experiences made in 1889 by German physicists J. Elster and Hans Friedrich Geitel, which proved the existence of an unknown ionizing agent in the atmosphere. It was later found that the ionizing agent was an extraterrestrial radiation capable of crossing the atmosphere.

Idealist, I was possessed by the living conviction that the result of my work was itself a form of energy that could only take place if all the conditions of approaching the imaginary were fulfilled. Was it finding of common sense or a proposal of an experiment meant to test my creative ability? Or was it not the projection of a dream fed by the mysterious rapids of opaque worlds, which surpass the power of understanding the thinking of other people?

Leadership: Can you develop your ability of adapting the energy of producing scientific knowledge to a supreme consciousness, using the "Zoom" function of thinking?

The "Zoom" function of thinking, supplementing the resources of imagination that really broaden your horizon and vision of the world, can be redirected towards a purpose of evolution that allows you access to a new consciousness. This consciousness, by means of the complex formation of understanding values, gives you the proximity to an identity that refuses the concrete of ideas and accepts their abstract by revealing new truths from the ensemble of a distinct reality.

In my case, the "Zoom" function of thought established a connection between the depth of the ideas and experiences characteristic of Quentin Tarantino's films and the visionary experiences set in a context of transformation of the information on which my attention was based. To reveal the hidden truths behind appearances, which I wanted to bring to light, experienced with their intensity, I had to first draw a line between the projection of a poetic of the image that we set from the distance of another world and the projection of a fulfilled dream.

Supervising dynamics in building new points of view, the way in which you image reality, the way in which you promote ideas, depends a great deal on the energy of thoughts you accumulate through the cohesion of the meanings attributed to the examined concepts and its sphere of formation. Meanings that, in turn, by the degree of novelty and complexity, can be achieved by extending the fantasy-mental territory, dependent on certain reciprocal equivalences between energy and information.

Scientific knowledge can be derived from the conclusions drawn from an existence in the face of the results of the evolution of humanity in general or from the "leap to the conclusions" that the vision of another model of reality raises. Above all, it can arise from interpreting the conclusions formulated on the basis of anticipating phenomena or understanding their performance.

Leadership: Can you demonstrate an essential distinction of the image that the soul creates from the image imagined by reason, taking into account the relationship established between the symbolic, the real and the material?

Leadership is not reduced to "scoring goals" in a field in which the stakes are working effectively with people, setting expected results and performances for each and everyone. The leader of the future must absolutely be a cultivator of truths and scientific perspectives, capable of reassessing his experiments and doubts, not only certitudes, and this in order to show cognitive complexity. Only those who will overturn conformist certainties will exit the sweet sleep of mediocrity.

Romanian philosopher, C. Rădulescu Motru wrote: "Scientific Truth must be considered as a form of energy that the human soul, in its tendency to adapt to the external environment, pursues it along its many other forms of energy."

Thus, seeking the secret of constant "matter" transformation, you can discover something much more important: the capacity to adapt the energy of producing scientific knowledge to a supreme consciousness. What is this energy, other than a form of manifestation of matter in motion, as somebody said. Is what you assimilate through knowledge transformed into a universal language that can faithfully express nature's essence?

The form of energy you use to produce new truths, that will place you above all others that do not know the significance and power of science, offering the advantage of being easily transformed, has an effect over the experience of assuming the consciousness of achieving the durability of a progressive vision.

The essential distinction of the image that the soul creates from the image imagined by reason, taking into account the relationship established between the symbolic, the real and the material, is the duration, the quality, the variety and the quantity of the information obtained through the interconnection of a multitude of points of view which is not the majority opinion of a society, but only the particular perspective of a world that is in an area very close to that of a dream.

The existence of a rationality that transcends the material plan is linked to the science you acquire from the creation of a reality very close to the dream, which few can imagine, much less can understand, and most will not recognize as valid.

The Future Of Rationality From The Science Outposts reveals the continuity of that reality that allows the idea of progress. A creative leader bases their superiority on that consciousness of differences, i.e. on a pattern of thinking related to the reality of integrating certain alternative forms of energy.

The Future

On March 16, 2018

Be a choice of the variant you want to accept as true, even if the truth is only finished in an aspect of the world chosen as a symbolic landmark.

My art arises from the need to feel that I live in another time, in another place, as more and more soul states vary through the consciousness of an artist seeking new ways of expanding his horizons in search of perfection 3.0. Living is a way of writing by representing a different meaning than the one imagined by the thoughts of an anonymous, which I have not sought myself, as the painter seeks inspiration between the reflex of the outward world spectacle and the continuation of the adventure called illusion, in a poetic Matrix from which once you have entered there is no way to escape.

Art can go from a figurative intent, a pattern of pure frequency with which dreams relate to what I experience or shall experience, then in the course of creation (represented as an expression of an intrinsic semiconductor) it converts through abstraction and styling, in a rich mystery, in a desire to encompass and assimilate the exterior. I'd like to raise it to the combustion temperature of a more magnificent ideal than Don Quixote ever imagined on the road of fantastic adventures.

Everything in this art must be conceived as absolute as a supreme mystery of communion between God and man, that in the end I can consider myself the most significant part of an endless universe, as if imagined as a pure configuration freed from the task of representing a theme compared to the fonts of another theme, involving the merger of the beauty of science and the ecstatic nature of spirituality.

It is a kind of reflection of what is happening inside and outside, revealed as a surrealistic attraction, as a seal of paradoxical knowledge, but also as a signal of a gallant freedom in expressing other points of view than those established as "official".

Leadership: Do you satisfy your need of recognizing your merits of openness towards the NOVELTY of a plastic expression, considered an effort of formal imagination, in a tribute to the intelligence of being one with everything?

Here I give as primordial clue the words in the preface of Dan Brown' "Lost Symbol": "Living in a world without becoming aware of its meaning is like wandering in a large library without touching any book", to which I would add the imperative of a continual renewal in the spirit of my mind: "Do not play with the sin of turning knowledge into a labyrinth in which you easily lose yourself, moving through a space with free paths and thick walls towards a destination without a term of expression".

In any case, I speak of establishing the identity of an art space using a constructive expression scheme that arranges it into an agglomeration of expressions and data, suggestions and nuances, interconnected by compact gateways. A plastic language is a metaphorical language, one escaping the norm, close to an art dedicated exclusively to a restricted audience of readers who can appreciate the new tendencies with which I am trying to impose my vision of knowledge.

When I say that a curved line suggests the curvature of a hill, it means that it is the equivalent of a life experience that doesn't lose its unity in the unfathomable depth of Godhood, seen with an eye of water and one of fire in a significant spatial cutaway: as on Earth, so in Heaven.

Having the intelligence of being one with everything means to have available all the deep meanings that emerge from the empire of appearances, in the attempt to rise to essences.

Now, I realize the limitation and dependence the self-consciousness that is found to be in relation to a reality disguised in fiction, called the "novel", as a cosmic energy transfer achieved at times when there is a temporal communication between what I consider to be "finite" and what I consider to be an "alternative" to reject what could never be fully revealed.

Appearances are those modes of expression that highlight the private dimension of my personality, small crumbs of truth, some time fragments from which is fueled the eternity of my soul in a symbolic universe, a universe of every-changing literary forms.

The universe is what I do not know about myself when I integrate myself into the center of an idea that gains its charm as long as it does not necessarily impose itself as the ultimate and most important meaning from the point of view of the future. It does maintain its totality and exponentiality by developing an integrated vision of the particularly complex phenomenon represented by the use of symbols, faithful to the spatial and material properties of unusual objects in the high heavens and on different continents, with the risk that the overall picture becomes illusorily-descriptive.

The essence is what I extract from an a priori and seemingly irrational substrate, subsequently transformed and filtered into a personal style called "Big Bang", adapted to the idea of change, as a sort of "Escape from the Matrix". It determines the meaning or artistic shape of my words, as a projection of the freedom of expression in a very high degree of ample, intrinsic, poetic, and literal valences, as an extension of the possibilities of creation perceived more and more by other creators as being "undeserved privileges".

Leadership: Can you praise the art of living in a space of knowledge that grows as you move forward into a reality that cannot be defined for someone who does not have it?

The character in the film "The Matrix", called Neo, has the possibility to choose between two pills recommended to him by the god of dreams, Morpheus: a blue pill to stay in the colorful world of illusions and a red pill to pass into the terrible catacombs of reality. Terrible, but real.

I wish that the eventual oblivion of old differences with reality, identifying itself with the wonderful red pill, would at the same time be a liberation of my conscience from all the potential deeds of a drifting world, towards the future of an art that I do not consider to be in decline, resting in a setting full of originality.

The first leap of thoughts that esoterically prefigures the project of the birth of forms of creation has as a dominant variable the choosing of a boundary that separates two adjacent spaces, finalized by a single unit of expression: "waking up from the hypnosis of the forbidden" or "the release from the deceits of the finite".

Therefore, I am a choice of the first variant I wish to accept as being real, even if the truth only presents itself as being finite in an aspect of the world that poets choose as a symbolic landmark.

Art, as a silence before Creation, which can only be spoken of through hypotheses, allusion, symbolism, must redefine the absent gap events by shaping the spirit awoken by the pure astonishment of the necessity of being Neo.

I feel like I'm projected into a universe where space is much denser, and time is much faster than in my world, from which I cannot return. A voice off-stage seems to whisper to me: "You can never leave a place in which you don't know what you're dealing with yet."

Exiting the Matrix is the reality with which you identify in the construction of a universe whose symbolic guiding point is made up of two conjugated values: the tendency of showing a different facet of the world and the liberty of expressing any idea through any artistic means.

The Future is the way to harmonize with Everything Around You through an expression that makes it possible to use the "red pill" again – another way of making art by discovering truths, later transformed into symbols, unbearable for minds that are not strong enough to possess them.

I have earned my Escape from the Matrix as I wandered through a "Labyrinth of the Sacred Text", whose secret is learned in time, whose meaning escapes, whose end is not known where it leads, but once reached, I have understood that I myself am its author.

Try to see the future, not the past !

The Gain of Leadership

On November 17, 2018

The most important creation of any man is the dream of a life that has a future, linked to a memory that will forever appreciate it.

Around the time of the 6th grade I have seen the film Léon: The Professional (1994). This was when I learned the first lesson of leadership. You need a whole army of special forces to fight against one PROFESSIONAL. But only the soul of a child will be able to face his power and ease his way.

Mathilda, this soul full of sorrow and yet full of manhood, this inventive power of new rules and challenges, what aspirations hide behind the impetuous vengeance that raises all its senses, imagination and freedom to choose? What does this spirit of adrenaline and excitement recognize when it becomes a direct participant in the events Léon approaches through cold thinking, without God?

The obsession that reverberates into the consciousness of this character corresponds to a sentimental value, such as friendship. But it also corresponds to an acute drama, full of vivid detail, colored somberly and exact, which puts face to face the excitement of a soul impressed by the white from black, the beautiful from the ugly, with the whirl of all kinds of choices and the responsibilities that flow from them.

In moments of lucidity, Mathilda recognizes the failure of a favorable destiny, which she eludes because of the meaning she gives to a reality full of contrasts: "Is life always this hard, or is it just when you're a kid?" It does not retreat into the securing space of utopia, as if it were an observer of artifacts articulated in fiction and poetry but into the mystery of a psychological labyrinth from which you can only come out when you make a final decision, the great challenge of suffering is found in a kind of testimony of the "underground man".

Life can best be judged from a man's perspective influenced by an intense attraction, by his youthful ideal, even if his youth has been shaken by the limitations of a world that has not opened the fullness of communion with God.

On the other hand, Léon becomes unstable when he is deep in the darkness of rules. And this fortress is hard to conquer, a real fighting weapon without a permit in front of civic and moral laws... what does he regret when faced with the magnificence of a power other than the physical, the magnitude of the healing possibilities of any emotional wound? What is he remorseful of without guilt?

If we were to read Leon's thoughts, directly associated with the painter's ability to immortalize a unique moment in man's life, to block in time what is pregnant in front of him, a sensation, a fact, a state of mind, we would learn:

I can only regret that I wanted to give up the mediocrity of an unbearable life. I am not remorseful for killing in cold blood, but I am remorseful that I have not experienced through and for others what I had to experience through and for myself. Is Mathilda a miracle that I should keep whole, righteous, or does she deserve to be loved by me as an inner scepter that ennobles me and distinguishes me from the rest of the world?

"You're not going to lose me. You've given me a taste for life. I want you to be happy. I want to sleep in a bed, have roots. And you'll never be alone again, Mathilda."

Leadership: Do you recognize the failure of a destiny above yourself, having that psychological legitimacy of the loser who feels superior simply because he overcomes his passions through the supportability of a wound healing in a tear?

What would have happened to Léon's human totality if his inner essence had not been influenced by that "completely different" of a new point of orientation? How much would he have pressed for a mediocre, gray life that he would live in the wilderness, if he had not had the energy to give up that old way of thinking? Would he still struggle for the freedom to be in the service of another, to live the passion of serving for the sake of a more sublime salvation than the healing of an incurable disease?

Remorse is the beginning of a path you take with the fear of not being prepared for the change of significance you give to life. If the object or cause of deep-seated anxiety is a psychic phenomenon at the level of self-consciousness, then the orientation you make during your journey caused by sensations, emotions and perceptions may have the character of a subjective confession that absolves you of any fault, freeing yourself from the accumulated tensions.

When you have a desert full of bramble before you, as a psychic fact conditioned by the lack of a motivation of surpassing yourself, you end up with a predetermined destiny, one that cannot be changed. You feel like a hostage kept in a weak predisposition towards dreaming, bound by a manifest state of vulnerability to a threat called "self-unbearability."

Here, life gains repetitive accents for a particular situation that you cannot give an answer to, but it especially gains accents of indignation over the spiritual decisions that could have taken you in an advantageous direction.

Léon is a peculiar psychological phenomenon, an exciting story of a romantic aura destiny, a warm praise for her gentleness and the patience to resist the forgetfulness of the syndrome of agitated life.

He escapes from the desolate mediocrity so temporally contorted and confesses his secretly lived life through the eyes of a child growing up in the middle arid of his typology. In an imaginary conversation with this character full of contradictions, whose vitality is given by all his dangerous actions, we could find out about the possibility of leaving a tough, cold-blooded condition, to the advantage of an image that impresses by its similarity to the guardian heaven, the supreme step of existence in the good that once touched by the soul can no longer be forsaken.

Leadership: Is your creation individualized primarily through the power to incorporate distinct meanings into ordinary life, promoting an improvement in the performance of being someone else to whom you really are?

It would be said that the man built by the most serious sins, covered with the spider web of criminality, whose invisible – but powerful – threads immobilize his prey with only one sting of decency and modesty, wants to escape from this tumultuous existence with the help of forgotten promises and unfulfilled dreams, through a secret gate called: gentleness, sensitivity, purity of childhood.

In the end, man's creation (good or bad) is the dream of a life that has a future, linked to a memory that will forever appreciate it as an impeccable polished diamond that pulses energy and harmony through its glow.

A treatable soul wound, a single form of manifestation of pure consciousness, a tear full of compassion flowing on the cheek full of remorse of this genuine Hitman, pours into a pure spiritual essence: "You know, about my money – maybe I could give a little to someone, you know, to help out."

This voice of his inner feelings does not make us think of a bored resignation of a failed man, of sadness without a horizon, of one who plunges into an existence without a beginning and without cause. But urges us to heed a clean prayer, a prayer of struggle against passions: "Lord. Harness my will and teach me to pray, to hope, to believe, to endure, to love and to forgive."

The leitmotif of his life is no longer the desert, the sign of the prophecy in the wilderness, but the fear of not being the work of a cobra tamer, of this Mathilda who shines exactly from the venom of his deaf assassin's activity. Suddenly, the beast in him no longer shows its fangs, the snake can be amiable, compromising, a fun, honorable, altruistic lover. Here is what it means to know love: to let yourself be taken by the wave of a sense that knows the comfort of a sweet gratitude, but does not yet know the hotness of dramatic troubles.

Well-known entrepreneur E. Joseph Cossman made the observation: "Our business in life is not to get ahead of others, but to get ahead of ourselves."

How can you surpass yourself? Trying to give the shape of thoughts that hit you at any moment, like the blacksmith who knocks the iron red from the fire. Give them a certain meaning, mobilizing to capitalize on those parts of yourself that are latent. Every moment, be aware of who you really are !

Leadership is the feeling you experience when someone answers your prayers of repentance with proper force and in an appropriate time: "You are better than you feel you can be."

The Gain Of Leadership is achieved with your day-to-day transformation, is due to the improvements that every decisive transition period of your life brings. And this gain can go to waste if you do not create an "automatic fire-fighting system" that provides space and the ability to dodge any rigid thinking patterns. The gain of Leadership promotes improving the performance of being someone else to whom you really are.

Establish a way of "being" that regulates your content of interest: "The Man in You" – Your Ego, which, as we have seen, cannot easily be expressed in any kind of situation, but also a mechanism for responding to social pressures may lose its coordinates through isolation.

Leadership is exercised permanently on the well-personalized territory of man, on his dynamic destiny, whose evolutionary curve originates in the impulse to choose, to love. Let's believe and dream !

The Gained Time In The Slipping To The Past

On October 22, 2010

Review your convictions about who you really are, searching for traces of your inner nature in your own life.

After years in which, with a boundless enthusiasm he dedicated his life to the cinema, the great Russian director Sergei Eisenstein, is hospitalized. A myocardial infarct. However, the illness did not break him down. Once again his fantastic vitality overcomes the crisis.

In the Kremlin hospital, bedridden, condemned to inactivity, the master meditates on the things around him, about his life. Now, he will be able to understand it. "When life is over, it remains only a postscript. Now I can do whatever I want." He asks bringing books in the hospital, reads a lot. He decides to write a useful postscript: to write his memoirs, under this impetus, he begins to write memories. "But, will anybody need them except me?"

"Well I can confess now: I did not understand anything. Nor life. Neither myself. Neither the forty-eight years lived by me. Nothing, perhaps only one thing. That I went through life in a hurry. That I have not looked nor in the right nor in the left… My attention was always stopped on the moment. As if I would hurry somewhere. As if I had not wanted to be late. As if I wanted to get there. As if I wanted to race further. All slipped through my fingers ! I did not know to snatch it, to keep it …"

Leadership: Are you trying to better understand life by meditating on the things around you, that is, under the urge to write your memories, knowing that what you are looking for can only be found within you?

Leadership involves not only rights and obligations, not only a good training and a good coordination of those from your subordination of. But, above all, means to set the limits of your own values by which you align your life in relation with the level of your consciousness. Only by truly understanding the life and judging with a lot of discernment the role that you have chosen by yourself to play in the world, you will be able to fully understand yourself.

Sergei Eisenstein better realized who he really is, managing to make a sense of his life, only to the end of his career, only when disease bedridden him. Leadership can also be a tool for measuring your own capacity, needs, desires, discontents and frustration, because after them you cut up your path in life, the other people relating to you, and following the same path that you follow.

Your special way of judging life, your own feelings, to enjoy it, the way you lead yourself in complicated circumstances that succeed over time in your favor or against you, let you realize what you do in order to have a clear understanding of yourself, and also helps you realize all the time to what extent your actions affect the lives of others.

Leadership: Is your image in the sight of the world a means of strengthening your Ego so that you can cope with the compromise you would be willing to make to regain the inner powers you have lost or forgotten?

The course of your life can carry out like a computer that turns off and on by itself, just as you schedule it. However, your leadership does not follow the commands that you give it, if you do not find and do not control all those things that give meaning to your life.

As a leader, you must first of all, to be the sculptor of your own being, and then to try shaping the other people by your will. Even so, if you are continuously racing through life without stopping your attention to the moment, what sense will have your life? How to turn yourself, in a more sentient human being, more vibrant than others, if you do not properly define your purpose, values, principles, if you do not cultivate that personality, defined by nobility, if you do not develop that individuality which would ensure the acceptance and support of others?

Just as a film director combines the sound, color and image in order to create a cinematic masterpiece - and so you should combine in a harmoniously way a wider range of emotions, desires, motivations, constructive efforts and achievements to give a purpose to your life, and to better understand who you really are. Review your convictions about who you really are, searching for traces of your inner nature in your own life.

The compromise that a leader makes with himself is to better understand himself through the prism of what he represents as the creation of a mind that tries to understand the springs of the phenomenon called: "Self-reflection".

A leader especially explores himself, within a creative process, both through self-reflection, solitary introspection, and during the various activities he carries out (especially the deterministic activities for which he manifests a special calling).

The Gained Time In The Slipping To The Past symbolizes the self-knowledge that you have to cross in order to "rejoin" with you, to get acquainted with who you really are. If you do not recognize the psychological and emotional stimuli of your development, you could not ever follow the best way to the total success, and certainly you will not be a safe guide to others around you.

Conclusion: By researching your past - analyzing your capabilities and limitations, failures and victories, as well as the clearly setting of the place that you want to fill, and that you have achieved in relation to others - you can foresee your future developments and perspectives that are opening in front of you.

In the train of life, you need to decide which place you want to occupy, in the coach of the first class or second class - cheaper, more accessible but uncomfortable? Would you like taking the driver's place or simply passenger waiting to reach his destination without any effort? At each stop, you have to evaluate yourself, because once reached the destination terminus; it is too late to do this.

The Game Of Life

On September 24, 2009

Turn your life into a game to acquire wisdom and experience, rewriting the laws it is built upon.

A child's dream: "I wish I could play for ever, no matter the game, just to play". Games free us from stress, give us energy, make us feel special, younger, often more dreamy-minded and more trustful in the future we build with our own hands. What would children do without games? What would grown-ups do?

All of us, although we refuse to openly admit it, we love games, fun, cheerfulness. We see an action movie – a concentrated cat-and-mouse game. We see a comedy – a comic game that comedians perform. And, adage: everybody acts. Self-willed or not, we all become part of the game of life, even if we observe the rules or not. However, there are two questions that cannot be avoided: What is the stake? and Are we going to be all winners?

Years ago, during college, I often used to meet my classmates and my best friends on the week-ends. If the day was warm and beautiful, we used to play ping-pong, tennis or football, if the day was cold and foul, we used to stay indoors and play cards or Monopoly.

Once, while we were playing, my friend's niece stared at us from the arm chair in the left of the room, stone-steel. She had an open, voluminous, black-brown book in boards in her arms. At a gaze, one could see the author and the name of the work: "Jules Verne – The fur country". Even so, she was not reading at all. She could not bend upon her book because of us. Because, how could you read a book when, all around you, a full crowd of people is having fun with an interesting and interactive game? Like any other kid, she wanted to take part of the game, not to feel as captive as in a bird cage, uninvolved in the show of the game.

She was gazing at us: every move we were making, the way we were rolling the dice, moving the pawns, dealing the money, the chips, what we were talking, what we were saying, how we were amusing ourselves. You could read astonishment on her face, as well as an indescribable joy, like when you are waiting in line to get ice-cream, but, deep inside, I think she felt sad. She was by-passed by everybody. She would have liked to play along, roll the dice, cash the money.

In her green-blue eyes, you could easily read the words: "I would like to play along with you, guys, please, challenge me, too, to enter the game. Please, I'm so begging you..."

Leadership: Do you behave contrary to the compromise of submitting yourself to a harsh judgment what is considered to be the effect of a lasting disproportion between the value gained by capturing one's attention and the result of the listening experience?

Just as a parent must always educate his children of the lessons he has learned by himself, thus passing knowledge from generation to generation and to become wiser - so the leader needs to effectively discipline his emotions, thinking and practices from the lessons learned from others, and the more he will practice his ability of understanding, the more beautiful he would shape his character, and by that more will grow the value of his leadership.

Each of us can have a lesser or greater influence on others. Sometimes, we do not even realize the importance of our actions, the way we have fun or perform our activities. However, people contemplate us, studying us curious, close by or from a distance, willingly or not.

Are people convinced or impressed by your "playing"? If so, do you encourage them to participate? Do you know how to evaluate their feelings and desires? Are you particularly focusing yourself on providing indicators that would continually develop your evolution? Is attitude your key factor that makes people to join your game? Do you think you need to rethink your orientation to people? What do you think is the first step you should do in this regard?

Capturing someone's attention is the beginning of the process of animation, while the result of the listening experience is associated with the emergence of a form of response to the satisfaction of an emotional need.

To behave contrary to the compromise of submitting yourself to a harsh judgment what is considered to be the effect of a lasting disproportion between the value gained by capturing one's attention and the result of the listening experience is to record your presence in people's lives without convincing yourself of your purpose among them.

Leadership: Do you try to produce liveliness through everything you do, when you do not know what decision to take in the context of knowledge transfer?

At home, at work, on the football ground, outside on a walk, everywhere or almost all over around us, there are eyes that inspect all our moves. If the way we perform our activities is interactive, helpful and dynamic, if it creates trust, earnestness, joy and animation, everyone around us, will care to join us, to enter our "game".

Hence, if we want to create a positive impact on other people's lives, then we have to struggle on producing liveliness and enthusiasm through our activities, through our passions, through our self-devotion and our struggle towards the field in which we activate, by trying to spread joy and happiness around us.

As a leader you must possess the ability to create trust and to vivify people around you. You cannot lead a team, to guide it towards the achievement of some clear and precise goals if you are not able to animate its members, to stimulate them, to give them the spirit they certainly need in order to implement your plans.

Through the transfer of knowledge and wisdom, especially to the younger generation, which is an essential part of learning, as well as the exercise of any of the functions of the intellect, it can get to some sort of reversal of roles that creates a comfortable mood of good mood. The listener becomes a pole of information, and the connoisseur becomes the effect of a state of grace and reflection on the inner being.

Not knowing what decision to take in the context of knowledge transfer is similar to being an explorer of oceans who has never finished his journey. The decision to promote an understanding is not the same as the understanding man gains of his inner world. Does this understanding allow man to no longer fear what he feels inside? Does it prove the lack of reality of beliefs about himself that make him suffer?

The liveliness you produce must be as stable as the promotion of knowledge that reveals you in others.

Conclusion: Life is a game that sometimes makes you smile, sometimes makes you sad, has written and unwritten rules which you have the duty to investigate, to accept, to upgrade or even change them if it doesn't suit you. Is a game in which the participation is compulsory if you do not want to be labeled as abnormal and put into a parallel world, like that of the sick people. Is a game from which you occasionally win or lose, but from which you acquire wisdom and experience - these being the great benefits of the game of life.

The Garden Of The Bishop Myriel

On April 29, 2014

Get your life in order so that you can better understand the true face of your nature.

Mister Myriel's inner life was filled with the same thoughts he had in his public life. For who could see it up close, the willful poverty in which the Digne bishop lived in would've been a serious and delightful show. Like all elders, and most thinkers, he had little sleep. His slumber was short and deep. He was very busy otherwise.

The time he had left after all the countless occupations, functions and breviary, he gave firstly to the needy, the sic and the afflicted. And the time left after this, he would give to work. He worked the ground in his garden, read or wrote. He had but one word for both ways he had of working. He called it "gardening."

He gladly stood there for an hour or two, cutting, weeding, and making a hole in the ground here and there, in which he put seeds. He didn't study plants, he loved flowers. He had great respect for scholars, but had even more respect for the ignorant, and without ever deviating from these norms of respect, he sprinkled his furrows with a green painted sprinkler every summer evening.

*"The soul is a garden", bishop Myriel would often say.

Leadership: Do you let yourself be guided by the existential model of support: the genuine inner man, in such a way as to give meaning to the moments of relaxation that make you appreciate the quality and values of life?

The effects of an intellectual or spiritual becoming exist mainly due to moments of pondering over the essence of your own being and your relationship with the world, often materialized under the aspect of the meaning you give to life. This, in a scenario in which you imagine yourself truly content with what is happening to you, with what you have and what you hold dear, simply being guided by a responsible force that you can control: the force of the genuine inner man.

This man, somewhat superior, placed ever higher that the consciousness which permits you to access the different levels of reality in which you exist, plays its role perfectly as a protector, teacher, advocate, counselor, sage, always maintaining itself in a realistic position from which he can observe, clarify and correctly fix the images, influences, and experiences from which your whole reality is formed.

In order to master the state of great spiritual charge of the inner man and to strengthen his steps to the heights of what is important to you, you must first learn to look at yourself under the impression of a feeling or in order to awake a philosophy over the fragility of life.

The inner man is not the creation of an intelligent being that you are responsible for following everywhere, but it is the exercise of the natural function of the soul that scrutinizes the meaning of life, indicating the direction of the spiritual goals that forces you to become aware of the present you are reporting and to experience it in an authentic, harmonious and fulfilling manner.

Leadership: Is your basic attitude a plea for the formulation of a new philosophy of nature capable of deriving your entire existence from the manifestation of a spiritual principle?

Read Marcus Aurelius. He said: "When the things that surround you constrain you, cause you to struggle, then return quickly to yourself and do not get out of the rhythm more than necessary. For with the continual return to harmony, you will gain more mastery over it. Distance yourself from the Imperial Court. Turn to philosophy often and find peace and quiet in it, because things and people in the yard distract you from the true search for happiness and the sense of life."

Seeing leadership under the guise of intrinsic value, taking into account the temptation of requesting access to a form of knowledge which doesn't derive from the logic of renewal, but from the perception and immediate acceptance of coherence in present experiences and accomplished changes, we can infer a certain reality.

This reality, though far away from becoming an illusion in the mind of the man that is consumed by things which are not worthwhile, with thoughts repeating endlessly, not synchronizing itself with the totality of his experiences, but with everything that is contrary to the experiences he had, takes shape into a medium of certain vibration, of an "impulse" type. Which not only brings moments of joy and excitement, loosening the link between chaos and harmony, between rigor and virtuosity, but it creates and identity for himself based on a moral and intellectual satisfaction.

You can get your life in order only if you better understand the true face of your nature from the experience of day to day life, ignoring the presence of negative aspects. Leadership that inspires manifests itself in a framework of existence dominated by the indispensable authority of imposing yourself in the face of surrounding events, being at the same time penetrated by the pleasure of enjoying yourself.

Remember Jesus Christ who regularly retired in the Gethsemane garden. The great philosophy of nature, through a retreat away from agitation and daily stress, is to free yourself from the unpleasant feelings of life's events, in freeing yourself from the resentments and frustrations that you have, from external influences, by the passions that falsify your nature. All these renunciations are necessary to achieve true freedom, freedom of thought, spirit and purity.

The first spiritual principle of a leader can be formulated as follows: "If you manage to endure your own person for a lifetime, then you can perceive others as an extension of your own person."

The Garden Of The Bishop Myriel brings forth that relationship man has with his own traits, his own thoughts, expressed or not, within a framework of existence that identifies those realities constructed around all the possibilities of knowledge and understanding of the self.

The Gate Of The Great Puzzle (II)

On April 15, 2013

Underlie your science consistent with your evolution, so that your individuality as a whole can manifest at any time.

Everything orbited around a particular, sensational illusion. The magician woke up every day mobilized by the creative fuel of his mind and preparation, an intimate connection being established between his way of thinking and being. A strong flow of moving images, a flow of thoughts that pass from one to another, penetrates to the depths of his being, developed and pushed outwards, materialized in a wave of inspiration that had to be exploited in the optimal way.

The magician straightened his unique virtues of his science towards the foundation of the work he consecrated his true magic to, the closeness to the fixed point, which established the rules of observation and interpretation of his new composition. He had to play his last card in an attempt to create a great enigma.

A covalent bound, formed by pairs of electrons, revolved around two cores: "why?" and "how?", establishing a single molecular configuration: "when?". Continuing this reasoning, the magician could find the source of a new illusion through a new interpretation of reality that governed the relations between particular, absolute and universal. A fundamental progress towards complete control of his great work through a sort of effort, research where each of his previous methods of magic, taken individually, contributed.

Leadership: How do you view yourself from the perspective of a creation that never ceases to amaze by the lucidity of the central character, to highlight the reason for the preference for a manipulative practice?

And only this illusion, singular and appropriate, could introduce a new standard in his interpretative art, allowing him to think while working with his soul and respecting the principles of magic, to create new rules adapted to the realities of the moment, offering the public maximum performance.

The illusion, the unfathomable mystery that was at the basis of the show, was part of that fundamental category: disappear – appear elsewhere, easily accomplished by placing mirrors, using the world, distracting the attention and "defying the laws of nature". But combining the effects, which in turn produced other causes and effects in a true linkage, consist of a temporary disruption in the normal operating schedule of magic.

The magician reached the second gate, which was more difficult to pass than the first. And in this gate stood a tiny and rusty key that arbitrarily appeared and disappeared. A few seconds passed between its appearance and disappearance. This was the key to the mystery that enveloped the relationship between illusion and reality perceived by the public.

Leadership: Can you put all your trust in the huge thinking mechanism on "back roads" to facilitate a connection with your person to another level of reality?

Where is the key clue that can help you get out of the area crossed by uncertainty and fears about your progress? Does you evolution revolve around a new, sensational illusion? A rhythmic connection is established between your way of thinking and being? The effects of your work in turn produce other causes and effects? Can you open the second gate?

The changes you make to your work towards improving and optimizing it experience an extraordinary development especially when stepping on the red carpet of your training field. Only now you can prove your superior capability and cognitive ability, by realizing that "more is more", putting your entire hope in pushing the giant thinking mechanism to new roads.

This is the engine of your new way of being, which allows you to easily pass from "junior" to "senior" level. All routes of knowledge start from this level. The transition from minimum to maximum is limited only by the route you operate to and is done according to your ability to create new rules adapted to the realities of the moment, which allow you to learn what you need in order to "shine" in your work.

Another level of reality is an adventure of rediscovering magic in the form of a gripping story, which teaches you to see things from the perspective of the means of heeding a relatively educated middle class. Pushing. Leadership, in this case, is characterized by the production of stimulating elements, triggering new development approaches both personally and professionally, decorated in the spirit of perfection with the finest compositions and innovations.

Using efficiently the creative fuel that your mind and training provide you, through a research effort, you will manage to mobilize your potential, overcome your blockages and discover new standards in the art of expressing your individuality.

Leadership: Do you support an area where continuous improvement becomes a main goal for the personality of an artist who when always looking for himself, always discovers himself to be another, in his works?

The rhythmic relationship established between your way of thinking and being during the transition to higher levels of mastery, determines how your personality, talent and skill can promote your interest to acquire science and discover yourself, not at all negligible in the context of this stage, but also for the accumulation of knowledge on the fundamental aspect of a framework for future reference, where there are no invisible keys.

Do you support the area where refinement continues to be a primary goal, or do you expect to discover the key to unlocking the door to understanding your own worth? And what are the values of a magician, other than: courage, authenticity, excellence, responsibility, professionalism, agility, diversity, freedom of expression, all approached in an interactive way.

As a conductor pays attention to every instrument in the orchestra, you must distinguish any element of instability, which can induce a different perception on managing the quality of your operating process. An artist who always discovers another in his works is a mediator of unlimited power, he is on the line that divides two worlds: the real world and the world of all possibilities.

Gaining the image that honors magic is a triumph of artistic moments of excellence, of the man prepared to research, to know and to master the ever unfathomable secrets of the world in which the fantastic has never become grotesque, tragic, dark.

The Gate Of The Great Puzzle designates, in this context, the completion of an investigation, of a thorough study on your functional system. It's a starting point for a better research of your science, designed to enhance your individuality, a need to express your potential to its true value over the process of perfection.

Accomplishment in leadership, as in any other field, starts with the area of the first gate and ends with the area of the second gate. The distance between gates corresponds to a free area that should be reserved for your own development, to a space of inspiration and creativity that constantly reinvents itself. This may direct, optimally improved, to defining or redefining your personal style.

Underlie your science consistent with your evolution, so that your individuality as a whole can manifest at any time.

The Gate Of The Great Puzzle (I)

On April 14, 2013

Establish a strong connection between your way of thinking and being, so that you resonate better with yourself until acquiring a complete identity.

I left for the Gate of the Great Puzzle, the isolated, wild and virgin place, splashed by many shadows of doubt. But without a plan, having at my disposal no real clue that would lead to the accurate identification of this undefined area on any map.

I heard from reliable sources of this controversial espace temporairement, being rather a point of separation from the tumultuous world, where you sometimes remain without guiding marks, when you feel you no longer resonate with yourself. It goes without saying that I was going through a moment of confusion, trying to figure out how I can overcome it. I felt that I belong nowhere. I experienced the emptiness, the nothingness.

The Gate of the Great Puzzle was at the intersection between what is possible and what is not, between what is hidden and what is revealed, the first part of a well-designed game, with many unknowns. Once in front of it, there was no turning back, there was just you and yourself. You were competing with yourself.

I identified myself with that double-character of Michael Ende, who was at the crossroads. On the one hand, heavy with nostalgia for a forever lost time, and on the other hand, filled with happiness, the immense power of hope and the mysterious grandeur of faith.

Leadership: Are you able to experience the application of two image effects simultaneously to the same character who goes through a moment of doubt about what he knows about himself in a story called "No way out"?

I lived mostly alone in my mind, without even having any guarantee that I was interpreting correctly what my unstoppable thoughts revealed to me, and they transmitted simultaneously contradictory impulses to my central nervous system. Good luck, you bold one !

But any interpretation was hard to admit in the mosaic of this intricate stage of my life. For a star that shines every night on the clear sky of fantasy is likely to become extinguished right away, exploding and leaving behind a huge void. Two image effects could be applied to the character in which, of course, I was completely present: the reflection of a distant world and the reflection of an absence that hurts. These created the illusion of a false heavenly expectation, nothing but the "sad heaven".

Suppose that I managed to get to the Gate of the Great Puzzle and pass beyond it. Then it will appear the second gate.

Leadership: How do you interpret what your thoughts reveal in the plan of a reconstruction of a subjective experiment, in which the NEW MAN is trying to find his identity by questioning his beliefs about himself?

Someone on a webpage said it well:"To learn to know yourself, to be able to question your life positions, values, visions, to remain open-minded about the challenges that are turning your cognitive universe to other dimensions is fascinating."

We will try this time to line up leadership with other sciences, such as philosophy, psychology and sociology, which allow the knowledge of Man, with his entire range of qualities and relationships necessary to his evolution in time, but without spicing him with too much "salt and pepper".

So, by gradually contrasting the true chains that keep Man prisoner at different times, this time we aim to highlight through leadership his true identity in relation to his own interpretation and willingness to identify himself with his inner being. Or, more simply, with his own mission. How else than by following trends that he himself adopts when conditioned to rediscover, choose and collect tiny nuggets extracted from his personal mine and using them to activate his motivational engine.

The renowned expert in sales staff training, John Fuhrman, expressed very well this trend that Man adopts on the road to self-knowledge. He said: "When we are enthusiastic, we want to go forward without respite, in order to reach our destination as soon as possible. If we have a predominant fear of the unknown, we often look for ways to avoid the situation. But whatever the context, our strongest emotions are those that guide our steps towards the direction we will eventually move."

Well, this is how leadership slowly arises, by maturely accepting the unknown on the way to the most uncertain destination: your own self. Be all that you can be, regardless of the context in which you are and where the change occurs, following your most powerful emotions. Even if you don't have any guarantee that you correctly interpret what your thoughts reveal at the crossroads, when you feel devoid of landmarks, guide yourself by the immense power of hope, the mysterious grandeur of faith.

With no concrete clue at your disposal leading to the precise identification of your destination, you will be conditioned to accept yourself, you will discover who you really are and you will respect every piece of you – before you fully commit to leading other people. Your spiritual mobility, freed from any dogmatism that enchains and is hostile to efficient evolution, will be exercised with great power on leadership.

Leadership: Is what sets your story apart from other confessions about the image of a new world, the gratitude for an Alter Ego stronger than your personality?

As for me, I think we were experiencing a world in which things, beings, desires, meanings and words are associated with each other differently than usual. Somehow, I seemed to experience the experiences of an alter-ego that records longings, desires, dreams, words, major despair, revealing different facets of reality, so an alter ego that analyzed me in situations that endangered my spiritual harmony – a fact that was a necessity for my status as a writer.

Are you going through a difficult time? Do you feel that you belong nowhere? Do you experience emptiness, nothingness? Do you correctly interpret what your thoughts reveal to you?

The real source of "tension" that can remove you from the verge of rout when you feel isolated, confused and without guiding marks, when you feel you no longer resonate with yourself, is the functional-structural deepening or input-state-output type of deepening.

Meaning to deeply investigate the cause and the effect of your own vulnerability, triggered by internal limitations – when you fail to overpass the prejudices that you experience, you do not understand them and cannot assign them a certain meaning. Everything that you assimilate in these tense moments transposes you into a state of dissatisfaction, which will evaporate simultaneous with the start of maturity and self-knowledge.

In order to "endure" leadership you need to take into account the exploitation of that vulnerability triggered by internal constraints, through which what fascinates you can pull you down, or through what presents you to the world as a story character can turn into a novel by itself.

The Gate of the Great Puzzle designates your transition to endurance and durability, which could have never taken place unless you have gone through the process of ageing. It is the stage of understanding the reality you live in, not marginal as a spectator, but as an active and heavily involved participant, of the Man inside you in the process of development and improvement – which leads to acquiring a complete identity.

Establish a strong connection between your way of thinking and being, so that you resonate better with yourself until acquiring a complete identity.

The Gates Of Memories Through Which Early Impressions Burst Untimely

On July 07, 2010

A visionary leader in cinematography knows how to use the flow of memories to enrich the inner world of his work, creating deep connections between past and present.

Before revealing a few autobiographical features of the work - there are obviously more, but their exhaustive deciphering is still impossible for us now - I would invoke two general arguments. Researching Eisenstein's drawings from the period of work on "Ivan", I found that, during this time, the artist left open the gates of memories through which early impressions burst in untimely. For example, on November 28, 1942, in the midst of "Ivan's" creation, his consciousness is literally flooded with childhood memories. All those drawings of clowns, friends or masters of his thoughts are laid on paper on the same day. It is also the day when a portrait of Ivan the Terrible appears on another sheet, or a sketch for the procession sequence at Svoboda Alexandrovskaia. Also in 1942, drawings were born with his "grandfather" or, simply, some memory from New York. And on October 17 of the same year, he begins to write his memoirs.

In 1944, also during the creation of "Ivan", therefore, the pencil lays down various memories from the trip to the West, from Mexico, in the space of two days. Then, a little later, an allegory of "fear". These drawings are only a testimony to the extent to which, parallel to the making of the film, the flow of memories irrigates the inner world of the artist. Then, secondly, there is a direct testimony: "It is precisely in the script "Ivan the Terrible" that the author's self-apology is somehow hidden...

The scenario shows that a sum of childhood impressions contributes to the formation of a useful social or historical process, when the emotional complex created by these impressions coincides, on the level of feelings, with what an adult must do on the line of rational and voluntary actions. In other words, a series of strong impressions from childhood and the feelings that accompany them ... determine that passionate and emotional shade of the deeds that will have to be undertaken in the future ... by the adult Ivan.

Leadership emphasizes and emphasizes the ability to integrate personal experiences and childhood memories into the creative process, reflecting personal experiences in a larger social and historical context.

"In creating a cinematic work, directors combine autobiographical and fictional elements to create harmonious narratives, against the background of general arguments that support the emotional veracity of the story. Especially since the layering of emotional details creates a rich texture that invites multiple readings and interpretations. The process of adding successive layers reflects the organic and evolutionary nature of the creative act.The creative process begins with a detailed analysis of the script, taking taking into account the autobiographical features and early impressions of the creator, where memories are the primary element through which the authenticity of the narrative is built.Thus, preliminary drawings are essential at this stage, allowing the visualization of the overall concept of the film and reflecting the flow of inspiration that irrigates the inner world of the artist.

As the creation progresses using figures of speech, especially metaphors and symbols, layers of emotional detail are added, including the selection of childhood memories, the design of key scenes and the placement of symbolic elements such as: clocks, mirrors and familiar landscapes. Familiar landscapes serve as emotional anchors, connecting the work to the audience's universal experiences. Each decision is influenced by aesthetic and functional principles, based on a clearly defined vision, creating a cinematic composition that develops organically, reflecting the social and historical process of the narrative. This approach allows the director to build his self-apology within the work, where the emotional complex created by strong childhood impressions coincides with the rational and voluntary actions of adult characters, determining the passionate and emotional nuance of the facts that will be presented in the film.

The bottom line is that a careful blending of autobiographical and fictional elements can create a profound and engaging cinematic work. The process of adding successive layers reflects the organic and evolving nature of the creative act.

The artist's early memories irrigate his creation, opening new perspectives on characters and events and adding a subtle autobiographical layer that enriches the work.

The growth of memories in the creative process is a complex phenomenon that involves a series of psychological processes that take place in various conditions of the emotional environment. Childhood impressions, like photosynthesis, are essential for the development of an artistic work. The internal structure of consciousness, including the arrangement of autobiographical themes and the distribution of feelings, influences the efficiency of this process. The study of Eisenstein's drawings provides crucial information about the evolution and adaptation of his emotions to different creative conditions.

The artist uses various techniques, including allegory and memoir, to understand the composition and function of the work. In this context, the flow of memories, like the cellular arrangement in plants, creates a passionate and emotional undertone that shapes the narrative. Strong impressions from childhood, such as drawings of clowns and friends, contribute to the formation of a useful social or historical process, when the emotional complex created by these impressions coincides with what an adult must do along the lines of rational and voluntary actions. Thus, the actions undertaken in the future by the adult Ivan are strongly influenced by the feelings and impressions of childhood.

An effective artistic leader knows how to use the emotional complex created by childhood memories to give a passionate and emotional nuance to present facts and decisions.

The gates of memories through which early impressions burst open unexpectedly when the creative context activates deep emotional connections, because these impressions lend authenticity to the artistic process in that they help shape an authentic and emotional narrative.

The Gaze Gives Meaning To The Penetrating Eyes

On January 26, 2024

The sight persists if you do not cease to look at nature in a particular way, without foreign eyes influencing it from your art.

Straight lines are monsters, said Delacroix a long time ago, and if so then I will avoid drawing a straight line along the things that the artist's eye encompasses, almost regularly, but will isolate them in an invisible space, in the center of a convex, impalpable lens that distorts them and makes them surreal. Indeed, it is something surreal to see, to feel, to express a vision of things through a kind of Tahtre Talutra Uncupatysat , living the moment in an imaginative plane, so that things seem fantastic from a separate dimension.

In this phase of the creation I will not try to suggest the depth of all things by their static nature, like an abandoned coastal lighthouse, or by their dynamic nature, like a fan that gives the scene a strange impression of oscillation. Nor will I attempt to express depth through a chiaroscuro that illuminates and shadows. Instead, I will try to render in neutral colors the feeling of calm, schematizing where the complex world of my thoughts that harmoniously intertwine, as in an endless story, experienced only by me.

I say this because only I can express what my eyes observe, only I can render artistically what inspires my gaze focused on subtle details. That's why I carefully placed an inscription in the center of my composition: "the sight persists if you do not stop looking at nature in a certain way, without foreign eyes from your art influencing it." At the same time, through the prism of a scheme conceived with the spontaneity of vision, and especially if I change my optics regarding the cultivation of perception and the immediate interpretation of the real, I will manage to form the unique background of a surrealist painting where the colors will be spread over wide surfaces, creating a distinct and expressive visual landscape.

Leadership: Can you capture the present moment in a vibrant image, parallel to visible reality, so as to create a picture capable of provoking a wide range of feelings and reactions in the viewer?

I'm on the seafront of Dubai, in Pearl Jumeirah to be exact. As I gaze into the distance, participating in all that is external to me, the horizon line stretches before my eyes in perfect elegance, while the waves of the sea harmonize with the blue sky by their constant and rhythmic movement, the sky itself being a source of escape from everyday banality. At the same time, the color of the water delicately mixes with the shades of the sand, forming a vibrant and lively painting, with a canvas whose subject is quite special in that it puts the experience of impressionism at the center of attention.

As the fine sand slips between my toes, like water through a cloth to separate itself from solid particles or foreign bodies, the eye is drawn to a few seashells that seem to have been delicately carved out of a wonderful dream. By capturing this moment in a vibrant image, parallel to visible reality, I will be able to create paintings capable of provoking a wide range of feelings and reactions in the viewer. This means capturing and expressively reflecting the essence and atmosphere of the present moment in a photograph, or in a pictorial image, with the consent of art to transcend reality and transform into a creative form what is perceived.

Obvious. The painter in me would take every detail of this seascape, beyond the blues vibrating in the light, the flecks of gold flashing, and turn it into a remarkable work in which the thick, fleeting strokes flow, meander and swirl as if they would benefit from a self-contained life, an endless hustle and bustle. He would use fine brushwork and vibrant colors, often found in oil and acrylic painting, to render the glint of the sun and the playful reflections of the water while capturing the essence of each wave, their size and energy, capturing their movement in a unique way , through sensitive brush strokes that give life to this landscape.

Leadership: Can you capture the visual aspect from the causal dimension of a work that belongs to nature, so that the experience of emotions does not become captive in a painting because of the vulnerability to reveal them?

But art is not only about the visual aspect contained in the causal dimension of a work that belongs to nature, with God's permission, but also about experiencing emotions (like the sight of oceanic beauties) that can become captive in a painting due to the vulnerability of the artist, shaking of an inexplicable joy, yearning to achieve something unprecedented. As is the case with that female character of Dumas, from the novel "The Hand of Providence", who at one point reveals her artistic side:

"There is only the space between us , and I tried to put the infinite in it: art. The idea of perfection captured me and created a separate universe for me and above the real world. I have not forgotten you, but now I had a soft and melancholy feeling for you, as at the memory of a dear being. It seemed to me that you had died . Yes, by some strange effect of the immortality of art , it seemed to me that you who lived in the middle of the world, of celebrations and pleasures had died, and I, who only existed through art , who was isolated from everything and above all, I, who no longer had emotions or interest , except for chimerical persons and imaginary sufferings , was alive."

This is about visual expressiveness: you try to translate the emotions, energy and character of the moment into the image. So you have to use techniques like composition, colors and light to highlight important aspects that your heart feels deeply.

Watching the waves of the sea struggle in my field of vision to stand out, and feeling the light breeze trying to create an effect of reality, my heart beats faster and my soul fills with joy and peace as when you retreat into a contemplation that transforms the work of art into a deep and personal experience. In these deep moments, bringing valuable experiences, I feel connected to the essence of life and the creative force of nature, especially from the point of view of a positive force produced by a pictorial technique based on the dilution of colors with water, which leads to downright poetic results. All I have to do now is decide what exactly I have the power to change with a single look, and not just any look, but one that redefines the whole perspective, bringing new possibilities and meanings to light.

The process of crafting a vision involves the ability to capture and convey the essence of a moment in an unforgettable image, while respecting the power of art to transcend and interpret reality in a unique and subjective way.

The Gaze Gives Meaning To The Penetrating Eyes as they open their gate to the depths of the soul, capturing everything around with that penetrating gaze that discovers the essence beyond appearances. A person with vision has the ability to see beyond the ordinary and find innovative ways to approach any theme and any subject, similar to how the eyes can discover subtle details in art or reinterpret reality in a unique way.

The Gaze Of A Man Lost In His Own Reflection

On January 30, 2021

Everything that takes over you in reality, in the palpable, is seen when you are permanently aware of your own image reflected in the mirror.

I looked at myself in a mirror a long time ago, and I saw my face reflected in another mirror, a much different one, but similar to the one in which I looked at my face another time. And it, captivating, more and more faithful, that mirror became more and more transformed into the face in which I reflected my joys and sorrows, and in which the artist embraces his creation. It was a mirror in a 3D version, its reflection invading my three-dimensional space and the time when the Universe "arranged" to meet me on the same wavelength.

And in that very mirror, in all that space that the universe energetically occupies in the form of photons and temperature, there was an intrinsic expansion that changed the scale of space itself, and I became one with the image of a galaxy in space. But what is meant by this? What does it mean to see myself from a three-dimensional point of view, I who live in a dimension of consciousness beyond time and space, I who have so many times looked at my life perspective, consciously, through a kind of spiritualization of the small universe from which, by the age of twenty-five, I had not emerged at all?

This is what exalted my soul, what delighted my senses. To distance myself from this world, to escape through a kind of quantum, random tunnel, to pass into a parallel universe, through some kind of space-time gates, and to become the reflection of the image of a bright star that looks like a normal eye, just that its functions are superior in the constellation of Gemini.

Or, maybe it was a black hole, whose existence has not been scientifically proven, and which I imagined as a region in space-time with a gravitational force so great that, even if I would have been reduced to nothing, so that I could exist as a reflection of someone who was once Someone Important…

Leadership: Can you build and assume an image that captures reality as it unfolds, and at the same time get an image that repeats itself many times, in many ways?

The basic idea is that anything that could have happened in my past actually happened in a parallel universe, and my reflection in a mirror made it possible for me to move at the maximum possible speed in that universe. That is, the way my time, that of the mirror, has elapsed, must be correlated with what happened in the Universe, during the time that elapsed in the real world of the one who looked in the mirror, only to find that it is the same, and yet different from himself.

And if I looked at myself in a certain way, as the painter does when he establishes his self-portrait as a recognizable pattern, a mark of mystery beyond appearances, it was to be perceived differently than if I had been viewed from the same perspective. No wonder I became an expert in the theory of the existence of parallel universes, a compass in orienting my personality through the mirage of consequences beyond me, given that my involvement in the game of "make a mirror in the Unity of immanence and transcendence" includes the underlying unity of the universe.

It was not an ordinary mirror, but one capable of obtaining another reflection through reflection, like the game of mirrors from a reading from which I was able to extract a character characterized by a noble soul, and whom Alice in Wonderland accidentally discovered within herself, by reflecting herself in a compact mirror, with several stages of brightness, which involved several game worlds.

Indeed, reflecting in that special mirror, I hoped to access a portal to a parallel dimension, justified by the creation of an ideal that transcends the present, and in which the artist looks at his work with immortal eyes. "Who in the world am I? Ah, that's the great puzzle." Perhaps if I multiplied my existence in other worlds, in another section of the same divine plan, I would be able to multiply indefinitely in a universe of existential units.

Leadership: Are you able to build a world of your own by filtering the image that, by passing through your own soul, gives rise to a dual entity capable of serving a rapidly expanding segment of reality?

No wonder then that what I saw in the mirror is different from what I looked at myself, thinking that everything that reflects me in the concave reality of a human nature (of a depth and a vivacity as is rarely produced at a small scale by the reflection of the universe), is a well-structured self-image in the direction of a virtual life. And I think that's where it all started, with my installation in a game of mirrors that puts two strangers face to face: one who would like to know the other, and one who knows the other, but doesn't know himself.

Because the temptation of the mystery beyond appearances, the ruling class of my mind accompanied by temporal and spatial coordinates, so imposed by external forces, requires a sensitive approach and a weighted selection of what can be represented in the imagination, much less to what can be perceived. And if I understood something from the point of view of mirrors, although in some situations the internalization of new reflections can become a means of conformity and manipulation, it is that I cannot contradict my un-reflected self.

And if I were to look again in the same mirror, with the same eyes with which I looked in other mirrors, hoping to see myself different, or at least the same, but a little more intensely illuminated by a special symbolism, by the unearthly, constant gleam of a single glow, and if I were to stand next to a large mirror called "parity symmetry", then I would really differ from the one which I realized I resemble to a full extent, but it is never the same.

As Alice said in the Land of Mirrors: "If I had a world of my own, everything would be nonsense. Nothing would be what it is, because everything would be what it is not. And conversely, what is, would not be, and what would not be will be. See?"

The great revelation of my creation is a mediation between all the experiences of life lived in reality, but available in a separate space, proposed as boundless.

The Gaze Of A Man Lost In His Own Reflection is directed towards two concomitant images of the same man. A man like me would have the same eye on cosmic proportions if seen in the light of the utmost sincerity as a projection of the inexorable will that created or wrote the world.

Or as one Borges character put it: "The story of my life is a reflection of who I was as I wrote it."

The Gaze Of Eyes That Understood The Secret Of Sight

On July 06, 2021

Learn to differentiate between what comes from within you in the form of reflection, and the result of interacting with an outside element.

My eyes stare at the way a mosquito rotates chaotically around the flowers, as if it can't find its place in such a spacious garden. Perhaps her field of vision has access to a more synthetic vision, with a rhythmically articulated compositional structure, similar to the painter's eye that captures every detail of a great art image. The space that the mosquito wants to traverse, surrounded by colors, so generous, orderly, I try to imagine as a double process of comparison between the Renaissance and the beginnings of the Enlightenment, to unravel the enigmatic content of a scriptural alchemy, in a Panorama world.

The fly also has a free spirit, just like the artist's, wanting to overcome any captivity, wanting to shine among the colors of a garden in which roses rule until late autumn. Every painter started his career at the "fly" level, because its eyes must learn to observe the world, first of all, from a thorough analysis, extremely solidly documented, with a very clear logical thread.

That is how things stand when talking about art. Before you start giving an interpretation from effect to cause, focusing on the possibility of formulating new compositional schemes, you need to reach a very good understanding of the environment from which come the most creative and impactful attributes of the incident.

Leadership: Can you represent your vision in the best possible way through the power of transfiguration given to the artist, a real one, able to convert a living image into an aesthetic factor?

The fly. This personification of nature did not return to life in the form of a Merlin from the legend of the Grail, the legend of an imaginative and generous intellectual, but seems to be rather related to the "Obsession of Primary Unity" that dominated Michelangelo's entire existence. The great artist said that: "Everything around, in essence, presence or fiction, the painter first has in mind, then passes them into his hands, and they are indeed able to form a harmony embraced by sight, as reality itself."

It is not in vain that the fly flies, flies, flies, flutters around every flower in my garden, because it also wants to be caught as a living witness of the action and as a living example of creation, of the painter's dedication to capturing the spectacle of nature.

Wait and see. The mosquito is part of a painting that shows the evolution of a phenomenon of combining several art forms over a long period of time. Not for nothing, I try to associate his undulating, silent, simple flight with a certain pattern of personality traits present in that painter who, at one point, declared: "I am... a blotch of color."

Rather, the fly is a pole of personality traits, relational to the sensory and intuitive, functions that collect information from the external environment, through perception. The extrovert focuses on the outside world, and of course the mosquito takes its energy from the defining moments of the first sensory experiences made with the unusual smell of flowers.

An artist's vision is supported by his ability to find themes and plastic expressions full of vitality, by noticing a change in the typology of the order that reason discovers at any random moment.

Hit by the resemblance to a painter, whom he began to discover through systematic visual training, thus achieving an improvement in contrast sensitivity, the fly flies, flies, flies, and sees everything in an objective way, in a variant of perspective, in the proportions of the balance given by the bright, vivid shades of perception, contemplation and relation to the Great All.

It is not about that balance of "human geography" created with effort and passion, but about that balance of perfection acquired through a special technique: the representation of the surrounding elements on a natural scale, 1:1.

If I had the sight of the fly, then I would see things clearer, more nuanced, more objective, or maybe more intense. I think that it also wants to be captured in its essence, as the main character of an event immortalized in various paintings. Just like that, let's think of a fly that would like to see the world in watercolor colors. And in this case, wouldn't an experimental study of its personality traits reveal that serene transfiguration of the artist (his sentimental state) into a poetic imaginary with a refined chromaticism?

At an unexpected moment I noticed something interesting. The fly's gaze changes in the brightness of the background on which the painter creates a new image of his fantasy. And there are several possibilities to represent such a view in the pictorial space: from the point of view of the diversity of virtual dialogues with imaginary characters, or from the point of view of the symbolic message that the adoption of a reality suggests to us. I pretended not to see it) represented by the communion variously expressed between man, nature and the living.

Leadership is the way your vision of reality evolves in a context of meanings attributed to the connection between what is seen and what is read, between what is observed and reported, between what is outside of you and what comes from within you in the form of reflection.

The Gaze Eyes That Understood The Mystery Of Sight refers to the way in which the artist finds correspondences between vision and reflection, so that what he expresses through ideas and suggestions is an extension of the experience of discovering the world and, implicitly, the Self.

The Gaze Of The Eyes Illuminated By The Advantage Of An Advanced View

On August 17, 2021

The eyes that know how to see reality in "duality" are the testimony of a change of identity between a reference model of the act of creation and the phenomenon of mirroring in a look as lively as your own.

My eyes do not tire at all when I read from the work of Wilhelm Hauff, especially as my gaze moves from one symbol to another, with the same discretion with which the writer himself lived in his stories through the characters and events of his mind. And the eyes, touched by the image of a dream world, are mechanically directed to the portrayal of a fullness of the deified creature they see and in which only those endowed with the native gift of listening to the thoughts and emotions of an imaginary being believe.

More than that. My eyes, with a direct view of the mind and soul of Hauff's characters, call for the attention of a transforming world in *"The Story of the Ghost Ship"*or "Cold Heart", with a content high above vain disputes, petty interests, and fleeting passions he discovers as a palette of distinct shades, satisfying the human need to access the transcendent, surviving between Struggle and Amen.

I would have liked to be at least a hidden presence in Hauff's stories, such as "The Little Glass Man" or "The Man in the Red Cloak", so that my spirit would withstand any metamorphosis and reach as far as possible with everything that makes up the essence of a new beginning of the road in the adventure of life. I would have liked to be endowed with the wisdom of Musfata and the luck of Caliph the Stork, to be able to fly around the world only with a pair of silk conduits, but more than anything I would have wanted to live that chain of wonderful events that Heaven bequeaths only fairy tales.

It is not in vain that I project my thoughts into this reality, of Wilhelm Hauff, it is not in vain that the look in my eyes captures only a part of the reality of a charade artist, because my attention is divided between two dream worlds, taken out from the pressure of the concrete, reminding me of a previous life, dedicated to the seventh art: the beauty of being one with all things, that is, the "double" succeeded by my transposition into a modified state of consciousness.

Leadership: Are you ready to assign to your vision a template for visualizing the experience of being someone else, in a way that allows you to change your perception of the world after applying the template?

Learn that I have begun to show some interest in Hauff's work, precisely because a spirit that recognizes itself as identical in another remains faithful to the themes that define the Universe: erudition, dream, metamorphosis, abstract symmetries, reflections in mirrors, part and whole, the finite and the infinite, death and immortality. All this leads to the urgent need to postulate eternal return. It is the sound of a distant echo discovered among the landmarks of artistic performance in the individual destiny of directors.

Wilhelm Hauff was concerned with the primordial, obsessive becoming of the ordinary man in some random space — but identical with the power of the spirit, with the ever-renewing decision to force a character to carve out another fate. It can be seen that Hauff was endowed with the power to convert a tragic event into a joyful one, or a poetic message into a proper linguistic form which implies, at the same time, an attitude of the speaker and an objective reference.

I also think that green was Wilhelm Hauff's favorite color, with which he struck the most in his characters, because green symbolizes life, growth, rebirth and eternity, while also representing the color of the vegetation that surrounds us everywhere.

Of course, there are enough readers who are entitled not to give credibility to his fairy tales, especially since in each fairy tale there is something of the essence of his own being, a being always attracted by his own depths, and less by the heights of a creation where something can be seen. more than anyone expects. It is not the place where we are that matters, but the place where the gaze of our eyes turns its attention: to the rising of a star, or to the shape of a leaf in the light hiss of a gust of wind. This is where the art of creation begins...

Leadership: Is the meaning you give to a creation important to your faith in a transcendent time, of a perpetual permanence dominated by the symbol of alterity?

Everyone is entitled to try and challenge Wilhelm Hauff's creation. But the words expressed by his soul in the "Portrait of the Emperor" will forever remain a constellation of literary-artistic experiments, an adornment of grace which God has promised to give to all who ask him to learn the mysteries of the Great Science (entrance to a metaphysical world, superior, beyond space and time, beyond life and death).

"Everyone is entitled to do so, and I can only mourn this man, not overlook a fact: his path on this earth has not followed the path set out. But the world will remember him with other feelings. The elders of the earth do not seem to have learned much from him, perhaps rather the little ones. He made his way as uplifting as Alexander, he followed Caesar, the world thanked him as Hannibal, on that rock he lived like Seneca, and his last days were worthy of a Socrates."

And if you read these words a thousand and one times, you would still not realize that faint trace of the steps taken to return to God, inscribed in the infinite space of the Universe, which some discover only by looking very carefully. Remember that the meaning you give to a creation is important for the belief in a great goal or for the belief in a transcendent time, of a perpetual permanence dominated by the enigmatic word "Mutabor" (symbol of alterity and dream).

The vision you have of leadership is the same as eyesight pointed towards a double of yourself.

This does not necessarily mean living something similar to the experiences of someone else's life, but to correctly perceive the reality of someone else that only by telling it from your point of view do you have the chance to become one with it. I do not say this in vain, because I lived, for a few moments, in the reality determined by the truth of someone else, no less real than mine.

The Gaze Of The Eyes Illuminated By The Advantage Of An Advanced View belongs to artists who can reproduce the brilliance and expressiveness of the personality traits of their characters through a double reflection: a reflection of the inner world and a reflection of reality that transcends what is transient.

The Gaze Selects What The Soul Seeks

The visual perception of the external world mirrors the depth and complexity of the observer's inner landscape.

In a garden full of life, a midge frantically searches for its place, with that inexhaustible determination of small beings. But he is looking for his place just as the artist, in his becoming, seeks through his senses to know and understand the world. Its chaotic flight, like the trajectory of an electron in an atom in a state of maximum energy, perfectly illustrates the theory of chaos in complex systems, but at the same time it denotes, just like in art, that harmony hidden in the apparent disorder. Each seemingly random movement of the fly is part of a larger pattern, invisible to the unobserved eye - just like the destinies of people in the great tapestry of existence.

Flowers, in their chromatic diversity, represent the full spectrum of my emotions: red roses - unbridled passion; yellow daisies - the simple joy of life; purple tulips - the mystery of the unknown. This garden is not just a botanical ecosystem, but a verdadero mandala de mi psyche , where every petal and every leaf has its precise place in the great earthly design. Eye perspective directly influences the interpretation and emotional response to stimuli.

After all, what is more important, other than knowing that the work that your eyes bring to life, Alethesira Icnusemut Ulgarorium , is the expression of a world created for the pleasure of the imagination, a testimony of your inner beauty and confidence spread around through the eyes of to say what his soul desires. Because of this, perhaps, the main objective of the image in which I frame my soul is related to the research and full exploitation of the constructive potential of colors that the artistic gift of existing in a world without borders gives me, where imagination merges with the reality.

Leadership: Can you focus on a single perspective by the way your eyes maintain a precise and clear view as the distance to the object being viewed shrinks?

Musculita, in her "Azenthopia Floralis" (that state of existential anxiety produced in front of the overwhelming beauty of the world), is like a modern Ulysses, sailing on the sea of uncertainty, looking for an Ithaca of the meaning of life, but also an indispensable condition for creation: " Peripheral vision captures the essence of the whole, so that the details merge into a holistic view of reality."

Her frantic flight, seen from above, seems to draw Lorenz's equations, which are the basis of chaos theory, reminding me that from apparent chaos the most sublime order can be born. Of course, in the cosmic dance of existence, every beat of a wing can unleash a hurricane of meaning. Therefore, the midge, with its ancient wisdom, also plays the role of a Socrates of the garden, provoking a dragonfly to a maieutics of the self:

- What are you looking for, little one? What do you seek so fiercely in this whirlwind of existence?

The dragonfly's answer mirrors the fundamental dilemma of quantum physics - Heisenberg's uncertainty principle:

- I don't know exactly what I'm looking for. Maybe a place to rest, or maybe just find something I haven't discovered yet.

The more precisely the dragonfly tried to define its position in life, the more unclear its inner impulse became, and the more abstract and ineffable its art appeared.

In this moment of "artheosia", the fusion between art and epiphany, the fly realized that, like quantum particles, it exists simultaneously in all possible states until the moment of "observation" or self-awareness. The entire garden becomes a quantum field of infinite possibilities. Visually, the world turns into personal experience. Basically, what you see when you look inside is what art reveals on the outside.

Leadership: What is your role as an "observer" in the transformation of artistic potential into a concrete work, knowing that the perception you choose later influences the surrounding reality?

Aren't people, in their artistic, harmonious, meaningful essence, like this quantum fly, existing simultaneously in multiple states of consciousness until the moment of self-observation? Isn't their feverish search for the meaning of life, beyond the ephemera of the present moment, the macroscopic equivalent of Bohr's principle of complementarity, where the clarity of one aspect of our existence inevitably obscures others? And doesn't art serve as a bridge between these seemingly contradictory states, just as simplicity often hides depth?

Nature serves as a mirror for human introspection and self-analysis. Finally, the fly finds its resting place on a daisy, in a moment of instant enlightenment. This seemingly simple choice, but like a morphine for the mind trained to notice what is hidden as a message behind reality, is actually the result of a complex existential algorithm, similar to the one used by nature itself in the process of natural selection. Musculita had unknowingly discovered the principle of minimum action in analytical mechanics, choosing the optimal path through the maze of possibilities.

Leadership: How does the idea of simultaneity of possible states of mind, up to the moment of observation of a contemplative gaze, manifest itself in the various interpretations of your artistic work?

The story of the fly thus becomes a quantum parable of the human condition, a fractal dance between determinism and free will. It reminds us all of the words of Werner Heisenberg:

"The first glass of wine we drink for thirst, the second for pleasure, the third for insolence, and the rest without number."

So we too, in our search for the meaning of life, begin with necessity, continue with curiosity, and reach transcendence, only to discover that the answer has always been within ourselves, like an existential QR code hidden in our soul's DNA. And you, reader, in which equation of your existence resides the unknown variable of creative inspiration? What quantum principle governs the flight of your thoughts in the garden of infinite possibilities of artistic rendering of inner reality?

Where does your mind fly in the garden of life, when you seek the essence of the creative experience?

The way to understand leadership is similar to the way a fly flies: seemingly chaotic, but with a precise goal in mind. And to understand art you have to be everywhere, and at the same time focus on every detail.

The gaze selects what the soul seeks when the longing for beauty and harmony becomes an existential need, like the fly's need to merge with the pulsating rhythm of the surrounding nature, to discover the nectar hidden in the heart of flowers, or to find a place to rest in the vast garden of the world. Do not forget that the eyes are windows through which the soul explores the universe of nature.

The Gaze That Is Mirrored In The Eye That Captures The Immediate

On March 18, 2020

In order for the entire creation of your mind to take an expressive form, first learn to look carefully at a moving image.

A leaf, full of iridescence, undulates its shape in the spring wind. It falls slowly, in the sublime of a moment's demonstration, then rises again, in the sublime of an artistic act. Because it is seen through the eyes of an artist, whose gaze encompasses everything that the leaf gives birth to in a photographic imagination, he having the power to move in the horizon of creation any drop of color.

Velvety, soft, tender. I see it as if I saw myself flying with angel wings in a renaissance painting. The leaf also has a name, Marhessyl, or "the one that flies towards the west".

That's all you need to turn yourself into a masterpiece. A leaf. To feel it is a great thing; to make others feel it, this is the attribute of the artist to be the means of transposing beauty into matter. You would capture the charm, you would admire the shape in the wind, in the golden rays of the sun, it is a testimony of the sublime dialogue between the depth of the look I dreamed of and the respite to enrich my soul in places where I never set foot.

Finally, the freedom to look is the reason for the eye to tell its vision about what art means, about what it means to be a visual narrator.

I met another leaf, enchanted by the spell of a magician, stirred by the magical words of an enlightenment, very close to the evolution of an adventurous soul in a world full of masks, beyond words. I still don't know if she was aware of how I perceived her: as a simple female figure, of noble elegance, in the sea of people passing through my left and right. Or as an illusion. Or as an acting challenge to which I had to respond positively, trying to imitate her commotion, swinging her from side to side. Or as a discreet, unostentatious participation in a dance of passion.

I still don't know if she saw me with the eyes with which I saw her, but I know that my gaze was reflected in her colors, green and red, suitable for the "make-up" of her eyes.

Leadership: Are you able to manifest your artistic skills using that positioning of the gaze in the middle of nature, on an active presence in the organization of creation, in order to offer a vision that imposes the purity and simplicity of things?

To realize the value of a man who acts according to the plan of nature, towards the purpose of Creation and the return to the Creator, ask him about a leaf that has just come off the branch. And to make a leaf enter the space of your heart, the moment you can look at it as through a canvas painted in multiple colors, here's how to approach it. From several perspectives:

- If you are a painter and do not know how to turn a leaf into a picture full of harmony, it means that you do not know how to see the beauty of nature, and you probably do not know anything about the psychology of colors.

- If you are a doctor, and you do not know how to observe a leaf well, especially its peculiarities at different times, it means that you do not know much about the disease that your patients suffer from.

- If you are a mechanic and do not know how to see in the movement of the leaf taken by the wind a new use of the engine, it means that you lack vision.

- If you are a composer and fail to synchronize your musical notes, amplify or reduce the sound effects after the endless shades of rust of the leaf that falls on the calm mirror of the water of a lake, it means that you lack the flair to merge several techniques of mastering, mixing.

- If you are a director and you can't boost the play of images created by the various movements of the leaf taken by the spring wind, it means that you lack the flair to return the audience's perception from "the need to know" to "the beauty of knowing".

For the whole creation of your mind to take an expressive form, first learn to look carefully at a leaf, learn to penetrate its existence, its form, inside its cells, then lift it into the air only with the power of thought and take it to where it can become the center of admiration for a masterpiece.

You can make leadership the culmination of creation when the object of your attention is between the obvious and the subtle, provided you consider it as the center of admiration for a masterpiece.

The Gaze That Is Mirrored In The Eye That Captures The Immediate measures the distance between the obvious and the subtle, by the fact that everything you include in an image can have valences for personalizing reality, from materialism to idealism.

The General Indicator Of Performance

On April 07, 2009

When you become able to manage your reactions, thoughts and attitude, then you are ready to approach others in an effective manner.

A friend of mine told me a joke, which reads:

A lodger was yelling at his janitor:

- Come here quickly, my mother-in-law wants to throw herself out the window !

- And why do you need me?

- She cannot open the window.

Leadership: Can you yourself be the antithesis of what others think, provided you believe that what you set out to do needs no further obligation or change?

To position yourself better in inter-human relationships, you must direct yourself to that feasible area in terms of results that you get when you connect with them. What differentiates an excellent leader from a mediocre one is exactly that availability to raise to the level of competence regarding the coordination process of his emotions, to strengthen those bonds that unite him with others.

However, some leaders resemble that lodger – they find it difficult to make a connection with people they dislike and they ruin even more an already complicated situation, attracting others in their approach. They put their leadership in a bad position, by positioning in an area where their negative qualities and values are directly exposed. Such leaders never start from the question: "How can you make sure that you don't separate yourself from other people?", before operating their capacity to raise their level of competence.

Just as a model of camera may have advantages over other models on the market thanks to its better and more constant performance measurable throughout the ISO range – so the model of your leadership may have advantages over the model generated by other leaders, thanks to your better and more constant performances in inter-human relationships.

Leadership: Do you think that the process of capturing the emotion felt when making a decision is the main factor that helps you see the situation from another angle, even if it means enduring your ignorance and your own guilt?

To be yourself in antithesis to what other people think means to evaluate your life and decisions according to the events that you think are taking place in a certain way, not to convince them of the correctness of your arguments about the need of formulating a new idea about reality.

Your leadership model can be translated by the way you relate to those around you. This model does not bring you any benefit if you don't fulfill your potential through them.

Limiting your leadership potential by failure to observe a code of ethics, by restricting those perceptions and healthy thinking positively affects people – it is like going to a game of chess with a baseball bat. However, you will not be able to win any "match" just because you will not even be received in the contest.

Leadership is a contest in which people are the stake - you can win them on your side if you turn them into game partners, not opponents. In leadership, you are the only opponent. You can declare yourself defeated if people draw away from you. When you become able to manage your reactions, thoughts and attitude, then you are ready to approach others in an effective manner. Do you limit yourself to the chessboard or the baseball bat?

Leadership is about how you know yourself when you are influenced by the decisions of others, given that what makes you stronger is your ability to guide other people's behavior.

The General Indicator Of Performance is given by your close collaboration with people. It is given by that combination of values and principles by which you guide yourself in order to accept others as they are and get them as close as possible to you. Is your leadership model a magnet for other people? Or is it a baseball bat in a game of chess? Do you have to revise your model?

Conclusion: The general indicator of a leader's performance is reflected in the feedback received from his team in terms of quality of work, cooperation and mutual assistance, as well as in terms of aligning to the required standards.

The Genesis Of The Idea Of Intellectual Film

On January 02, 2009

The creative process often develops by involuntarily returning to early impressions, which can trigger significant breakthroughs in works of art.

But at the base of this artistic solution was still a memory of childhood, the period to which the genesis of the idea of the intellectual film must be traced. Unconsciously, intuitively, director Eisenstein discovered the mentioned solution by recreating an impression from his childhood in relation to Daumier's caricatures. He had then known the graphic variations around the pear that symbolized Louis-Philippe. From the portrait of the monarch, one reached, through reduction to the essential limits, up to the graph of the peerage.

Now, after more than two decades, Eisenstein discovered the unconscious connection between Philippe's pear and what he had done in "October". Because the essence of his artistic method was the following: with the means of montage, he created a sequence of images in the extremes of which were a splendid baroque deity and a primitive idol. The editing suite merged the two seemingly disparate images, joining them.

Leadership: How could a visual narrative influence your perception of reality, giving you a new understanding of the relationships between different forms of expression?

The caricature was born. The cinematic image expressed, plastically, therefore, an abstract theme: the grotesque identity between the Christian cult and the primitive divinity, the emptiness that hides behind the worshiped idols. Experience, the impression from childhood was the involuntary trigger of the genesis mechanism of a unique artistic solution. Involuntary and not calculated, because Eisenstein did not realize this parentage until after the film was made.

From the "montage of attractions", a purely emotional effect, it now reaches "intellectual attraction". He also writes a manifesto in this regard, entitled "Perspectives", which does not appear, however. "October" includes all the variety of such an intellectual montage. The metaphor is presented in the most different formulas.

Leadership: How would you perceive a work of art that, by reducing forms to their essentials, gives you a framework to explore the complexity and diversity of human experiences?

The intuitive process of abstraction in modern art, exemplified by Daumier's works, resonates strongly with Eisenstein's directorial methodology. By reducing the forms to the essential limits, the artist opens new paths for interpretation, similar to how Eisenstein merged disparate images in "October" - from baroque deity to primitive idol. This montage sequence of images not only simplifies the narrative, but also underscores the genesis of the idea of intellectual film, connecting seemingly unrelated historical and cultural moments into a new aesthetic synthesis that explores human and historical complexity, like Eisenstein's childhood memory of his caricatures Daumier deeply influenced the graphic variations of Louis-Philippe's portrait.

Caricature was born, a phenomenon whose depth resonated throughout the entire spectrum of the cinematic image. This expressed, through its plasticity, an abstract theme: the grotesque identity between the Christian cult divinity and the primitive ones, revealing the emptiness that was hidden behind the worshiped idols. Thus, childhood experience and memories became an involuntary catalyst of the genesis mechanism of an original artistic solution. This was not a calculated act, for Eisenstein did not realize this parentage until after the film was made, illustrating how cinematic space, as an extension of personal and collective space, continually shapes and reconfigures our perceptions and sensibilities.

Leadership: Could each character you create be seen as a manifestation of an inner struggle where your soul confronts and ultimately expresses its complexities through art?

Cinematic caricature was a manifestation of the inner life of the artist, inferior to his native creative potential, full of contradictory possibilities. As in the case of every human being, where even gender identity, with all its apparent signs, only later acquires a clear definition, the cinematic image expresses this inner struggle. Through Eisenstein's caricature, this "bio-psychological drop" turns into an original artistic solution, where the Christian cult divinity is represented in a grotesque, almost idolatrous form, thus demystifying the worshiped idols.

The directorial experience, initially involuntary, served as a trigger for this deep introspection. The gradual personalization of his cinematic theme represents a unitary selection, a forced convergence of many contradictory elements, such as atavism, heredity, environment, and education, all cooperating to eliminate the original, fecund chaos. In this process, the centripetal elements are stimulated, while the centrifugal ones are inhibited.

In the end, man, and especially the artist, manages to overcome this chaos. His secret soul remembers all these internal struggles, and thus life fecundates in its chaotic plasma characters that illustrate an abstract but deeply personal theme. From this fertilization, not only the characters are born, but also the unique artistic solutions of his film.

The personalization of leadership may reflect a maturation of artistic thought, moving from confusion to clarity through the theme of a work of art.

The genesis of the intellectual film appears as a complex process that combines elements of the artist's memories, experiences and intuitions. By reinterpreting childhood memories, Eisenstein manages to create a connection between the artistic symbols of the past and his innovative methods of the present.

Drawing inspiration from Daumier's caricatures and the image of the monarch Louis-Philippe transformed into a pear, Eisenstein applies the principle of montage to juxtapose contrasting images, from the baroque deity to the primitive idol. This juxtaposition of disparate but complementary images allows him to express complex and abstract ideas, bringing to life a profound and innovative artistic vision.

The Genius Of His Own Mind

On May 25, 2016

Conserve your strengths as a knower to the reference temperature of your index of "awareness", initializing a unique reconciliation of all contrasts that are reabsorbed into a single unit.

As I got to know more things that represented and inspired me, with a trace of satisfaction, the more I found out that I knew less about myself, realizing that so often the credible and relative connect to a network isolated from the world. Especially in this state of impartial reflection on what turns out to be inaccurate, a masterpiece of looking into an endless mirror, a symbol of the shortcoming of living through the quibbling of question marks is installed.

Behind the analogy with this relationship between two different planes of reference there is absolutely nothing, no instantaneous power of some existential side that can easily lead to a state of harmony, but to a sort of background evolution that defeated the small or big predispositions to being bohemian. Each new step was only a unique reconciliation of all contrasts that were reabsorbed into a single unit.

The doubts and approximations entailed by the attempt to establish myself in the peculiarities of a perspective optimized through the prevention of major defects of my being, its ups and downs, defined according to the relationship between positive and negative, were relative. Especially if I would have to generalize the notion of complex power.

The conservation of my powers of a knower to the reference temperature of my index of "awareness", through so many means of adapting to a life full of meaning, under the blows of sincerity that often preferred to hurt rather than be silent, was the first step towards gaining a calm and focused mind.

Leadership: Are you prepared to get involved in the event of revealing a new sense of existentiality, the discovery of a solitary world transposed into a foreign world set to face the consequences of a self-evident image through the confessional and emotional tone?

With time, I would come to realize that the mind that automatically gave me symbolic compensations for every hidden challenge, illusions of mad, mischievous fools, played the role of a game of imaginary content, a game of cat and mouse where we did not know who was following who. My genius has excelled in my enjoyment of life in terms of the need to engage in a trap game without becoming the prisoner of the unwritten rules of an entire enigma, near a less transient reality.

I agree with the one who said: the more you are more than nothing, the more you feel the loneliness of the matter you're made out of. Truly, I have paid for the optimization of a transformation that indicated a power reactive to the terminals of the meaning things had for me, equal to power's way of being aware of their threat to life. But without personally seeing the benefits of a higher self-expression, freer and more complete.

Also, I understand very well what Miranda Grey from work of Fowels meant, when she tried to describe Clegg. "Anything that is asked of him to pay for without him personally seeing what he's spending his money on seemed suspicious to him. He trusts no world other than the one he experiences and sees. He is the true prisoner. In his present, narrow, and repulsive world."

When you try to restore that part of you that desperately tries to see things from another perspective, sometimes wanting you to look at them, knowing that somewhere in the middle is the truth, that subtle matter that you can model through the will of being tied to a state that cannot be kept under control, only then do you start to feel separated from the world.

Leadership: Can you define the unique center of a new being, for which the "power" catalyst to become explicable in your essentiality?

Your trajectory in the equation of evolution can be represented in contact with the ineffable areas of your being, which make the transition from a road less travelled to one of high transit. The more you feel the loneliness of the matter you're made out of, the more intense you experience a dominating feeling, such as that of existence in relation to identity and otherness, the more your immense projection of images of a world in which people aspire to serenity shores is revealed.

Your representativeness at a level of a measure of the strength to face loneliness, which can be associated with abandon, can be proof of your development along a major axis. This value axis encompasses the need to recognize yourself tied to the essentiality of an emancipated identity and of a strong solidarity, which is what you cannot find in the outside world.

Essentiality is a path to other realities, stemming from the combining of elements of value extracted from the fight with yourself, from conversations and counseling with yourself, for the raising of a new entity of the type Form-Thought that allows for the perfect adaptation to any orientation on the terminal area of maturity.

The unique center of a new being is projected on the structure of the sincerity with which you face various emotions, which accompany your transformation into a different man, willing to not let himself defeated by anything or anyone, feeling free in the face of consciousness to separate himself from the rest of the world. Through this we understand that it is not enough to find out as much about yourself as possible, according to the relationship between positive and negative, from the need to recuperate yourself, to make yourself whole again, to feel somewhat "grandiose", but rather it is more important to not consume yourself in an attempt to reconcile with yourself, with your past, with your mistakes. You risk not being able to trust any world other than the one you experience and see.

The one who experiences "that loneliness that no-one knows" addresses the hidden corners of leadership, closely linked to the social-human condition, from a double aspect.

The first aspect concerns the impossibility of adapting to a world in which imprisonment becomes his only quality that recommends itself to authentic self-knowledge, nothing else existing outside of it. The other concerns the establishment of a direction of the ideal compatibility between the common being and the genius of his own mind, able to cover an extremely high dose of plentitude obtained from the desire of seeing things from the perspective of a complex definition of essentiality.

Genius is the quality of a man who knows how to integrate himself into a world he does not understand, without making himself the only survivor in a deserted island.

The Genius Of His Own Mind is the one who experiences a unique reconciliation with all contrasts that are reabsorbed into a single unit. He is a symbol of the role played by the man who reveals himself in a double aspect: that of a result of adapting to the imprisonment of his own world. And that of a facilitator of a new attitude in the face of life that results from the position take in the face of the power to manifest himself through what it means to be... vulnerable.

The Gifted Leader

On March 15, 2017

Be able to refresh your mortal condition, qualifying yourself in the first final of a long series of certitudes stemming from scavenging the mysteries woven around unexpected events.

I am Gerry Lane, an intuitive evolutionist, a chemist by the curiosity with which I address the unexpected results of experiments strictly related to genetic mutations, a humanist through moral and spiritual structure, always having respect for everything that can be called an exact science. Thanks to me, penetrating with a rare instinct of a researcher all areas of unknown dangers, the evil of this world faces an approachable adversary which it is obligated to defeat in order to maintain distance from a new chapter of medicine.

Survival, my struggle against contracting the virus, is the first final in a long series of certitudes stemming from scavenging the mysteries woven around unexpected events. The difficulty part is seeing the crumbs as clues. What I thought I had seen – the most brutal aspect of the virus, can prove to be the very chink in the armor.

My poetry applied to a defensive medicine, psychological, and yet Christian, based on the merciful love of the one afflicted, has its own genetic universe, uniting many cells and even more afflictions into a unique event with a unique finale. And my condition of an artist in finding the foundation offered by the enigmatic lyrics of nature, for only nature has a cure for any grave illness and any severe affliction, resides in the speed with which the virus propagates, this magnificent example of creating a connection with the causes of neurodegenerative disorders of the illness that affects the other connections of the central nervous system.

Leadership: Can the appropriate conclusions from broadening your horizons of knowledge transpire in the image of a true force of nature, by association with the life expectancy that the positive interpretation of a role of heavy and harsh responsibility estimates for you?

I wonder, from a point of view strictly related to my physical and mental abilities, what is the direction in which I am going if I could explain the connection between complex afflictions of the contaminated subjects and the deadly disease due to these misleading bacteria, this invasive cancer?

Even from this moment I am lamenting my passion for detecting genetic errors from alternations of painful moments and the negative effects of nature phenomena, which create the deep need of raising the chances of living according to all the harsh laws of science. I will not be a witness to the end of the world, nor will I resort to accusation, I will not admit to being a messenger of those transpired. I will play the role of an interpreted of the language of nature's signs.

To understand the nature of the phenomenon is to explain it. I would be tempted to believe that natural selection kept me as an additional control system of the longevity of this world and of life expectancy. Maybe, I am the Legend. And, perhaps, the role of great responsibility that belongs to me, as a survivor, as a scientist, is to be myself stronger than what can enslave me: the cowardice of letting myself be caught up in keeping appearances alive.

Leadership: Is your attitude towards what you have to accomplish through a phase of forcing the limits of proficiency required to be diagnosed by announcing what you leave behind?

The essence of an authentic life, by consciously assuming the importance of maintaining its verticality, even if it involves a defiance of the order of a world based on secondary realities, is characterized by a predominance of emotions of the type "I will do everything in my power on the basis of what I am compelled to change."

In the nature of this power of assuming a clear position of responsibility presents itself, in fact, the very structure of conception of a megastructure of faith benefiting from the miracle of revealing a new meaning of existence and of a new status in the world.

The great challenge of knowledge, leaving aside the interpretation of various scientific truths, can be assesses as you manage to protect and expand the nature of what sets you apart through what you leave behind as a discovery.

And what you leave behind, focusing on building a great power of resonance through your own existence, is a reflection of the experience of finding new ways of telling everyone of the "miracle" of a new beginning.

The most advanced knowledge, largely dominated by the belief in something that can be formulated through an additional control of longevity, especially if an elixir of immortality is to be found, can be identified with the man who manages to turn himself from a hostage of survival into a master of survival.

Before measuring your evolution in leadership, try to survive the ambition to surpass yourself in the face of a miracle that defies the rules of science, from which the revelation of an unsuspected reality triumphs.

The Gifted Leader is a model of rethinking the mortal condition in an evolutionary framework that outlines the "miracle" of survival.

One of the high-level leadership features is to refresh your mortal condition by proclaiming the miracle of survival until this condition becomes an indispensable element of revealing yourself to others as a movement of thought that renews and regenerates life expectancy.

The Glow Of A Sensation Of Reawakening

On December 17, 2016

Develop yourself as a consequence of observation taken beyond obvious findings so as to reach the consciousness of a new dimension.

I moved easily from one stage to another, when everything was losing its meaning, like the form of some enigmas no longer aroused suspicion, telling myself so many times, in a constant search of every drop of change, that other questions awaited me, other answers, at my next passing from a block of "analysis" based on the transformation of hidden causes. Nothing in the meaning of the things I was deepening, in the riddles I was trying to unravel, seemed to be limited in my consciousness in terms of the things around me, which seemed to urge me to adopt an attitude of withdrawal, la disponibilità di essere vulnerabili, and pretend I don't see, hear or care.

He who once tasted the fretting pleasure of virtual journeys into a space of abundance of color, forms, and strong subjects, who tasted the spicy drunkenness, foaming of such a foolish escape from the real, he is the one who burns from the desire of always experiencing it again, acting with integrity on a system of personal redefining.

What I observed around me, carefully but also with a certain dose of uncertainty, the things that assailed me through their very wide variety, was directly proportional to the entry into a kind of fiction of John Fowles, full of masks, complicated sets and dozens of different poses. Basically, I was experiencing the sensation of a fantastic trip to a familiar land, but without knowing where to start, what to start once I reached my destination.

I was just like that girl, Rachel, from the movie "The Girl on the Train" who goes every morning on the same train to a known destination. She always sees the same things, she remembers others, and her life seems devoid of any joy, no expectation makes her heart beat faster. Her life seems bland, an endless drama. Until one day she sees something that shocks her. Everything changes and Rachel has the chance to take part in the lives she has observed only from the sidelines.

Leadership: Does the experience you have by traveling the distance from one point to another have as its main determinant the promise of a particular revelation, such as: "I am someone other than I am in reality"?

And, suddenly, everything changes, things take on a meaning, life begins to be lived with bathed breath. To paraphrase a great writer, such a man throws himself again and again into the foamy, fiery waves of devouring anguish, only to relive that "charming sense of self-importance", this golden drunkenness that replaces and surpasses a thousand times over all vulgar stimulants, alcohol, and nicotine.

In fact, it was a process of personal reforming by exercising forces of interaction with a sort of state of completeness, the feeling of endless imagination, along several corridors, with a character of deification in relation to the accessories of a time that doesn't take charity. From here it would start the increasingly comprehensive drafting of a sublime character, of a portrait full of authenticity that could honor the ideal dimension of a new consciousness.

The feeling that everything was true and revealing, as if in a sort of reality born out of an untamed force, the feeling of being something, of having done something important that attracts all this light of ineluctable rationality into a place presumed to be infallible, when between the last degree of perfection and the first degree of doubt it is impossible to make a direct calculation, it seemed to reveal something to me. Something with symbolic, bookish, and magical connotations.

However, I would like to not be taken by surprise by such a feeling, for when you try to be more than you are, slowly but surely you begin to drift away even from the shore of revelation and you start diving into someone other than yourself.

Leadership: Can you engage in a process of personal reforming by exerting forces of interaction with a sort of perfect state from which a new consciousness can grow?

In the famous novel "The Magician", writer John Fowles compares this feeling that I was also experiencing with a star found not closer, but in a state of isolation, like when viewed through a telescope:

"The star was not part of a constellation, it floated alone in a black and blue space, in a void. I remember how I saw the star on a globe of white light, which produces and absorbs the space in which it is found, me being at the other end, suspended in a space of darkness. I watched the star, the star watched me. We were in equal positions, in balance, two equal dimensions, if one can speak of the consciousness of a certain dimension. It seemed to have lasted for a while, I don't know how long. Two bodies suspended in the same way, opposed in the same way, devoid of meaning and effect. The feelings of beauty, moral, divine, of geometry were replaced by the feeling of situation as any animal perceives it."

He who knows and feels nature and the charm of revelations, which sometimes have symbolic consequences throughout life, often lets himself moved here and there in the journeys of his successive existential torments, leaving the alleys of ordinary forms of experience. He constantly seeks an answer to his troubling existential questions through the extension of a way of identifying with an ideal image, an image he would like to achieve or pretend it to be the hope, wisdom, and understanding beyond the obvious and the physical.

Before defining leadership, exclusively dependent on the objective elements of perception of the reality you compose and present there needs to be an attempt to define the concept of an image of which you could say: behold, this I could only see by diving into a certain state, into a different role, into a place in which I can find myself and help me overcome my failures.

The man who experiences the possibility of observing everything from the perspective of exploring an image from a different angle, applied to a symbolic constant, will always plead for the existence of a different, spiritual dimension, fuller of meaning, beyond that of the usually perceived world.

And the man who takes his thinking to a higher level is the one who forms and imposes as a consequence of observation taken beyond the usual findings, managing thusly to reach the consciousness of a new dimension. A dimension of what you are that results from the content of an act of individual living.

And such an act of living evolves based on what you perceive in comparison with something that exists through the things you follow, through the aspects that feed your inspiration.

The Glow Of A Sensation Of Reawakening highlights that boundlessness of feelings belonging to the man who wants to continue his knowledge beyond what appearance is at a certain point. Thus, it is initiated the increasingly ample outlining of a sublime character, a portrait full of authenticity that can honor the ideal dimension of a new consciousness.

The Glow Of The Void In Listening

On December 23, 2016

Your true greatness begins where words end.

I woke up suddenly in total darkness, in the state of concealing those things committed in a disallowed manner of total freedom. My psychology no longer that of a straight line, of one path, it deepened, branched off in a profound act of probing, conceptually and creatively, as every universe branches out within new universes when a quantum measurement is made.

Everything is allowed in a world that only belongs to you, but the supreme entity of this inner world, Uroshtyam, is perceived only by entering the spiritual realm. Writer Simona Popescu most probably found herself in the same situation as me when expressing her thoughts in the novel Exuvii: "There are intellectual cries, cries that come from a delicate marrow. This is what I call Flesh. I do not separate thinking from life. With every vibration of the tongue, I go all the way back to my own thoughts within the flesh."

My world seemed to be the memory of another world. I was experiencing the ecstasy of a knowledge determined by the presence of an existential fear in the face of the cry of triumph of darkness with which my eyes had accustomed in an attempt to explore a virtual world. Vibrant in this entire act of revelation of the self in an inert medium, cold as a tomb without end, in a case of anxiety, was that unity in diversity, in the use of the faculty of the reason of finding, after the analysis and investigation of the fact, the answers to the question: Could I unlock a perspective of the impossible I wonder?

Leadership: Can you live in the memory of another world by always feeding the Self with continuously other thoughts that continue to face realities that need to be renamed in order to be accepted as objective?

In the center of gravity of concealing those that were given to me to be discovered in the background of contradictions, in the noise of nonexistence that insistently asked for its rights, everything enrolling in a dimension of interiority and the land of immediacy was the very fact of concealing the will as a reflex of the inability to conceive an action. That unproductive drunkenness of waiting, of longing for a miracle. Of the absurd hope that, at any moment, something unexpectedly good would happen to me.

The darkness was becoming darker, on the extension of the hours of insomnia, of strenuous stops in a refusal given to action. The withdrawal into solitude, the feeling of being trapped, imposed, but also desired, on the path of wandering ghosts in the shaky waves of a revolutionary thinking. A relationship experienced with nothingness. This was also one of the thoughts that had to feed the world of the novel "Exuvii", at least to some extent, because like the writer Simona Popescu, I was experiencing the difficulty of a world full of possibilities, with infinite directions from which I had to choose, under the constant pressure of the imperative to be supported by the illusion.

Tension always rises when you enter a state of total expectation, silent, when you basically wait to see what follows, trusting in the feeling of a moral compensation, to know how to deal with the situation conditioned by that ineffable mystery of I AM. My reality was to be renamed within the limits of the interpretation of another world: "I am one of the thin carcasses left behind by the butterflies when they come out of the pupae, one of the shrunken shells of the creatures that, growing up, are completely transformed."

Leadership: Can you gain a deeper understanding of what you are through the experience lived through a manifestation of the inability to escape the perimeter of the void?

I crossed the worlds until I came to face a broader identity, meant to give me more prestige. The butterflies continued their thinking in the hypothesis of a more complex artist. Total transformation. Here is the state of confusion experienced by Urfé Nicholas, John Fowles' hero, in the solitude of the darkness that tried to swallow him, around the spell of a magician that tested his patience, beliefs, and prejudices:

"Then, the tension rise. I was in a sort of expectancy. I was waiting, waiting for something. I did not know if it were to be heard, seen, or otherwise. I knew it was coming, and I tried to discover its coming. It felt that I could no longer perceive any star. Perhaps the magic made me close my eyes. There was only the void. I remember two words that Conchis probably said: glowing, listening. The glow of the void in listening, darkness, and waiting... And this sensation seemed to last forever."

The release from any constraint, from any form of limitation is in fact a journey in search of an answer towards reaching creative perfection, grounded in an answer to the question: Could I unlock a perspective of the impossible I wonder?

For the impossible, tempered by the idea of philosophy according to which "Your true greatness begins where words end", is a coming of a sensation of intense fear that is accompanied by that "Voice of Conscience" able to trigger the running in the psyche of a realistic version of representing yourself on the axis of self-surpassing.

The leader who leads through the potential of wise knowledge of the human being and life is a man who experiences, in unique moments of deep emotion and meaning, always a new side of himself, representing himself as an expression of inner struggle, a consequence of the torments he's been through, his very unity in agreement with the psychology of "waiting in the dark", in the conditions of the void.

The process of building an Ego that wants to grow all the time and unmeasured rests with the writer's remarkable gift of capturing very well the space and time in which he lives, in the authenticity of a world that remains extremely topical even after a certain period has passed since the crossing.

The Glow Of The Void In Listening is a parable of waiting that ends with the evolution of man. This waiting, for the departure of one's origin, of goals and entourages, is not only a manifestation of the lucid presence of the rational over imagination, but rather a merging with the supreme Ego, with what is unlimited, ineffable, divine.

Complete freedom is the result of concealment, departure from the known world, in a period of waiting, analysis, and psychological analysis, having as a specific the discovery of a measure of human dimension in expressing the unity of self.

And this unity of self, this immense confidence in the possibilities of knowledge that succeed the unknown, the void, darkness, waiting, represents in fact that bright column from the very essence of human spirit.

The Goal Of Our Fight For Immortality Is The Freedom Of Mankind

On January 03, 2017

Life and death are linked in a continuous game, where immortality is achieved by contributing to social evolution.

The basic theme of the movie "Que viva Mexico" is: life, death, immortality. Own, older thoughts are mixed here with those born from the atmosphere of Mexico. The artist poses the problem of death and immortality. Biologically we are mortal. Immortality can only be achieved through our contribution to social activity. We are one of those who pass the baton of evolution from the previous generation to the next. "The goal of our fight for immortality, of the people who passed through the volcano of the socialist revolution - thinks Eisenstein - is the freedom of mankind".

The thoughts provoked by the bullfights, which symbolized and metaphorized the general idea in their concreteness, are now reborn in the artist's thinking with another force, in other dimensions. Now takes place the genesis of this guiding thread that orders all the impressions in these worlds, transforming the swirl of sensations into a precise unfolding of the theme. In the gestation of the work, not only the multitude of perceived facts is mirrored, but the very dynamics of the creation process.

This uplifting path to a new life, to new ideas is no longer a simple compositional formula, but the theme itself in the form of a vivid, plastic image, born of countless faces, images, events, customs, festivities, happenings, in which the gods of life and those of death cross their paths. It is a game of life and death here, a contest between life and death.

Leadership: Can you bring out the essence of your soul and create a work that transcends the borders of nations, illustrating freedom as a catalyst for evolution?

Why should we consider human rights? Why should we prioritize the freedom of nations or individuals instead of viewing the world as one unitary organism? Many people ask the question of life and death, immortality. They believe that we are biologically mortal, but immortality can only be achieved by our contribution to social activity, passing the baton of evolution from the previous generation to the next. The goal of our struggle for immortality, of people who have passed through the volcano of socialist revolution, is the freedom of humanity.

As we move through history, we can see the genesis of such a future, ordering the impressions of the past into a coherent line. The thoughts provoked by the bullfights, which symbolized and metaphorized the general idea in their concreteness, are now reborn in the artist's thinking with another force, in other dimensions. Now takes place the genesis of this leading thread which orders all the impressions in these worlds, which turns the swirl of sensations into a precise unfolding of theme. The creative process of mankind is reflected in the dynamics of this process. In the gestation of the work, not only the multitude of perceived facts is mirrored, but the very dynamics of the creative process.

This uplifting path to a new life, to new ideas is no longer a simple compositional formula, but the theme itself in the form of a living, plastic image, born of countless faces, images, events, customs, festivities, happenings, in which the gods of life and the dead cross paths. It is a game of life and death here, a race between life and death. However, the question remains: are we capable of transcending our biological selves and achieving immortality, or are we destined to remain essentially mortal?

Always when an artist refers to leadership, he takes into account the following aspect: "The multitude of facts perceived in the unfolding of the work reveals the genesis of an ordered future through the dynamics of the creative process."

Can the virtue of the struggle against the social order become a powerful symbol in your work, offering a vision of human freedom that transcends mortal limits? How can the artist's thinking bring to light the relevance of the struggle for immortality through his creation, forcefully reborn to other dimensions of existence?

The goal of our fight for immortality is the freedom of mankind, especially in the case of artists who put their heart and soul into their work. Can the dynamics of humanity's creative process bring out the virtues of the artist who transforms the swirl of sensations into a precise unfolding of the chosen theme? How can humanity's creative process reveal the guiding thread that orders all the impressions of the past in a coherent line toward a future of human freedom?

The Golden Apple

Everything you mean in God's plan is a struggle with yourself, out of which the winner is science.

It was a sort of symptom of almost total isolation, from which I could not escape. A phenomenon as difficult to understand as the judgment of God, an area in which I could not evolve except by the measure of the chance of demonstrating that I could use the traps of anxiety, any pain, any emotion, any weakness to my advantage. Of which I had so much to learn and experience, especially the mental state of resistance for the widest possible life.

The passion for understanding this experiment worthy of a complex psychologist, and especially an original psychologist, was an expression of the thirst for knowledge, the same an artist experiences in search of an individualized impression on the relationship between model and attitude, between humanity and artistic value. That's how the Man in the sky wanted, so to speak, to turn your back to the world to recognize the great confidence that you have in yourself and which only science can potentiate.

I believed that God's great plans, created after a code of high difficulty, were modelled after the conception of an art restorer who follows the pattern of thinking operating systems such as analysis, synthesis, comparison, abstraction, and concretization. But equally well they could be the expression of a determinism that acts predominantly and selectively in the intellect, materializing in the raw material of the Great Work.

This experiment of the being who educates the psyche to adapt to new realities reminiscent of the description that Albert the Great made for himself:

"An alchemist must live away from the world in a special house built by himself with the mastery and skill of a mason, where there must be at least one secret room dedicated exclusively to sublimations, solutions and distillations. He will live in solitude, being isolated from the rest of the people, until the completion of the Great Work. He must be patient and persevering until his constellations are favorable. and, finally, he will avoid any contact with the princes and the rulers."

Leadership: Is the effort to appreciate your level of knowledge a cut-off in the segment of a long search and focused on the work of a work that adequately reveals your inner profile?

The novelty effect in the unforgiving black and white of a time forgetting its pride in leaking in the sense of the chance of living an unspoken life in a continuous crisis of expression was a form of structured observation, an intensive laboratory of several consecutive days, dans ma chamber... qui est un endroit calme et loin de tout le monde.

With an increased sensitivity to things that are still unknown, unpredictable and difficult to access, I have come to behave as an experiment of a laborious intelligence upon which only hidden thoughts, doubts, fears are reflected in a mirror that deforms them and accentuates them much more.

I thought I would recognize myself superior to what I was, beyond what I once knew was possible, as a character who breaks out of the story world to share the real world of his adventures.

The Alchemist is an artist in self-knowledge and God in the perspective of a long-term evaluation of the effect of discovering a new world. This discovery is made by consistently reaching the resistance state during the consistent application of the experimental method of knowledge.

An artist of substance and consequence is in constant confrontation with the aesthetics of a black-and-white confession, from which the compromise made in order to preserve its own resistance formula: the consistent application of the experimental method for finding hidden truths to which No one would have thought. It is a result of the peak moment of self-confrontation when you assess the impact of knowledge consumption in order to achieve a new life philosophy.

An incursion into a deeper area of the psyche is a play of detail with the ending ensemble that ends by moving you aesthetically, proving once again that love for what is revealed to you sublimely, in a context of the type "Lost In Your Own Abyss", is a struggle of unending restlessness that makes you listen to one voice. Listen to this vice, it will always utter new truths !

The liberation brought about by the removal from the rest of the world is a cultivation in man of the divine beauty, the likeness to Him, to whom the great victories of science can be attributed.

Having a whole collection of memories and life lessons at your disposal, thousands of experiences and unforgettable moments, to solve a bunch of nuisances, philosophical and identity bugs, I build a new vision for myself of the reality with which I am still in direct contact, although its consciousness seems rather ephemeral. Completely opposite in comparison to the task of a painter that resides precisely in overcoming the timeless frame of the portrait, to make it dynamic, forcing him to live in time.

If I think about it, I was still an artist, through the fact that I was the embodiment of a huge sum of consecutive moments, combined in a struggle with a self that does not let itself be understood, does not let up, in a temporary setting of spiritual essence. In this way, I have noted with pleasure the coincidence of the fact non-conformism, the constant passion and thirst for originality are the forms of expression of the meaning of life.

The true masterpiece of creation is the attachment to the canvas of a most complex and unlimited life experience, which reveals in an exceptional way the inner profile of the one portrayed.

In an attempt to obtain the upside-down image of the soul, with the help of elements given by the deep meanings of reflections and meditations, along with the escape into a vague and paradoxical space of a difficult reality to express in the primary phase, I managed to build a certain figure drawn between spirituality, art, science, and intelligence.

A psychological portrait of an Alchemist who understood that the background – self search, the phase in which take place the "digestion", ripening, regeneration of inner powers, in fact the prime matter of the most complex of experiences, analysed carefully under the microscope of consciousness and the pre-felt by the eye of the artist – is the only pure science that corresponds with the upper part of the Great Work.

The Golden Apple is a continuation of the thinking: "Everything you mean in God's plan is a struggle with yourself from which science is victorious."

The only source of everything that exists, the only secret that alchemists fear to reveal and feel obliged to preserve in the general context of the transformations they experience and suffer, such as metals subjected to very high temperatures is... the struggle.

The Golden Lever Of Leadership

On December 21, 2010

Determined people to realize your inner sense of power, so that they to be able to optimize more effectively the resources necessary to carry out the activities - in accordance with your goals.

Everything began on that late summer night. Colonel Cal Rhodes felt a strange anxiety that thrilled him. He could not sleep, because the living image of his son obsessed him. He could not accept that he died. A small fleck of hope still remained within him, and he could not remove it. He still believed that his son lived, because, after the war in Vietnam, the authorities declared him as being missed in action and not dead. Filled with fear and with a concealed terror, he had to go looking for him without fail and delay.

Since that night, Cal Rhodes was seized by a single thought, which turned into the biggest goal of his life: to save his son from the concentration camp in Laos, since he had received the information that he could find there the last survivors of the war. Even so, he could not achieve his purpose by himself. So he got in touch with the former brothers-in-arms of his son and, with much difficulty, he managed to convince them to give up their peaceful lives for a final rescue mission, but which was extremely dangerous at the same time.

Leadership: Do you hold on to a mission through which others can be aware of the source of your inner power, starting from the premise that feeling is a way to recognize the interaction between remorse, doubt, and synergy?

Cal Rhodes had to hold on this mission, which he alone had planned. His desire intensified by the fear that his son could have been tortured and even killed, determined him to plan carefully the strategy in order to achieve his goal. With a boundless enthusiasm that could break any barriers, Cal trained and prepared the six comrades to face high- risk situations. They formed a close friendship. The sweet taste of this association was due also to the fact that everyone had to share the same vision, the same goal and the same enthusiasm.

Cal Rhodes felt both hate and anger against those who kidnapped his son, but also the pride of becoming his savior. This gave him a certain prestige, strengthened his dignity as a commander and developed the talent of leadership. The six comrades got to have a great confidence in him, trusting his abilities to lead a team. Their cooperation was more than agreeable, because it was made under a moral obligation – they were all convinced by Cal that his son's rescue was a very serious reason for teamwork.

For having believed fiercely in his leadership, Cal has won the trust of the six comrades. They were aware of his inner sense of power to lead (exceeding their personal limits, imposing his will only to find son lost in the mission) - and driven by the momentum of the soul, were mobilized better never to help in that huge task which had taken on him.

Inner power is the result of thoughts that always cross your mind in a format of the type "I will never forget the wounds inflicted upon me", inspired from the reality of the transition from the production of a tragedy up to the triumph of a life that's been found again.

Leadership: Can you build an influence such as "emotional persuasion" to cause that constant reference called synergy?

Let's not forget that this act of bravery – initiating an extremely difficult rescue mission – indicates a young mind, although Cal Rhodes was an old man past retirement, with full awareness of the eventual and future risks. Although he was old, he was the kind of guy who knew how to proceed and solve every single problem. There is nothing which can prevent him or force him back from what he has planned to do. His son had to be saved at any cost.

If you watched the movie "Uncommon Valor" (1983), you know that the mission was only partially successful, because the team led by Colonel Cal Rhodes managed to save only some of the prisoners, with the cost of losing two of its members, while his son had died long before they got there.

However, it is worth remembering from the movie that unity of thought and action that was created between the Colonel and the six comrades, a strong synergy based on sharing a common vision and understanding, a synergy based on courage, justice, respect, integrity and efficiency.

Just as a painter always takes into account the structure of shape and color in order to optimize the quality of the image, you also must consider the spiritual calling towards accomplishing an almost impossible mission to perfect the means of strengthening life with new possibilities of personal development.

Emotional persuasion has as an effect the impulse of the feeling of communicating a reality that cancels out the burdening drama of an incursion into the past.

The golden lever of leadership is the inner mechanism that gives you the propelling force necessary for achieving a higher level; it represents that great spiritual urge through which you can rise above people by your own; it is that unbreakable faith in yourself through which you can overcome any limit and barriers in order to achieve your goals; it is the essence which sets in motion the appropriate power for your actions; it is the most effective way by which you can increase the value of your leadership.

The great Greek scientist Archimedes said: "Give me a place to stand and I will move the Earth". Like any lever, "the golden lever of leadership" must also have a place to stand. And this place to stand is nothing but the team united around you, which you must train and develop in order to achieve a common goal.

The golden lever of leadership designates the ensemble where several forces act: the inner impulse of the leader, as well as his competences, abilities and skills, both his and his team's, at which we add their collaboration, cooperation and cohesion.

Have you built such a lever for yourself?

The Golden Mentor

On April 16, 2009

Guide people to what's best and brightest in them, by focusing more on their spiritual map.

A movie about which I have talked before is "Gattaca (1997)". There is a scene, right at the beginning, which stuck well in my mind.

The story of the movie takes place in the not-too-distant future, in which the specialists could find out in just a few seconds, the exact time and cause of death of a newly born baby. And to Vincent has been predicted that he would die at the age of 30 years because of his weakened heart.

The boy's mother, lying on the hospital bed, waited impatiently and with great emotions, the doctors' verdict. After the doctors gave her the verdict, notifying her of Vincent's life expectancy, she still looked at her baby with a happy and affectionate expression on her face, and, very confident, not letting herself discouraged, exclaimed with pride and a spiritual delicacy: "I know he will do everything. You will do something, Vincent."

She was thinking: "I know you can. I know you'll be somebody. You'll be able to do something important with your life, no matter what the specialists say."

Undoubtedly, Vincent's mother had more confidence in him than in the genetics specialists. Furthermore, her confidence became reality in time. Vincent made it, eventually, although he was not meant for that world, although no one gave him any chance of becoming a pilot to Gattaca and fly in the outer space.

Leadership: Have you decided that you want to experience the miracle of an impossible world to give meaning to the tendency of perceiving that you only exist in the minds of those who reinvent your own story?

Affection granted to those around, to which are closely tied the ambition, will, and commitment to yourself, has as a finality the need to remember only the landmarks that lift you in their eyes.

Empathy lies not necessarily in your care to fit some form of generosity or a dose of exceptionalism to a reality that can be denied. But rather in your tendencies of placing in a proper position the relationship of a vulnerability of man with the state of being gifted and that of fascination he feels when he discovers the wonders of the world, so as to not induce nefarious changes within the latter.

"I know you can, I know you will do something". These simple words, but full of life and of hope, full of desire and faith told by a person truly interested in you, make you feel better, stronger, to be more confident in your future, more creative, more willing and motivated to be a part of the show of life.

Being convinced of her good intentions, you will not hang in yourself, you will not fill yourself with sadness but, more than certainly, you will become a new man. Even so, you can very easily be demotivated by someone who tells you with conviction that you do not have the potential necessary to produce results, that you have a limited perspective on your field of activity or criticizing you with every occasion.

Do you bear the mark of a unitary and consistent personality in its tendencies to prevent and combat any other unfavorable factors that manifest themselves during the attempt of others to self-indulge?

To reinvent a story means to produce a new version of reality available only in the shape and content of the message that you can integrate directly into the background of an emotional manifestation that predisposes man to dreaming.

I strongly believe that very few managers, respectively leaders, are able to flawlessly play the role of loving and caring mother, who would always be there for people with a great heart, with hope, with a sincere and accentuated preoccupation, which would do everything possible in order to determine them to choose the best path to evolution. People's paths cannot be guided by more than one person with strong will, with an optimistic vision on life, on present and future, who knows how to read deep in the hearts of people, allowing them to catch a glimpse of faith.

Only a strong impetus, a healthy, intense blow of life and an excellent morale can help you overcome any obstacle, even if that hot blood owned by winners does not run through you, even if you lack the attitude specific to superior people. Your attitude may be subject to a change if you have around you, near you, as often as you feel the need, a person who, putting all his hopes in you, trusting in your potential, encourages you and gives you a certain dose of courage and imagination.

Leadership: Is the imprint of your spirit of a man capable of sublime resonances visible everywhere in the tendency to take any emotion and turn it into a new landmark and impulse for life?

Life must be glorious, a complete triumph, under no circumstance a difficult or unpromising "score", and if you do not have on your side someone who, through words of eulogy, through periodical encouragements would make you confident that you are able to take over the initiative every time necessary, and that you are able to handle any situation, you will not be able to rise above all expectations.

Just as the blood circulation is concentrated on the heart rather than the liver - and so you, as a leader, you should focus more on the inner beauty of people, on their spiritual map, on their qualities and skills, rather than on their willingness to gather around you.

Help people breathe, not to stifle !

How good it would be if any company would have in its leadership a protective and loving "mother", worthy of being listened to and followed, who would give people a certain peace of heart, a mother who would not prevent weak minds to build a strong future, who would help people instead of shoving them, who would give them trust, and they, relying on this trust, to forget about all their fears, to leave behind their unhealthy thoughts and feelings, and to approach life with a great enthusiasm, just like Vincent did.

The impetus for life is essentially instilling a sense of belonging to a space defined by a value system based on a promise and a certainty to stick to.

You will always be evaluated according to your ability to identify with a reality in which you can act, experience, evaluate and decide on the consequences that make you responsible.

Every human owns a map which highlights their most precious values. You only have to understand very well their map and then to give them some precise coordinates to thank them spiritually and that would open a broader horizon to them. Guide people to what's best and brightest in them, by focusing more on their spiritual map.

Conclusion: Of course, it is very important to have a mentor, even a spiritual one, who would support you and lift your morale at least in hard times, just as it is equally true the fact that, sometimes, time does not pass in your favor and you are obliged to get palpable results quickly, which, of course, is the best impulse for you.

The Golden Ratio OR The Divine Proportion

On February 11, 2009

Mathematics represents the universal language of humanity, with the help of which we can understand God. (Dana-Georgiana FLOREA)

I know this equation, it is characteristic of segments divided in the ratio of the golden ratio. And now, let's draw the conclusion: in the meridian triangle of Cheops' pyramid, the hypotenuse is in the golden ratio with the smallest of the legs. This is the triangle that bears the name of the Egyptian triangle. But the golden section is also included in the dimensions of the king's chamber, located inside the pyramid, which is reached through a corridor that communicates with the outside through an opening in one of the outer walls, located about 14 meters above the ground. The dimensions of this parallelepipedal room are the base – being a double square (with sides 1 and 2), and the height equal to half of the diagonal of this rectangle.

Who, and when, it was discovered that if two segments of a figure are in the ratio of the golden ratio, that figure makes an entirely different impression from others in which this division is not considered, will never be known, for it is a good handed down from prehistory. Assumptions exist and we will discuss them later. It is certain that the pyramid of Cheops, and others in which this ratio was respected, imposes through its grandeur, through the harmony and solidity of the form. Many wondered if she would make the same impression if she were taller or flatter. The sympathizers of the golden ratio, however, claim that its perfect proportionality is due only to this ratio, which got the name of the golden ratio or golden number from Leonardo da Vinci – and has kept it ever since.

Luca Pacioli wrote a whole book about this subject and entitled it "Divine Proportion", and his friend Leonardo da Vinci put aside the dozens of plans and tasks he had, just to make the necessary drawings for this book. That, in the 15th century, and in the 20th century, Matila Ghyka published several books on this subject, one even titled The Golden Number. Then, the golden ratio appears as a mathematical element that intervenes in the expression of beauty in art. And, there is a third reason: we will have so many other issues to discuss that I don't think we will have time to return to this one, if we don't decide to say everything we have to say now !

Leadership: Is the content rendered by the image of your creation perceived as a scientific obligation for the development of a link between man and the Universe?

- You specified well, sir: we will only say what we know about the golden ratio, because there will be a lot more that we don't know !

- And among those we know, we will have to mention those who do not recognize any merit in the golden ratio ! Among them is Benedetto Croce, I think you have read about this too?

- Could he not have done it? Don't I have the memories of the past so that I don't know what would await me if I skipped some important line from a book taken from you? And if we are going to discuss the gold standard, then we have to start with the Greeks, because they said it directly, most likely after importing it from the Egyptians. It preoccupied the Pythagoreans a lot, then Plato and, of course, Euclid, with whom I prefer to start, to present it first from a strictly geometric point of view. In Elements, it is mentioned for the first time in problem 11 of the second Book, in this form: "Let a given line be cut, in such a way that the rectangle contained by the whole line and one of the segments is equal to the square of the remaining segment". First, let me specify that the Greek mathematicians used the term "line" with the meaning of "line segment", then that this problem is an example of solving, geometrically, a quadratic equation. The method used, known as "application of areas", leads to the determination of point C on the segment AB, so as to realize the required relationship (fig. 6). Denoting AB a and AC x, then a (ax) = xz.

It seems that in Book Two this problem serves as an introduction to problem 30 from Book VI, which is formulated as follows: "Let a given finite straight line be cut according to an extreme and average ratio". Here, in Book VI, there is also the definition that was not introduced in Book II: "A straight line is said to be cut according to an extreme and mean ratio when, as the whole to the larger segment, so the greatest to the least". Here is the golden section which for Euclid and the other Greek geometers had the name of dividing a segment into mean and extreme ratio.

- In truth, the construction of regular convex or stellate polygons with 5, 10 and any even multiple of 5 sides is based on the golden section, and this was the work of the Pythagoreans. These constructions are found in Book IV of Euclid's Elements, starting with the 11th sentence, or rather even with the problem in the 10th sentence: "Let an isosceles triangle be constructed having each of the angles from double base of the remainder". This problem, which is solved by applying the division of a segment in the golden section, is then used in the following constructions. In V. Marian's Commentary it is clearly stated that these sentences, like the entire Book IV, "are a discovery of the Pythagoreans". And further: "The Pythagorean origin of the construction of the side of the pentagon also emerges from the fact that the recognition sign of the Pythagoreans was the star pentagon (pentagram)... It even seems that the choice of the pentagram was made precisely to remind this important discovery".

Leadership: Can you create another vision of the way in which the compositional experimentation of the idea of "primordiality of creation" is desired through an intensification of the manifestations of life?

- Admiration is an understatement, I think they adored it, especially if we think about the fact that the golden section can be built with a ruler and compass.

- You are right, for the Greek mathematicians this argument weighs heavily, or the golden ratio is, first of all, a proportional average, therefore, it can be constructed with a ruler and a compass. And, effectively, how would the operation be carried out?

- It is not difficult to understand that this property of the segments found in the golden section, to transmit their properties to each other endlessly, delighted the Greek mathematicians, and stunned Luca Pacioli to such an extent that it made him attribute a divine origin to this proportion ! It seems to be a harmony that is transmitted from one segment to another, like a permanence of life !

- But that is how it is in reality, because the golden number also expresses one of the manifestations of life: the law of organic growth, which Leonardo Fibonacci established at the beginning of the 13th century. The problem, which has since become famous, entitled the house rabbits, is in the twelfth chapter of the Book of the Abacus. Given its charm, I would read it right after the original:

"How many pairs of house rabbits are born in a year, from a single pair of rabbits? To find out how many pairs of rabbits are born in a year, someone placed a pair of rabbits in a walled area, knowing that after a month, a pair of rabbits gives birth to another pair, and rabbits begin to give birth to offspring at the age of one month. Since the first pair gives offspring in the first month, the pair doubles, and in this month two pairs are obtained, of which one pair, namely the first, will have offspring in the following month, so that in the second month there will be three pairs; of these in the following month two pairs will have offspring so that, in the third month, two more pairs of rabbits are born, and the number of pairs of rabbits in this month is five. Among them, three pairs will have offspring in the same month, and the number of rabbits in the fourth month will be eight. Among them, five pairs will give rise to five other pairs, which added to the eight other pairs form in the fifth month thirteen pairs.

Thus, Leonardo Fibonacci found that there is a numerical law by which a property of living matter can be expressed, namely, in the form of a string of whole numbers: 1, 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 13, ... which has the property that each term of the string, starting from the third, is the sum of the two previous terms: (1) 2=1+1; Or 3=2+1; ...13=8+5. This string, double additive, bears the name of the discoverer, the "Fibonacci string" or the "law of organic growth".

The primordiality of Creation refers to the act of establishing a point of support, such as a mathematical calculation, with the help of which you can determine a similarity between "that which is above" and "that which is below", between the manifestations of life and the behavior of the universe.

The Golden Ratio OR The Divine Proportion highlights the mathematical means by which a solution can be determined that intervenes in the expression of beauty in art, and not only that. Also, as Pythagoras claimed, the whole universe is mathematically ordered and everything can be expressed by numbers. And in 1989, the legendary physicist John Archibald Wheeler suggested that the Universe is fundamentally mathematical and can be seen as made up of information.

The Good Soul From The Kingdom Of Darkness

On March 16, 2009

Establish a connection with people's hearts, without hiding who you really are.

Bill Parrish, founder and president of Parrish Communications Corporation, was a man whose character can deeply impress everyone, a very educated man, well-informed and with a rich life experience. He had to use all his strengths to exercise influence on Joe Black, that was in love with his daughter, Susan, and whom he wanted to take with him in the kingdom of darkness.

In order that his point of view to influence Joe's decision, Bill had to prove to him that he is right. He told Joe:

- You can take whatever you want because it pleases you. But that's not love. It's aimless infatuation which, for the moment, you feel like indulging - it's missing everything that matters. Trust, responsibility, taking the weight for your choices and feelings, and spending the rest of your life living up to them. And above all, not hurting the object of your love.

You say you love my daughter, but you don't know what love is. She "loves" you; she doesn't know who you are. Susan went for that poor son of a bitch whose body you took. But she does not know who you really are.

Does she love you? Who are you? Did you tell her who you are? Does she know here she's going? Why do not you tell her? Try. See what happens.

Leadership: Can you insert an image into an emotional message so that the message is part of an inner rational determination that is consistent with objectivity?

Do you remember the movie „Meet Joe Black (1998)"? Immediately, after that Bill stopped talking, Joe Black's attitude has changed. He was ridden by presentiments. While he reflected at the words of Bill, the darkest thoughts haunted his mind, starting to grind him. A light broke in his mind, while in his heart was insisting disorder. Suddenly, he realized that his existence had become empty, so empty that it appears to no longer make sense.

If there was any doubt about his individuality, all Susan's confidence in him would be wasted. For a pure soul, perfect, how could she accept as a partner the "Prince of Darkness" by himself? At the end of the movie, Joe Black gives up Susan, realizing that she could never accept him in her life if she would have found out who he really is.

In order to establish strong links based on mutual understanding and trust means to fill in the hearts of people the place that you must have it, that you deserve and which you consider correct. Their perception of you must be not only good, but also according to their personality, to their own values, their own expectations, and with their own ideals. As a leader, you must manage to close in the hearts of people the feeling of a favorable agreement to eliminate the possibility of any conflict. They should feel a total safety, an absolute peace, in order to make common cause with you.

Do not give people the opportunity to meet you, is to raise an insurmountable obstacle between you and them. Do not turn your leadership into an insurmountable fortification. For, the one who builds up before him an insurmountable fortification, cuts all ties with others around him. Continue your way to the hearts of people in a confident way, leaving place for their right to know you, and their attempt to get closer to you, to attach to you for what you really are.

To insert an image into an emotional message is to impose the particular, in which you incarnate as a "projection of sensitivity", where there is no positive reaction to change.

The Good Soul From The Kingdom Of Darkness symbolizes that good part of yourself that you have not managed to show other people around you, despite the benevolent intentions. In vain, you want to establish links if you fail to fit in the well-defined pattern of others. In order to bridge the gap between you and the others, it is necessary for your inner beauty to be shown to good advantage, and to comply with their own beliefs and desires.

Just as the manual focus on digital cameras can be best achieved by handling the rubber ring on the lens – in the same way developing your relations with others can be best occurred by "handling" their own experiences and inner aspirations, removing their doubts, behaving according to their own feelings and focusing yourself on their convictions. Establish a connection with people's hearts, without hiding who you really are.

Conclusion: Knowledge of people is very important to be able to lead them on the right track. Let yourself be known by others, be open, and do not hide behind some lies about your person.

In vain, you have a good heart if it is hidden in the "kingdom of darkness". Mutual knowledge generates links between people, underlying on effective cooperation and mutual assistance. Do not turn your own self into an insurmountable fortification, as in this way you will remove people from you. Be open, be honest and fair, and you will have the support of people, support that any leader has great need.

The Grace Of Living Under The Mark Of Art

Evaluate objectively how you use your knowledge so that your work will restore with the means of artistic perfection the confidence in a new era of aesthetic evolution.

Science is a painting experienced at maximum intensity, a consistent infusion of creativity belonging to different levels of experience. Sometimes it is a fervor, tension and excitement, mostly derived from the tension of dramas and conflicts of real existence. What I experience in between the visualization of aspects and details, admitting that the hazard alone has created everything I see around, resembles a living dialogue between the three primary colors: red, yellow and blue. But at the same time, it means to accept the almighty role of chance and the need to preserve biological diversity in the evolution of life.

In artistic language, I notice the same refined note of complementary tones, through allusions and postmodernist references, between transparency and poetry, between the primordial reason of existence and the instinctual determination of writing, maintained in the state of maximum brilliance and saturation. Demonstrative, I am building that energetic symbiosis that is absolutely necessary in order to intensify the irradiation force of the word full of core, written with much grace, with much talent and with great dedication, dominated by that tendency of rapprochement between the power to embrace the universe and the power to exalt the feeling of life.

A brilliant mind never refuses to conquer a negotiation with time in an alternative space, reflection and dream. It experiences an ambivalence determined by an epistemology of depths, so it does not decline its belonging to the artistic conduct of an esthetician who knows how to turn any idea into a composition, every banal object in such perfect qualities that they seem human. Artistic science, by investing the color with the radiant energy of the inner life, is related to the ratio of symbolic forces, emotions and emotional qualities that cannot leave the viewer indifferent.

Whoever stretches out a trembling hand, detached from the theme of a painting by Salvador Dali, whom the persistence of memory always carries with other meanings, will be touched by that magical emotion called ATTRACTION, by that glittering genius characteristic of unforgettable compositions which impresses with a thrill of wonder in front of the essential things otherwise seen and treated.

Leadership: Do you demonstrate your competence to carry on a continuous activity as a motivational factor in the artistic education process that determines your willingness to return to the "formidable" position?

In the most passionate art, which only the philosophy of pure ideas raises to the quintessence of innovative sciences, there is a unanimous opinion, a hint of truth justified, a law valid until the end of the world, trivial to theories of change. That if you have not mastered the secrets of any art until 35 years of age, if you have not finished your own style of creation and chromatic harmony, and if you have not made a major change in a particular science by recalculating your coordinates from one pole to another, then you will certainly never succeed in doing it. You're just a dilettante !

In this case, as is demanded by the rigor of technical execution that does not sigh and doesn't roll its eyes when faced with artistic splendor, you have to distinguish between the influences of certain thoughts and the material testimonies of science, in the great equation of a highly refined inspirational intellectualism.

You will never be delighted to know a man who holds any important function or position in society if you know that his whole life has been a great ZERO in science, the art bypassing him with a stubbornness almost incomprehensible, with a short turn to a great dead-end, called: apathy.

The formidable position is attributed to the artist who knows that the work no longer belongs to him if he had dedicated it to science, becoming an emanation of inspiration that gives the world the opportunity to discover the deep levels of his being. What does your name resonate with: a public function or a great scientific breakthrough on the higher aims of art?

Leadership: Do you understand your self-realization as a form of enrichment, styling, or spirituality obtained from a creative effort that leads to an original derivative work?

If you put yourself in the place of the author of this article, trying to look at the future of the technical civilization and the future of artistic education, then you will probably gaze over the lines of writing in eternal ink as if you were trying to predict their reactions. Immediately following this action replaced by artistic contemplation, the feeling that you are forming a superior entity of human condition by shaping all external forms into new artistic content.

Your mind will encounter things hanging from the walls of the houses opened for sale, surrounded by a staggering number of lines, shapes, chosen decorative combinations, vivid colors, pastels, and dark tones. They mark the nuances of future forms of expression. With time you will try to establish a boundary between kitsch and true art.

The most inspired writing captures the art of perfection of a world that can be made up of every little thing that comes to your way, just as pearls are formed from a grain of sand inside an oyster.

Leadership: Are you ready to accomplish something that exists in the germination stage of your natural endowment that tends to update new perspectives potential resonance?

I was just reading an article about Sir Tim Berners-Lee, nicknamed "the father of the internet". He did not hold an important public function in society, but the present and the future of the world depended on him at the age of 34 when he invented the World Wide Web. Practically, he was more important to changing the technology and form of society than all the presidents of the world's great states.

As for art, I read somewhere that Leonardo da Vinci educated himself to learn to read the handwriting of nature, which can be seen everywhere: in wings, in egg shells, in clouds, snow, ice, crystals and other random combinations. He used this understanding to find new ideas and solutions to problems. He could probably get ideas from the shoe of a messenger.

Both one and the other, in a similar way, have touched the same sensitive line of creative power born out of the curiosities of the world of science and the environment. See? The whole world and all the progress of society, in a dialogue with a God that is revealed only by faith, that is, through the wisdom of experience and of the individual study, actually relies on the creativity of artists and scientists who have reached The Holy Grail by their own power.

Without them, we would probably have been so far behind, at the "story skeleton" stage of a universal night that never had a dawn for the progress of mankind.

Personally, I attach great respect to artists and scientists, in no case to individuals who hold various public functions. Because only from the first I really did learn to fundamentally change a whole society.

Leadership touched by the influences of art can only generate the change of an entire society if it reflects the positive and constructive attitude of the foundation that creates prerequisites for updating new motivations of learning based on the perception of creative immanence, not theory.

The Grace Of Living Under The Mark Of Art is a part of a formula that genuinely expresses the call to the heights of the great human ideals toward giving birth to new, innovative and lively impulses such as: "Enjoy every little thing and appreciate it to its true value, that is what makes the big difference ! "

The evolution of aesthetics begins with an exciting description of the way you approach things from the perspective of elating to the value of the artistic act, the consumption of uniqueness and the reduced reality to a metaphorical correspondent.

The Great Challenge Of Leadership

On August 11, 2018

Try to introduce a new measure of reality without departing from the role you play in supporting the emancipation of an alternative sphere of influence.

I was a full-face idealist, always looking for new and interesting things, lost in a completely puerile vision and directed in the completely opposite direction of what reality represents. In a way, I seemed to be framed in an artist's creative space guilty of refusing to accept the obvious.

Like Hamlet's somewhat reversed figure, but still a slave of feelings that brought only torment and endless troubles over my life, I began to see the world through the eyes of a magician who invokes the spirit of immense power, but fails to make him disappear.

So, I was captivated by my own suffering from an artist's imagination of recreating a world, but one seen from the perspective of a magician or risk or an alchemist, somewhere between life and disappearance. It was a sweet suffering, reflected only on the screen of consciousness, one that develops the most useful and most sought-after abilities in a man: the lucidity to delimit myself from the rest of the world and the ability to make shows on the stage through the content of disturbing strangeness, offering the experience of living a wide spectrum of sensations.

I invite you now to the opening a wonderful show. There are 40 cool guys on stage, crammed in a fairly tight space, and exclaim with enthusiasm all together: "We, the actors, we're doing the games ! "

Then, from nowhere, an unknown person appears, but with a genius strategy, worthy of a magician. In one second, he moves the spectators' attention in the other direction, leaving the actors with their mouths agape in the middle of the scene.

Leadership: Can you exploit the interpretative aspects of your role through that exemplary existence experienced through the intercession of a spell that spills out any power of opposition?

If you have not yet figured out, I prefer magic instead of acting, however much suffering is involved in doing so. The sad separation from the other artists defeated by the miraculous power of suggestion, hypnotic, worthy of a true showman.

One truth is imposed here with all the evidence: there is a surrealistic man who has no limits to the associations of compositional elements and gives a total freedom of expression. He is not a certain artist, in this case the kind of expiration that can hardly convince the public, but it is the spectrum of a power of unique creation through its sustained vigor and its amazing multilateralism.

I would like to conceive my leadership as an unprecedented visit to the universe of an intellectual of the visual, leaving the image of a supernatural and timeless being to manifest itself. Spectators could detect my presence, but only in the absence of the image that truly represents me. They could interfere with me only through a "Who's there?", the question Hamlet starts with, which will not fully gain its meaning until it is resumed by Horatio: "What are you?"

Leadership: Do you reserve the right to judge your own performance according to the image of the reality of a form of art that changes its approach according to the rules of an exceptional performance?

The beauty and importance of magic lies in the fact that you do not have to give anyone explanations about your initiatives, even if everyone tries to explain the mystery of your appearance and disappearance. Involuntarily, the spectators will cast their eyes on those who are immediately on the other side of the stage, where the great challenge lies, where they hide the form of a parabola broken like a universal labyrinth.

I realize by writing these lines that I have already convinced you to form a picture of me. But none of you really know who I am, how I look, and where I am. I will protect my secrecy with obsessive meticulousness as a truce in the technique of assembling a secondary event, enhancing the mystery of a magical power that is projected into your memory as an acknowledgment of an impossible reality.

Is it not absurd to claim that an imaginary existence could be a real existence? For there is little talk of imagining an easy method to conceive of a particular reality and to establish a convenient difference, but to know what is the reality from which the role of man in the mystery horizon descends.

Magic in leadership has as a main advantage the freedom to decide whether to preserve or not an existence between "who's there" and "who are you", concretized in a picture that fills the imagination, reproducing the reality of a superior power.

The Great Challenge Of Leadership is to reveal your true identity by letting things evolve over time without being hasty, precipitated, or restless because of the less visible way to make yourself known (as author of a creation that can handle the plan of an "artistic" reality).

The Great Composition Of Experiencing Through Sight

On May 09, 2021

What you experience through your creation is what you see in yourself as following the natural passage into nature.

The entirety of my art consists of seeing the unseen. And if what is precious and in sight is not always easily observed, going into more detail in the analysis of a creation of nature, unique in delicacy and finesse, well this is due to the false view of the problem of beauty, which I could never ignore.

Simultaneously with the vibrant, colorful view, the point of view, completely true, of the catalytic notion of attention "Senzavisandhy" is established, that is, a true mastery in imitating Mother Nature, which I must take into account when caught under the effect of art, that is, outside time and finite space.

For me, beauty is the expression of a look cast on an embodied spirit of nature, such as the rose "Double Delight", that look with which you begin to understand everything, which the painter calls *Vissorthute*and which the sculptor calls Atissdivheva, meaning one and the same thing: transposing the physical aspect into a reflection of my inner universe.

Just look at this rose, admire its beauty. Observe it through the eyes of the artist, with that sensitivity of nature that allows you to more intensely experience the feeling of harmony, of reconciliation with yourself and with everything around you. He seems to radiate that incomparable spark destined by the spell of art that transforms any dominant point of view into a free frame of form and line.

Leadership: Is the way you understand the connection between art and creation a reflection of your inner state in the consciousness of a reality external to the human spirit?

For a moment, the rose disappeared from my sight. He is probably endowed by nature with the power to be invisible. What does this mean? Perhaps art fulfills functions other than the ability to observe, being at the same time related to the sense of interiority (most considered by creators), passing over the immediate reality in the form of a superior reality. Unlike the ideal sense of distance, through which we acquire a superficial summary of reality.

When an element of nature disappears from sight, only then does the sphere of our interiority widen, because we no longer limit ourselves to the material part, but to the spiritual part. This explains the fact that I always respected the rose's desire to remain invisible and I never imagined that it would have any particular reason to hide from my curious eyes.

By learning the art of remaining invisible, hidden in the other 180 degrees that people cannot perceive visually, he was able to turn his absence into a way to influence the viewer's perception, not just to be aesthetically pleasing, but to be felt spiritually in a retreat, far from the world.

And a key teaching of great knowledge is to educate your actions so that you remain invisible, omitted from the world view, like a rose that closes its petals during the night, and then opens and gives rise to many, more intense sensations during the day. Everything we know about the eyes, we must also know about their sight, because what pleases the sight are eyes full of knowledge.

When I look at the rose, free, stoic, full of a good hidden scent, I try to look at the world through the sincere eyes of a painter who boldly redraws his life. But when the rose is hidden in the darkness of a word that does not feel its purpose, in the darkness of a mind that does not long for knowledge, in the darkness of a lonely and faithless world, then your eyes open long enough to further seek in yourself the answer to the old question: "Who am I really?"

Leadership: Does this reshaping of self-perception transposed into a symbol of fidelity to knowledge require the transfiguration of your mind into the recognition of creation from the perspective of its spiritual foundation?

Look at something you can't look at, and try to capture what can't be captured. You will find yourself in my universe, so far removed from other universes, worthy only of a cautious gaze that seeks its true measure in the depths of an infinite silence, of a confession left speechless.

Take a good look at what you see, and even if you don't see anything, at least do it as if you were seeing. I'm always like a novel in which I am the main character. Sometimes I have no pity for myself, I get lost in oblivion, other times I show some indulgence in understanding that forgetting is not allowed to a Christian. And even if from all this naturalism a drama is born, something still brings me closer to art.

Yes. I talk to myself as if I'm going through a narrow gate. In all of them there is a decantation of feelings, as in a purification of emotions that shapes the representation of a finality of nature in the form of a rose, a finality that is in a subjective relationship with my faculty of knowing an embodied spirit of nature.

And if you still cannot see me, catching my eyes fixed on the sky, the moon and the sun, then it is better that you do not see me at all or never, so that my silence does not reach you, nor does it return to me.

That's how it is. At some point, we all look at the universe of creation, we all want to go through life like a rose through the darkness of night, unseen and yet present in a large-scale event, in the guise of a fantastic character passing from one reality to another, from one mind to another, from one scene to another, from one incarnation to another, from a relaxed atmosphere into a unique exhibition.

I chose a very sonorous word related to this experience: Quinthaoss, meaning the unconscious sense of the feeling of "I AM", without a doubt.

The spiritual foundation of a creation is given mainly by an uplifting feeling: "I am part of a whole that has been divided into equal parts, and of which the rose represents the unit of measure of the soul in solidarity with the divine being."

The Great Composition Of Experiencing Through Sight is a way of communication and relationship between an emotional activator and a surrealist of a classical nature. "I think we'll get along great", the rose said to me. It is clear that its whole being does not emanate indifference...

So, when I talk about the consciousness of a reality external to the human spirit, I have in mind an excellent example of empathy and sensitivity that nature provides me to reflect my personality, different states, whims, self, mood...

The Great Kingdom

On January 15, 2017

Float straight ahead to meet what fulfills you and gives you a meaning.

I always had a strong sense of predestination, the kind that represents you to the maximum point of absolute value, accompanied by an eternal quest – from temptation to outcome – of what I didn't know how to fulfill, but to which I looked forward to facing. I couldn't go on believing in chance, especially because many things in my life seemed to exceed the measure of coincidences between the development of events and the scenarios so often imagined. It was the case for me to experience a new image, a new approach to the concept: "Go forward in the future, and never go back ! "

The certainty of my existence, which I hunted so frantically over the years, and the meaning I tried to give to this certainty, was due to the consciousness of a certain superiority, in the form of dreams, which managed to return in my own responsibility of acting without fear and without blemish, such as the blood returning to the heart through the veins, circulating without any obstacle.

In the context of the life of the one who knows and composes everything, of the master of the alchemy that composes and decomposes within his magical crucible the elements found in a state of fusion, was given first of all the test of the ambition of leading an expedition that will stay in the memory of time for a long time.

The expedition, the separation from the world, made by all the rules of a compromise signed with myself, the belief in an impersonal creator God in the time of my refuge in a state of contradiction, without knowing where to focus my efforts, it was the beginning of a refusal granted to the temporary, the duty of remaining unchanged in the face of a round mirror that reflects the true visage of the perpetually youthful protagonist. Only the journey into the unknown of darkness managed to mature me.

Mirror, mirror, on the wall ! Who's the overpowered playable character inside the vortex core of Life?

Leadership: Are you ready to defeat what you had to discover on your own, as the coincidences between the unfolding of events and the scenarios so often imagined by your mind and hidden inside your being?

I never thought I would see myself crossing the path full of ridicule of Don Quixote, towards the great dream, catapulted into a world of stories where everything becomes plausible and authentic, encountering the shock of the experience of decisions full of daring, as an acrobat who jumps without a safety net in the virtue of adverse consequences. Fighting with unrealities the like of mills, going through the depiction of a fallen angel, an agent of resentment and negation, I managed to mobilize even my last breath of tiredness, because even suffering has meaning through the fact that it can be endured.

To accept the particularism of only what is allowed, forced to pay attention to the distance that separates the king from the subject, without the strength of nerve which forms a hero. To endure the fluctuations of the tension of the inner voice, which repeated to me over and over that the world hides only illusions, in correlation with their frequency of vibration, without seeking to listen to the sound of time that passes through matter. This is what it meant "to defeat what I had to discover on my own ! "

It was increasingly irritable the presence of the shocks of my weakness towards the receptors of those human laws that resulted in finding the contradictions of a thinking that tried, involuntarily, to defend the purity of a new part of life. All the ups and downs, destiny mounted for me in parallel with the effort of giving them meaning, without the possibility of offsetting the fastest variations of power – the power of a virtuous living, in terms of morals that double any valuable or specific act, deepening the significance of the superior manifestation of will.

The world is flat anyway, I thought. Later I found that it is round, same as the mirror that reflected me.

Leadership is part of facing a double exposure: first, you expose yourself to an experience that could complicate your vision of the world and then you expose yourself to a freefall where you should be stronger.

Leadership: Are you ambitious enough to take the present into the memory of the future, under the sign of the glory of being more than a transient being?

Imagine a man without a bright future, an unknown being, but one who discovers, at around midlife, the power to change the future through the responsible exercising of will. Look at Magellan, limping and stumbling over, and yet showing the world that the daring deed is accomplished through the constant pursuit of an ideal inscribed in the slogan "You either succeed or you die". And look at Columbus, existing only through desire, crossing the Atlantic Ocean, following a chimera which seemed to never materialize.

As a brilliant painter manages to create a masterpiece out of nothing, so too have they given the purpose of their search a meaning engraved on the granite of world history, something noble, a short whisper in the silence of eternity: the glory of discovery !

And let us not forget how the famous writer, Stefan Zweig, characterized powerful ambitions: "In the depths of a great soul lives unflinching the restless spirit of research. If ever a thought possessed such a man, if it obsesses him to the last fiber of his thinking and his feeling, then within him is produced an endless inner fever. A living thought never wants to live and lose itself in a single mortal being. It demands space, world, liberty. Therefore, for it ticks the clock in which its vital idea tries to storm from the inside out, as a splinter in a finger infected with pus, as a baby in a mother's body, as the fruit ripped of its shell. A man endowed with passion and pride will not bare eventually for him alone to think of his vital idea. Irresistibly, he will eventually have to ask for everyone to share it with him."

Leadership is a demonstration of an idea of who you are in terms of what you can accomplish that everyone shares with you.

And remember the words of the Lord, that for 2000 years cross the hearts of great discoverers: "If you want to reach the Great Kingdom, abandon everything and follow me ! " Because, really, you must start off on a long expedition, fiercely face it in order to obtain total victory in the battle with "the devil of fear" and hold on tight to what you want take forward. This is the privilege of Angels, to exist in both dimensions: that of life and death, in the face of any experience.

The Great Kingdom is a direct consequence of a successful expedition. It is the equivalent to the great revelation you reach only through Promethean efforts, it is the symbol of the ambition of a colossus in facing a threatening and unknown world.

It corresponds to the Grail found by Percival, this forgotten gem that encompasses the very best in man, a form of absolute, the divine fire, the role of the unit of measurement you have to offer to the universe. It is the result of a profound search in the aspect of life satisfaction, which brings you close to the fulfilment you always dreamed about. It is the symbol of the externalization of the manifestation of will, made with the intention of creating, modifying or extinguishing the relations with the world. Having an echo towards the characteristics of inborn human qualities, but passed under the projecting wing of the moment that is born and lost at the same time in the "mists of time."

The merit of every great discoverer, in any field, is that he has the courage to depart from the world and start off on a journey in the middle of an unexplored ocean. And every such conqueror of new territories, under the empire of the strong ambition of distinguishing himself through steadiness, will be permanently inspired in his journey by the words of grace that Queen Isabella gave to Christopher Columbus before his last expedition, decisive:

"Float straight ahead, and if the land you seek doesn't not yet exist, be sure that God will create it on purpose to reward your courage."

The Great Questions Of Leadership

On January 21, 2017

Customize your image in the world with the logo of a purpose whose importance you can only understand through the difficulty with which God allows Himself to be found.

I felt the sudden urge to ask myself this question, in a context of negotiation with myself, and more confusing than a simple request for information "What is to be done?" of that smart man, but disoriented, doctor Stephen Vincent Strange, who had to save the world through the mysteries of magic and supernatural power, of which he was not yet fully aware that they exist.

From the initial compromise of the said and unsaid, everything enrolling into a dimension of magic where I was but a stranger, too much for my reason, too true to happen, surfaced a unique product, a mentality of self-assurance, manifested tendentiously in a construct strictly authentic and incredible: "Determinism." The look I carefully took on some delicate, pretentious things, which seemed extremely important to me at the time, but which in the end did not last long in the dimension of time, gave me the satisfaction that I was part of the symbolic "unknowns" of a Creator who restrains chaos.

One by one, all the doors I had closed throughout my life, have left themselves ajar due to the accessibility of that form of keeping myself the same, everywhere and anytime, in the state that was provided for me, between two contrary requirements: one of God and one of the universal value that needed to be respected, and the other of the unconditional in the worldly action of an Unseen Order.

Leadership: Do you have the ability to rise above the level of understanding of the things and times you are contemporary with, so as to change your status from a mere mortal to a Creator who thinks of everything when he is part of Him in the uniqueness of every surrounding thing?

To have magic, the wand I entered in possession of due to the proximity to the nerve of a supreme and unseen intelligence, had to be used with the secret formula of "push everything beyond limits" to the will of a dizzying, but well controlled game of the hazard. The same magic, distinguished by an additional verification of the limits that I had to overcome with the help of a supernatural power, so by a research of nature and the aims towards which it tends, as a reflection of divine beauty, had to move any understanding of the reality of the present and transpose me to a higher plane, from where I look at my life as if I were at the cinema. Not with the gaze of a spectator, rather with that of a director.

Almost inconceivable, like I never would've guess would happen, the meeting with a wise and very powerful wizard, known as The Ancient One, over which hovered the mystery of a hidden reality and the relationships with the divine, made possible that continuous and perfectly manageable combustion, necessary for the production of new differences in the quality of my life and of others.

Tensions and efforts representing the hidden forces of nature and of the phenomena of the world, underlying beliefs and practices of an alleged secret "eternal philosophy" – derived from the spiritual alchemy of space and time, were represented in a relation of causality with everything that, during life, was identified as an obligation or prohibition. Practically, everything around me was part of a secret consciousness to which I could only have access if I saw myself as the Supreme Creator, especially if the understanding of each thing involved a certain power of suggestion, a current of underground meanings, however indefinite.

The condition of the undefeated accepted by the power of a universal algebra, tamed by the magic of laws that even today I do not fully understand, was finally recognized as an "active hope". But with the price of my freedom.

Leadership: Do you fulfill your purpose centered on the exceptional destiny of a superhero, transforming you in the one the is revealed to you through the name "Am I what I am beyond the rules of the world?"

Doctor Stephen Vincent Strange gave himself body and soul to the action of transforming the forces of rejection and attraction unfolded between mankind and the universe, in an excess of vitality, itself becoming the space of an inner tearing that never heals, in the presence of other more bitter dives of life, in a game of masks, of energies, of events prophesized and written long before they come to pass.

In all this gioco stupefacente coded to itself, a self-mystification, between what it felt and what was revealed through inserts of elements apparently fantastical, through the opening of the heavens in the face of exiting time, was formed the noble alchemy of the spiritual creation culminating by achieving a new profile of its identity, Alpha and Omega: "I am what I am, beyond the rules of the world and existence."

A necessary condition for examining the empirical validity of theories in leadership, about man and society in relation to any context and metaphysical content, with implications in the evolution and meaning of existence, is to be able to exist through the reasoning of fulfilling a role that no one will ever be able to occupy: that of a promoter of universal determinism and ordering of events.

Being a creator means to experience the sensation of a fantastic world as a form of self-induced suggestion in which you guide your own thoughts towards the conception of all that exists around you.

To be accompanied by the feeling that you are connected clearly to a world that exists outside of you, by extending the shelf life of a superhero, means to manifest the feeling of being hooked up to a superior source of energy, to Universal Consciousness.

And the strengthening of the Higher Self, with the toughest of laws, in the highest spheres of reason that grant you access to a different reality, is a stage personalized with the logo of your own purpose whose important you can only understand by the difficulty with which God allows Himself to be found.

The profile of the superhero reported to the nature of the universe and the character of life, can be made through preliminary questions: "How do you see the world with the eyes of a God?" and "How can you regain the power concentrated on the hands of a powerful opposition, in the context of an Unseen Order?"

The action following the answer to these questions is the consequence of the reaction through which you demonstrate the proximity to the nerve of a supreme and unseen intelligence. This being possible to delimitate by using the secret formula of "Push everything beyond limits, beyond every other role you have, beyond any change in things, beyond all additions that the mysteries of the world can bring."

You be the determinant of the order in which these changes occur.

The Great Questions Of Leadership, defeating laws now widely accepted, of the world and existence, are headed towards an imminent explosion:

1. Will you ever become aware of yourself based on the truth behind the reality that exists outside of you?

2. Will you be able to bear that version of your divine originality, beyond the origin of your physical temporal line?

3. Can you exist so long as you bear a name that is not limited to the world of material things?

4. Do you act only because others act, or do you act as a determinant for the action of others?

The Great Science Behind Knowledge

On March 14, 2014

Continue growing the production quota for your units of leadership, when attempting to give a new orientation to knowledge.

Who takes a tube filled with hydrogen and inserts into it a lit match or candle, will observe that the hydrogen ignites and burns with a pale blue flame, and the match and candle burn out.

For a scientist, such an experience could not constitute an enigmatic phenomenon. For me, however, the findings of this experiment didn't offer me the privilege of being completely my own master over my intellectual curiosity. It was an agony of intelligence, a mess of meanings. Because everything boiled down to how I interpreted the experiment, and not so much its practical side.

Science means turning information into action after reflecting on its long-lasting effects. The orientation of the distribution system of the senses resulting from the adjustments of experiments, theories, hypotheses and ideas expressed by the other scientists, focused on creating new forms of thinking that can guarantee the installation of new faculties of research, didn't have to ignite or provoke shocks in the evolution of the most important factor of analysis: the human resource.

To give science another direction is to turn your attention to a new way of addressing the relationship between what man and his outward action are.

Incessantly, probing the essential thinking of scientists through the random selection and critical analysis of the results of their experiments, without detaching myself from the unanimously agreed upon system of thinking, I tried to present new explanations and introduce new concepts that later would be generally accepted in the scientific world. In fact, everything I tried to relay in writing, within the framework of literature, through excellence, of syntax, referred to the commission of creative works made up of memorable patterns to be followed by all those who wanted to embrace the profession of scholar.

But I could not accomplish this without knowing that "How?" and that "Why?" fundamentals in the attempt of giving knowledge a new orientation. I could supplement the profound motivation that gave meaning to my evolution, only capitalizing on the discoveries of other scientists. The ability to influence a series of processes associated with scientific breakthroughs, those taking steps toward the future, was closely related to the capacity to express in abstract terms the results obtained from empirical observations.

Leadership: Can your manner of clarifying the role of a science modify in depth the manner of discovering a new approach of personal power but also of power at the level of the entire world?

The act of progressing in the discoverer role, in the classical understanding of leadership as being a science exclusively quantitative, but also qualitative, provides the advantages of an acquired status, not awarded, which adds some weight to the autonomy of a person and to intellectual comfort. The personal power of a discoverer relates to his ability to understand abstract concepts, to look far into the future, to extract information from any field, to highlight the smallest details of objects and phenomena, due to the need to relate to an exclusive thinking model.

In fact, the whole world benefits from a discoverer, because he argues in favor of approaching an experimental creation method that he wants shared through his success story. Or, as I like to believe, a successful story is the novel of a creation in which a new universe is born, a world with strong real-action adventure features.

The method of forming an open mind which cannot live in the present, but constantly "runs" towards the future, has the prime characteristic of flexibility, i.e. the possibility of adapting to each and every plan of investment in the knowledge production system. A system that aims to optimize individual functioning through a proper maintenance of research. Everything the leader invests in his scientific work comes to the aid of the vision he proposes for change.

As a leader, you can provide a permanent connection between the contributions to the advancement of science and the payment obligations to the budget of leadership, whose income used in practice is moving towards "Private", i.e. to your area of interest, only if you try to give knowledge a new orientation. And the result of this orientation depends only on usefulness and knowledge of those "How?" and "Why?" fundamental to the creation's form of control, that arouse your intellectual curiosity.

Can you provide a permanent connection between the contributions to the progress of science and payment obligations to the budget of leadership, as a way to search for answers to questions that trigger intellectual curiosity?

The budget of leadership includes not only the deep convictions of man, but also all those arbitrary contrivances of his mind that rationally and systematically analyze the so-called areas of inspiration, very disputed between the candidates to the trophy of excellence, approved or disapproved as an attempt to prevent decline.

Only a profound motivation can give meaning to your evolution, by trying to give knowledge a new orientation. This can be achieved by using the discoveries of other professionals in the area. Leadership, fueled by the knowledge of the essential changes that take place in the orientation and structure of science itself that you cultivate, can be studied and contextualized only together with the tendency of receiving and following others' way of thinking, without succumbing to their demands.

In this case, the units of leadership are given by that solid knowledge acquired from the account of the creative and research experiences that answers the fundamental questions of nature: "How?" and "Why?". They play the role of prerequisites in applying transformational leadership, characterized mainly by the existence of the unique vision over development directions.

Science is the way to make yourself useful to the world by means of teachings extracted from the experiences that have opened your mind and overturned your prejudices.

The Great Science Behind Knowledge designates the particular way of maintaining an efficient leadership based on those features of content of knowledge, produced by other researchers in the field. Deep knowledge of the past and present that offer possibilities of foreshadowing the future, are necessary to address science in a creative and practical manner.

The Great Science Of Inquisitive Minds

Have a good control of the matter leadership is made of, setting new bridges with the main elements that stand at the foundation of implementing the Grand Science.

I had to think of something, and at the same time think of his opposite. O dark moon on top of which there was a strange and intense lit sun. So, a comparison. That was the only way to act over matter and shape it for the most various purposes. Matter was like a differential type 1 system, but with more equations, that only science could bring to their final and complete form, as acceptable as possible.

Exclusively, I was handling everything that meant gadget and information exchange, necessary for developing the experiments at the foundation of elaborating new control formulae of the Grand Science. I had the sensation that I had won my authority to control the matter that existed around me.

The formulae were some sort of checkpoints strictly directed in one way, which helped the stability of some new bridges with the main elements that stood at the foundation of implementing the Grand Science. Their use needed advanced work knowledge with much more assembly and description languages. Out of which the most used was the language of logical schematics and pseudo-codes.

Modifying them on primary directions fit perfectly in the ideal, which generated new notions and truths with the help of which I could change the principles and definitions provided in the previous information processing version. Meanwhile, the strict delimitation between two or more notions, surprising the differences between them, shaped up in a transformation code of the coordinates that determined the apparition and operation of a new thought system based on multiple relations with various knowledge fields.

The main element underlying science is the effect of a comparison that constitutes the extension of a new concept that the Ego could use to assert itself as an autonomous unity of reflection and theoretical construction.

I managed to acquire the mental pattern of the one who managed to reach several peaks. I won my madness through the amusement shown towards funny, multiple and various shapes that the deliberate amortization of thoughts in relation to information produced.

At the same time, I learned how to coagulate and ensure the solidarity of formulae that could ensure a more efficient integration of information in a cognitive pattern that could facilitate innovation. But in a shape that could be absorbed only by inquisitive minds.

Leadership: Can you act on matter and shape it for more diverse purposes, taking into account the strictly individual aspect of the blockage that science creates?

Can you think of something, and at the same time of its opposite? Does modifying knowledge on primary directions fit perfectly in the ideal that generates new notions and truths?

What catches our eye in order to be able to show how leadership operates, from the perspective of man's capacity to discover himself, is the strictly individual aspect of the barrier science creates. Especially when science, for a better achievement of the essential that defines man, can't bring its final product to an operational, acceptable, final shape: easing the preparation and guaranteeing the deep integration of experiences and the type of thought in a certain context that would bring an advantage to leadership.

Practically, the blockage created by science is related to how you reflect on major themes in your life without considering the negative effect of using them in a unitary form of representing reality or expressing ideas and states of fact.

Choosing a leadership style that represents you and transforming it in optimal alternatives, in an efficient call-to-action, is at the same time a difficult task, but also an interesting concern. An important reference point in choosing implicitly and explicitly a style that proves what you can accomplish with help from the science you acquired over the years, is "the matter" what you have to shape for the most various purposes.

Matter is a condensed state of information, data, ideas, strategies and connection schematics with other knowledge previously acquired. Of the notions you assimilate or develop in relation to other research points that you can obtain only through experiments. But you have to know how to use them in a conventional manner, fit for creating a type of autonomy that drives you to accomplish your vocation and to see your own leadership style.

That's why modifying knowledge on primary directions has to fit perfectly in the standard accepted by other people and necessary for understanding, able to generate new truths, new sustainable ideas, new approaches, new trends, new perspectives, new initiatives.

Leadership: Can you take a giant step towards a new science, placing yourself under the influence of the force of redefining your personal identity resulting from the suggestion of a reality too complex for an authentic understanding?

The American writer Kurt Vonnegut wrote in a fiction novel a very important thing that I couldn't forget: "Contrary to our huge brains and libraries filled with books, nobody can ask us to understand absolutely everything."

Therefore, an overload of slightly misunderstood notions will determine the apparition of a "much too full" effect, an insistent signaling of a confusion of values, of antagonist reports between the two "contracting" sides: science and leadership.

The answers to the questions raised by science can develop the insufficient training of an individual to handle matter, or, maybe, science is much too sophisticated for his understanding level. That's why it becomes stressing to regulate in such a manner the reports between the two "contracting" sides, that the effort is justified and the effects and visible and beneficial.

If you want to have the mental pattern of the one who can climb numerous peaks, then struggle to control matter, setting new bridges with the main elements that stand at the foundation of implementing the Grand Science.

The matter you have to master is the information you can use to indicate a comparison between one thing and its opposite, in order to give life to an innovative concept.

The Grand Science Of Inquisitive Minds isn't genetically determined, but it's acquired in time through a permanent training of one's neurons – the small grey cells of our brain. The training we're subject to implies assimilating new knowledge, in small progressive dosage. And in parallel with an age-appropriate neuropsychic development, we have to expand our analysis and synthesis functions, but also the capacity to understand and generalize.

We must keep in mind that every overload caused by the great volume of knowledge and notions, assimilated in a short period of time, doesn't usually have beneficial effects.

The Great Secret (II)

On June 30, 2013

Expand your searches to discover the key elements that determine your knowledge, without straying from your own real identity.

Of course. We aspire to a knowledge of pure nonexistence, which could have ended before reaching the high peaks of maturity. It was more of a fumble in a perpetual roundabout, at points reaching discordant notes that crowded and created a cluster of braided light beams, imprecise meanings and subtexts that baffled my mind. Often forcing me to start everything all over again, same as those people that while trying their best to control what they transmit to others, get suddenly lost in a haze, and are forced to change their approach.

But, at the same time, with the revelation of the mysteries that the not fully substantiated knowledge, placed in the context of a sophisticated process of innovation, would recognize them as defining elements for the existence of the secret, giving everything an unreal meaning. Everything seemed upside down in a tangled underground, clogged by insignificant, invisible little parts, of shapes and shadows of different intensities. An underground of a darkening of a broad spectrum of visions and values.

The Great Secret was drawing away from the essence which it symbolized, the more I approached it. I could not explain the phenomenon itself, up to this day remaining largely unresolved. The concentration of pure essence, given by the equation of the double representation of the elements that tied the possible to the impossible, would split in half if the freshly conquered territory of the secret was not to be stabilized. And I was, quite obviously, lured by the call of the new, of sensationalism.

Leadership: Do you get defensive in what regards a separation from yourself when completing knowledge and crystallizing a particular structure of understanding a surprising mystery has as a symptom your enclosing in a private "hell"?

The Great Secret consisted most importantly of the impressive intensity of the relationships that united different points and forces of interaction, of attraction or rejection, predominant in the construction of new products of reaction. New truths, new values, new meanings, new questions, in a form finely divided, on account of some incomplete and inaccurate findings that seemed to avoid a plausible and logical explanation. New symbols that The Great Secret exploited in order to send a message, or part of a message without a time limit.

As detective Auguste Dupin used to say: "An identification of the thinker's intellect, with that of his opponent." I and the Great Secret. I was responsible for the panoply of means that knowledge was providing for the concepts behind the type of configuration behind the secret, which did not meet my expectations completely. Instinctively, inside of me dwelled a hidden pride, a dangerous desire that, however, would not prepare me for the terrible shock.

But no mystery can be elucidated without a self-sacrifice that goes so far as to give up your own prejudices, allowing yourself to be invaded by increasingly more intense and harder to manage emotions. Like that man who isolated himself in front of a world he could not change, I risked finding myself, unthinkingly, in that circle of contradictions that prevented me from taking a glimpse of the true clearing of my own identity.

A separation from myself was the consequence of finding out the truth behind the secret, because not all freedom releases you, because the most intense efforts exhaust you and bring you closer to the thoughts that give you feelings of worry or fear. The great secret is also the force that demands you the most intellectually and emotionally in a context of experiences that are hard to overlook, making you become the slave of your own vanity, the prisoner of your own pains during creation.

Leadership: Can you withstand a check given by your own becoming that makes you not know exactly who you are, where you came from and where you are heading when your excess of intelligence exceeds a certain limit?

Are you lured by the call of novelty, of sensationalism? Do you give signs of wandering in a perpetual roundabout? Does everything take on a surreal sense? Do you feel like you're getting lost in a dark underground? Are you at risk of finding yourself, unthinkably, in a circle of contradictions?

The great secret pushes you violently into a context of defending your own identity that finds itself forced to make an important choice: either to be left anchored in a lawless territory, specific to a creative mind, or immerse in lack of care or, God forbid, in all kinds of vices, turning itself into a contempt for life from a natural exercise of wisdom. Here leadership is done by giving up any claim for damages resulting from injury to one's own integrity and individual performance.

One of the methods used to correct eventual defects or abnormalities, minor or major, of leadership is to change the type of configuration of your knowledge, boldly depicting a new order in the relationship between limitation and excess. Following which changing the strategy of achieving performance would not force the achievement of a high level no matter the cost.

The science of a secrets handler must constitute the moment of a strain of mind to discover new possibilities and connections between different information, under no circumstances must it impair the ability of an experience to give doubts to the significance of existence.

In order for leadership to gain a competitive advantage over other models of leadership, thanks to the knowledge you embrace, you must show that you can hold your own becoming "in check". Which means to limit your access to the knowledge that is not consistent with the performance criteria, in defense of your own identity.

Do not stray away from the essence, as you approach the intersection with the opposites of intellectual matter. At this intersection you are not allowed to stop, but to give priority to the movement of frameworks, from "dark" to "light", namely to detach yourself from that whirlwind of disordered yet lateral thinking, that seems to keep following you and keeps holding you back.

Leadership: Do you attribute to yourself a knowledge that does not deal with the relationships between cause and effect, taking into account the superiority achieved through the idea of stimulating the mind to achieve great things?

To explain the difference between leadership and knowledge, in the sense that the negative effect of their combination can be counter to the desired goal – achieving excellence, without taking into account the multiplicity of concrete determinations in the real chaining of some ideas or innovative changes, we must first take into account any potentially successful move that could help achieve superiority in personal development.

Such a move would mean placing knowledge in the context of an innovation process, without straying away from the essence of durability and stability that can help you get the desired result. Of course, you have to be extremely sensitive and cautious to the wave of visions that go beyond the threshold of imagination, so beyond what the possible and the natural can indulge. Otherwise you risk finding yourself, unthinkably, in that circle of contradictions that prevent you from taking a glimpse of the real clearing of your own identity.

Creation is a great thing, like a secret you find it hard to tell. Attributing to yourself a knowledge that does not deal with the relationships between cause and effect, thus one that could seriously jeopardize the positive effect of your evolution, but also the effect of your own option concerning the way in which you understood sustaining your points of view, can be considered not only a loss of tempo, but rather the prime factor that leads to failure.

If you don't want the leadership to deteriorate, then expand your searches in order to discover the key elements that determine your knowledge, without straying from your own real identity. Elements such as vision and unitary approach, imagination, fantasy, artistic means, the realities of the mind, the conception that presides over the construction of the image, can very well be applied in a variety of reconstructions and interpretations that bring to light a new concept of leadership.

Leadership is the science you acquire to show everything about yourself and your realities, different than in a traditional way, that the meaning you give to your creation is that of "perfection" or of "high elitist culture".

The Great Secret consists of completing your path towards excellence in leadership, without straying from the terminus point that you set for yourself. It means not to wander on paths through the thicket of collateral paths that could stray you from yourself and your self-set goal, fully consistent with who you are and with those you represent.

The Great Secret (I)

On June 28, 2013

Prove your capacity to fully control the "superior", so that the authenticity of your science is validated and wholesomely accepted.

I was getting closed and closed to the Great Secret, prioritizing that new distinct and particular shape of the unperceivable. The possibility to comprise in a whole outburst of thought that unnoticeable and profuse unity of creation, in a single available formula, with more application options, didn't seem possible. Was it, maybe, necessary to make up everything and start from scratch? Or to shape an already existent idea?

Under the action of some catalysts for combustion of elements, the speed of chemical reactions can greatly increase. The Great Secret, connected to the fundamental concept of transition between two different forces, associated with matter that becomes light, perfectly purified and reduced to a mercurial substance has to undergo a sublimation process that had as result the written word. Be very careful not to evaporate it and lose its ineffable character !

If everything went well, it should have been really simple. My objective wasn't just to understand and learn the source code, but also to possess it, to wholesomely dominate it with the specific superiority of illuminated and visionary spirits that turn the pages of time lightly. But, in a certain way I reserved my right to act according to the inexorable laws and principles that establish the Great Secret. And to act upon them. But without becoming the slave of an attempt to integrate strange into reality.

Leadership: Can you show that the interpretation that you give to your personal Creation has as a correspondent a feature or an important role in your becoming as an artist of an infinite world that transforms through you and because of you?

The personal creation of an artist is the fusion between what is revealed by the vastness of the application of knowledge and the need for one's own philosophy of life to give meaning to the things that surround you. I should have kept that in mind at all costs. Because the probability to discover myself wholly and to evolve towards something superior, the quintessence of the force behind success, the essential, most precious active of a transformation of essence, that's never lost, was directly proportional and influenced by the mastery of defending the secret.

It was a fact, something that was truly happening. It is of no importance that it was only the product of imagination, a fleeting moment that we have experienced a priori under the influence of the feverish brain. The only thing that mattered was the attempt to somehow explain the inexplicable. And thus, touch perfection. This was equivalent to the penetration into a world of fantasy and information that contributed to the act of creation, to the shaping of a parallel and plausible reality, of which chemistry and physics represented only a beginning of specialized thinking.

After deciphering the code, which wasn't precisely a Scrabble game for children, the Great Secret had to be set to play only those key aspects that could bring me an advantage, deriving from a singular perspective of the approach to transcendental knowledge, objective and complete.

The key feature of an artist is contained in the summary of a novel written by Umberto Eco:

"The inquisitive spirit knows, finds, sees (therein) similarities between distant things." In fact, infinitely extending an original interpretation that seems to specifically apply to some subtle and secret meanings, was my unprofessed wish. It represented the conquest of my future triumph in art, the reward of a maximum satisfaction directly or indirectly produced by possession and the Great Secret's utility.

Leadership: Does your guiding mechanism towards excellence come in congruence with the construction of your science seen as a major sense of existence that pervades knowledge centered on "what is hidden" and knowledge centered on the revelation of a world that you did not think possible?

Do you grant priority to that new distinct and particular shape of the unperceivable? Are you enslaved by a new attempt to integrate strange into reality? Is it needed to make up everything and start from scratch? Or to shape an already existent idea?

In order to reach a superior leadership level, first of all you need to bring your science to the appropriate level, and why not, to an unknown level up to that point. The force to tend towards full development and then towards excellence assaults the thick walls of uncertainty that incarcerate your potential to open new directions of thinking. This is the force that fascinates and attracts, stimulating any future leader towards true knowledge and power.

A higher level of leadership is achieved by producing a revelation about man, about the truths that condition him to relate to the general framework of a particular world, so that he portrays the image of a complex and sophisticated creation that wants to spread a life story which you cannot detach yourself from.

Just as double chess happens when the revealing figurine makes a chess move in its turn, so is awakening a new way of "being" discovered through its own value, in the journey towards the triumph of knowledge, which occasions the transition towards excellence, a promising debut in the long evolutionary arena.

In order for your identity and raison d'être to be found and fully exploited, firstly you must redirect your efforts towards achieving as wholesomely as possible and at the same time as reliable as possible, a certain "superiority" concerning the ability to navigate through the crossroads of knowledge. That inexhaustible knowledge necessary to deal with the effects produced by the slow factors of evolution that accumulate over time.

The creator who takes his work to another level is the artist of a fabulous imagination on the basis of which certain "extended moments of true self" are possible in a vision of conceiving the reality of everyday life in the symbolic form of a mysterious reality.

International leadership expert, John Maxwell, wrote in one of his books: "I have learned how to focus my attention on the main thing, and that changed my life the most."

One can notice this necessity of the leaders to lean on a stable support, to lean on a solid wall, much like a rock. This is the "main thing" – the Great Secret – the science you need to take into consideration at any price. Because the probability to discover yourself and to evolve towards something superior, the quintessence behind success, the essential, most valuable active, which is never lost, but is directly proportional and influenced by the level of your knowledge.

The transition between old and new, the structure of science that we need to develop further in all directions, creating the original, painting a new reality, providing a clear and consistent guidance for a future development of leadership, must be unambiguous.

The extended moments of true self point out that part of life in which all experience is met in the way you approach the theme of philosophical, systematic and original creation from the perspective of what is not observable at first glance.

This is the initial stage, which prepares you for moving to the next stage of the evaluation process, which is favorable to you, and allows you the full access to the "source code" of your creation.

Trying to explain the unexplainable, reviewing the understanding based on study and reflection, inventing some answers, forming an unbreakable alliance with a precise foundation of interpretations and easy arguments, are some of the ways science could become more popular. Of course, they cause the easier building of a new thought production unit that will replace the old one, which has become much too tight and rigid.

If you want the authenticity of your science to be validated and fully accepted by others, you have to first prove your capacity to fully control the reality they live on every day. That means getting closer and closer each day of the Great Secret, prioritizing those new particular and distinct shapes that report to the highest science, which applies to leadership.

Leadership is the reality to which you relate through the force of genius when you try to test your potential to be creative, being convinced that any ideas and concepts of life can be formulated in a different way.

The Great Secret refers to continuous self-improvement and continuous enrichment of your knowledge, of the strategies to put the latter into practice. They all contribute to the creation and consolidation of the leadership's material support.

The great tragedy of the 21st century, especially in Romania

On July 19, 2023

Discover and experience what it really means to be "advanced", reflecting on what you value as abilities, not as deficiencies or lacks.

Tried accessing BARD (Google's version of ChatGPT) today. And, at this moment, out of the 180 countries that have access to this very advanced application, Romania has no right of access. The last country in the world remained, as usual, Romania.

https://lnkd.in/dN-faRKG

Every time Google releases a new and very good application based on the introduction of a new concept, there are at least 180 countries that are given direct access to it. And Romania, not only is in the last position, but is not even taken into account when it comes to the latest technologies.

I'm wodering why? What is our country full of educated and talented people, workers, and with faith in the good God, if no one pays attention to us? The Romanians also have a lot of PhD students, they all go to church, they all have internet. Romania has a lot of award-winning students and a lot of so-called eminent students, many with studies abroad. However, our country is so far from the West, more precisely we are at the level of the "last wagon". Why ?

Leadership: Are you guided by a sense of urgency due to a focus on the future, in an attempt to rise above the limited vision that today's society promotes?

I will tell you one of the reasons. First of all, corruption at all levels: disinterested people and, above all, very poorly trained in their field of activity. Not to mention that Romania is the last country in terms of information added on the Internet. In fact, Romanians are used to taking as much as possible from others, they absorb everything like a sponge, but they never give anything in return.

In all developed countries, almost all students, businessmen, teachers have a website with a blog. Post new stuff daily. The amount of information is enormous and it is not limited to news from the press, the West goes much further than that.

While in Romania, all those who occupy important positions are smart, they all have diplomas and doctorates, but they have no idea what a BLOG is. If you take any prize winner, any student, any teacher, any cultured, intelligent person with so much experience in the field, you will see that 99% do not know what to show, they do not know what to say in a blog.

Leadership: Can you observe and understand social reality in all its complexity without producing a false sense of security in your ability to solve problems?

The education system is full of upstarts, greedy individuals who did not enter higher education institutions out of passion, but for the benefits. Such individuals will never emphasize the provision and propagation of personal information, derived from creative work, because they have no idea what creation is !

But we have plagiarists with the cart, i.e. "researchers", individuals who collect information from google, mix it up and throw it into a work called Bachelor's, Master's or Doctorate. Only last year, 2022, seven Ministers of Education were accused or proven to be plagiarists, out of the 24 who held the position after the Revolution. No one investigates the other ministers, the other teachers, because 99% would be accused of plagiarism, and that really does not look good.

As the saying goes, the fish at the head spoils. Referring to himself, man values himself as a moral being whose goal is to achieve virtue. But the question arises: did the leaders of our country understand what virtue is?

And Google and the other large corporations in the world that develop the Internet, have very accurate statistics regarding Romania. Romanians fool each other in vain, because no one fools the Internet. Especially if nothing can be seen of you on the internet...

Leadership: Can you call for introspection and a reconsideration of how you relate to these fundamental aspects of society without compromising your moral and ethical integrity?

The great tragedy of the 21st century, especially in Romania, is that 99% of the so-called "professionals" do not have a website, they do not have a personal blog. We have had the internet for 25 years. However, you enter a college, in any college, 99% of the professors failed to gather some ideas from their experience related to how a personal blog can be developed. They have no idea what to show, they have no idea what to say, they have no idea what is going on with their lives. Doctoral students and post-doctoral students. Stacks and relationships. Only parrots and parrots have perched in all kinds of positions, but rarely find a creator with advanced ideas.

Wouldn't it be a shame, in the age of the Internet, for you, so-called specialists, not to be able to say a few things from your experience in the field? Do you really not notice anything around you changing?

If you think you're a professional, but you don't have a personal website/blog now, in the 21st century, you can go to bed, because you don't exist on the Internet anyway, and you don't represent anything to the world of science either.

And do you know why I say these words, with such bitterness in my soul? Because I want our country to stop being the last wagon in Europe. Only old men and women are in charge of the country, in charge of state institutions. They are the same people, completely outdated, exhausted, completely out of touch with reality. False teachers, false apostles, false prophets, hypocrites to the core. Thanks to such individuals, our wonderful country is decades behind what is happening in other developed countries.

Our hope is that, from one year to the next, more and more darkness falls over our elderly (heroes): some retire and are completely forgotten by society, others go to another world, as obsolete as they obsoleted this too...

A leader must be attentive not only to the visible aspects, but also to those hidden or ignored by society. He can bring these aspects to light and make them visible to the general public, only through his own contribution to shaping a comprehensive vision of sustainable development.

Indeed, the role of the leader in studying these aspects of wide public interest is not to observe, interpret and communicate social reality in all its complexity, as a creator who works with fragments of everyday reality does. Rather, he must contribute to a better understanding of the world he lives in and to its change for the better.

The great tragedy of the 21st century, especially in Romania, is that "really knowledgeable and advanced" people in various fields do not reach the important positions that could help them change the (wrong) direction in which the country is heading. So, before reaching to occupy an important place in a public institution, you are advised to follow this exhortation:

Discover and experience what it really means to be "advanced", reflecting on what you value as abilities, not as deficiencies or lacks. At the same time, it reflects on how these values influence the progress of society.

The Guardian Of The Stormy Soul

On June 15, 2010

Enhance the quality level of your results by exploiting your own ressources, which have the particularity to produce positive effects.

Yesterday evening, I played ping-pong with one of my best friends, Razvan. After one hour, when we were tied at sets, we got to the decisive set, the one establishing whom would be the best.

We were tied again, 20 to 20. The one winning the advantages would be winner. But that, I must confess, was the moment I really started to worry, the moment I was afraid not to make any mistake. A shiver filled my body from head to toe, a shiver of fear and restlessness filled my entire soul. It seemed as I had always known that I would get here, to be tied, and that I would lose. It was almost impossible for me to concentrate, the thought that I would be a loser couldn't leave me at rest. This thought would scourge my pride and put at stake all my forces.

Before serving his ball, Razvan took a very suggestive look at me, fully exaggerated, but in which you could see self confidence. It made me quiver. His winner attitude seemed to tell me: You will see that I will defeat you !

How eager was my soul to receive this challenge. It was almost as if I was in a duel with an adversary against whom I stood no chance. I felt like a safe target in front of my opponent's gun.

Although I was sunk in a sort of deaf despair, I had the courage to look Razvan straight in the eye, hoping to make him believe that I wasn't afraid. I smiled tacitly. But that didn't change my feelings. My nature was numb, I was lacking power and will. And as I had foreseen, I lost.

Leadership: Can you rid yourself of what you know you cannot prove to be a certainty that you will regain a steady vertical position of what is perceived as a threat to your own power?

There is a Boogeyman in everybody. Just that it doesn't hide under the bed or in the closet, as we used to imagine when we were children, but inside us, in our minds and hearts. Your soul hears you and listens to you.

For me, the Boogeyman was the fear of failure, the fear that I wouldn't be a winner and that my pride would be hurt. And my heart approved everything that I had asked of it. That inner induration which filled me completely, suddenly, right in the last moment, cannot be but the result of the agreement that I had sealed with my heart. My heart dictated my mind and my mind held total control over me.

Failure is not a certainty, nor a success, what matters greatly is the space between them, the underlying assumption that everything that happens to you is a reflection of what you think about yourself. The requirements for evaluating a high-performance potential depend on how much you value in a match that does not compromise its end through the invasion of a subconscious state, an underestimation of personal skills.

The emptiness effect that weakens you, as a kind of captivity from which you cannot escape, captures the premise of inferiority that causes you to adhere to what seems to be the decisive decisions of others and therefore to behave according to them and to become one with the fact that produces the feeling of helplessness.

Leadership: Do you look ahead to the unseen adversary who tends to lead your subconscious without taking the consistency of your claim to receive a different viewpoint on the impact of a possible excessive guilt?

The subconscious takes over the conscious. I was afraid that I would lose and I didn't escape what I feared most. What I was thinking had the power to become reality, my reality. A reality which affected me completely. The deep fear filling me made everything shiver inside me. And retreating, I played bad until the end. This inner conflict decreased my power to fight, made nothing but decrease the power of my will.

In the end, it was the fight with myself, with an invisible adversary: my inner self, which, instead of encouraging me and giving me more hope when I most needed it, left me. Razvan shattered the confidence in my forces, giving me that proud look which was downright proving self confidence. I wish I had a lucky talisman around my neck, an Auryn, which I could touch and instantly feel how the entire courage I needed projects into my heart, filling it completely. But I had nothing, beside my soul, which was of no help at all.

The depreciation of one's own value implies a feeling of excessive guilt coming from a self-image that anyone can perceive as a crumbling perversion between ecstasy and agony, not as a declared enemy that will continue to strike.

One thing helps people, in certain situations, to evolve to a better reality: thinking positively in regards to their expectations. They can fill themselves with energy only by regaining their self confidence. Every time, those who don't control their emotions prove uncertainty in their actions. Sometimes, even if they are at despair, it is good to continue believing in victory, with a blind determination and not take into consideration the fear in your heart. Easy said, but difficult to do, isn't it?

After that painful defeat, I took a second thought, I consulted my inner voice and I found the answer. Everything I need in order to be more confident in the future is practice. Practice is the only remedy for improving self confidence. The more often I will play ping-pong, with as many opponents as possible, the better I will grow and the more I will be more confident in my own strength.

Personal power reveals that relationship of just forces established between a domination that hides itself and a domination that remains constant despite the claim of being treated as a superpower, and without losing its weaknesses.

The Guardian Of The Stormy Soul can only be our inner "self", the great arbiter who can also be tricked sometimes by appearances and who cannot demobilize when facing the opponent.

What can we do? It is essential to boost self confidence by gaining vast experience, which is obtained by permanent exercise, correct self-evaluation of performances, as well as continuous improvement.

Enhance the quality level of your results by exploiting your own ressources, which have the particularity to produce positive effects.

The Guide Of The Wanderers (II)

On June 03, 2010

Transmit to people the testimony of what you are, optimizing your actions according to your own dominant mode of orientation.

As not to ruin our plan and not taking any moment to think, Vlad, the team leader, took a brave decision: "I'll go to them and lead them on the good path. In 25 minutes I'll be back. Wait for me right here and rest on a while because we have a lot more to climb." Then, hastily, he went following the three strays.

Well, what happened afterwards seems to be taken out of the adventure movies. We did not have any choice, so we waited. However, we waited a lot, an hour or so, and Vlad did not show up. Seeing that he does not show up, we decided to return on the path on which we came. And what do you know? We got lost, as well, on one of the paths leading down the mountain. Luckily for us, a small group of tourists, lead by an authorized guide, was going down the mountain and, thus, they helped us get to the pension.

Nevertheless, what happened to Vlad and our other three friends? As they were not at the pension when we got there and only later, in the evening, we saw them again. Well, Vlad has caught the other three, but Maria, one of the two girls, sprained her foot, so that their little group came down slower and in a longer time than estimated by Vlad. When he returned to the place where he had left us, he could not find us anymore, since we took the initiative to come down all by ourselves.

Leadership: Can you impose your limits on a quest for self-indulgence, without giving priority to a direction of affirmation of the values that do not define you?

We could not get to the destination we wanted because Vlad, our guide, in whom we put all our trust, behaved like a novice, and has allowed leakages. He lacked the organizational capacity. He could not take a stand in front of us, meaning the entire group because he has not had a well-developed plan with alternatives and rapid-response measures in case of unforeseen things that would occur, a plan which had to be brought to our attention.

First of all, Vlad should have warned us right from the beginning of any problems that may arise, and to ensure him that no danger threatens us. Then, he obviously had to assess our capabilities and personal skills. An authorized guide, thus with real experience, would have first evaluated our physical capacities, our states of health and knowledge regarding mountain climbing and previous experience. As when you are climbing a mountain, every step can turn into a decisive step, and one thing not taken into consideration can jeopardize the entire trip. So whoever cannot face the mountain should not be on the mountain.

Vlad's values – such as solidarity, commitment and responsibility, did not make good with the strong beliefs that defined him by the impossibility of looking ahead to the pressures of undesirable events, convictions such as: "I do not have sufficient experience and I am under the impression that I react with feelings that others do not possess."

Leadership: Do you value the lived and assumed experience as subject of critic reflection?

A first argument for the downfall of the influence sphere because of the alliance with a purpose that wants to be predictable (but marked by a degree of indirect contesting) and the accumulation of fundamental errors that are either not taken into consideration, or they're interpreted and processed at a conscious level, is that this kind of accumulation pushes the man away from what he was before, transforming him in somebody else.

These thought errors regard the constituency of momentarily reality where you discover yourself totally different, you're lost and you can no longer comply with your orientation requirements. I read somewhere on the Internet that the American psychologist attributed these thought errors to some "dead angles" to those stumbles of the mind when a man's qualities become his worst defects.

The shift from superficial implication to active participation in the decision making process by determining the transfer function of error and removing its cause is part of the extension phase of personal horizons. These are executed through the "shifting" alone of the leader's authority towards a smaller radius trajectory. We are strictly speaking about a new orientation, in an ambiguous situation imposed by the filters of intuition that accentuates the lived and assumed experience as subject of critic reflection, from the perspective of one's own values and motivations.

Just as the industrial worker of an assembly line doesn't have control over the finite product, for which he creates only a fragmented execution – neither does the initiator of a new approach for various "errors" present a credibility guarantee in proposing solutions and solving them if he can move on from accumulating abilities to accumulating new thinking and behavioral customs, followed by practicing and applying them in ambiguous situations.

Critical reflection is the process by which you explain your mistakes in the form of remorse that pursues you in the context of a low degree of ensuring the integrity of making difficult decisions.

A man who emphasizes his lived and assumed experience, as a subject of critical reflection, takes as a landmark a pre-planning of those events that may have the greatest impact and which are most likely to occur.

A wandering "light" can only stray from the path and make everybody get lost. In vain, you are a scout capable of discovering unbeaten tracks, who does not get defeated by dangers or hardships, if you are not capable of imposing yourself in front of people showing that you are the most important piece, taking the right decisions, assuming consequences and making yourself respected.

How could people keep their trust in you if, instead of safely leading them to the destination, you made them get lost at least one time?

A guide has the role of leading the team to the destination in conditions of maximum safety. This desideratum can be reached only when there is a competent, capable leader, experienced in the field, as well as in working with people, with a special ability to analyze people, with a plan of action very well conceived, with a special ability to foresee the unforeseen and to act quickly and efficiently.

On the other hand, the role of the team is not to be underestimated. A very good leader with a weak, unprofessional, divided team is just like a very good team with no leader. In both situations, the result is none other than a total fiasco.

Leadership is the integrity that pursues you even when you're "offline" in times of doubt, having as a resulting variable the experience of always being "online" in the change you can bring.

The Guide Of The Wanderers is the man who denies his role of coordinator of an action following an emergency situation. Transmit to people the testimony of what you are, optimizing your actions according to your own dominant mode of orientation. In other words, the way in which you function is determined by how well you show off your potential, on the way you coordinate every decision, and the way you guide your actions.

The Guide Of The Wanderers (I)

On June 03, 2010

Ensure the validity conditions of the experience of self-overcoming, by evaluating your role limits, duties and responsibilities in the context of managing the challenges.

Many years ago, namely in the first year of college, I was with some friends on a trip in the Fagaras Mountains. I will never forget the first day we climbed the mountain.

The climbing was held under the leadership of Vlad, one of the locals, which was used to such excursions. He had climbed several times some of the mountain peaks in Romania. It could be seen by his strong arms and vigorous legs that he was an experienced and capable mountain climber. With no doubt, he was that kind of man who is full of vitality, who would not draw back for any obstacle, and we were determined to follow him. We could rely on him.

Leadership: Do you satisfy your pride of belonging to a role of "decisive decision" in the extremity of an area of vulnerability that makes a minor event gain the amplitude of a reflection in something more than yourself?

Unforeseen things overturn big plans. After about three hours of climbing upwards, we were barely at half the distance we had to walk. Suddenly, the girlfriend of one of the boys huffily exclaimed: "I can't do this anymore. My feet hurt. I want to go back". Two other people in the group, the girl's boyfriend and his sister shared the same wish, to go back.

For the rest of us were eager to continue climbing, Vlad agreed for the three to go back, on the condition that they strictly follow the markings on the tree barks, indicating the return route. Said and done. We continued on our road, hoping that the three of them will return safely to the pension.

After a quarter of an hour, being on a side of the mountain, we watched down and saw our three friends on a path, but which clearly does not lead to the pension. We shouted at them, but they could not hear us clearly because the echo distorted our voices. We tried calling them on their cell phones, but we did not have any signal. What was there to be done?

I felt like I was tied up with a body rope and someone was pulling me back, I could no longer neglect the fact that somewhere I had also lost touch of the idea of having contact with someone. I felt guilty of the situation I was in, of the inability to act. Within me reflected the spirit of solidarity that had as a destination that attraction towards the forbidden, the forcing of limits without ever truly experiencing them, the tendency to act on your own without the certainty of a direction.

Leadership: Do you adopt a firm position of updating your version of performance, conditioning the maintenance of the "True" function of your personal value?

Leadership is always the first option given to experience that is in tune with the necessity to relate to actual situations, in the context of "Lose Yourself" or "Losing your access to the privileges of a new functionality", seen as some sort of training and evaluation proof.

As such, among the temper and mood uncertainties that hover over the viability prospects of your performance version, under the aspect of an increased responsibility within a hard-to-accept situation, some approximations of your self-imposed "True" or "False" values sneaks in.

Our plea for the necessity and possibility of maintaining the "True" function of personal value, in order to eliminate these causative chains that have their origin in a momentarily decision, with a deeply moralizing meaning, starts, paradoxically, not from analyzing the "Locked in your own excuse" phenomenon, different from everything preceding it,.

But from the significant quality of your leader performance and its corrections in the validation conditions of the experience of being face-to-face with yourself, encompassed within the norms and constraints of becoming. It's an experience that does nothing else but to reflect the existent profound affinity between the fundamental manifestation patterns of the spirit, and the fundamental patterns of implementing your personal power.

The performance version you adopt in a "constraint" type of situation, when you are about to give up on a certain initiative due to the confusing state, is under the measure of the finality of a lack of perspective that keeps you demotivated to the changes you need to make in order to become someone else.

The disadvantage of loss in a certain control measure over what you must do in a certain constraint context, shedding a new light over the "either-or" certainty, is a decrease in Self-dynamic that affects the performance of others. An experience beyond the death of the psychological form of personality transposed in an organic fear or distorted perception over the actual situation, consciously, but pessimistically lived, which constantly feeds with itself.

In these conditions, taking over the initiative that leadership assumes is no longer a purpose in itself, but only a necessary and adequate means for those that are torn up between visible weakness and firmly asserting one's will.

Conditioning the maintenance of the "True" function of personal value through transgressing the role limitations means to process the experiences to interact with the self and the others until you can fully control the pragmatic aspects that grant more support to your authority pattern.

Leadership is the authority with which you allow yourself to remain free and open to any kind of challenges, without thinking that someone else could have done it better than you.

The Guide of Lost Souls isn't only the companion that shows the right path, but probably, an extension of the spiritual manifestation pattern of the leader that discovers himself in the attempt to positively mobilize both in the case of success and failure. An important condition of a realistic effective cost for ensuring some abilities that, allowing the optimal development of the training-evaluation process, recommend you as the ideal candidate for a position that needs collaboration and compromises.

The Hallucinations Of A Brain Endowed With The Attributes Of Perfection

On April 26, 2014

Appropriate the elements of a perfect science, without clearing an imaginary path in a world that many consider to be untouchable.

An unexpected reality then sprang forward, bizarre like a revelation that cannot explain your existence, abandoning you before you can fully comprehend it, casting doubt over my old pursuits dedicated to intellectual commitment. Something inexplicable projected me into an unusual imaginary, an imaginary that absorbed with its own nuances in my own embodiment the real and the unreal, forming a structure of images whose purpose will be the creation or enlargement of certain harmonious blends between art and science.

It was merely an observation, a regret and at the same time a satisfaction that oscillated indefinitely between two extremes, one of closing and one of opening the exchanges of beliefs that announced that curious return over my origin. Something that would make me renounce all my memories, thoughts, my reason to live, by adopting a provocative madness, but one with meaning.

And this fine meaning, which itself speaks louder than words, going beyond the borders of space and time, was best expressed by one of Frank Herbert's characters: "It is normal to fear that which we do not understand."

Leadership: Do you put all your trust in your ability to correctly interpret the message of a reality that detaches itself from the verisimilar, but which has the power to penetrate the wisdom and meaning of a mind that hallucinates?

This was the big madness, the ecstasy of the lyrical ego, a new installation of a beloved creation from the great universal repertoire, the reflection of a imagined world started from imaginary to unpaved areas of the existential road. To let myself get carried away, as a raft caught in a gyratory movement, on the wings of a moment of loss and seeking, somewhere I've never been before, where the pain of straying away from the unreal mixes with the longing of approaching the real.

Yes, like Jorj X. McKie, I was living that sensation of penetrating a mystery that opens the depths of a horizon in which a concretization of an inner prediction takes place, or rather, of an abstract idea: "It was something almost palpable. If I'd let even a single pulsation slip through from what was happening to me, the consequences could've been incalculably tragic, not only for me, but for an entire world."

The message of a reality that detaches itself from the verisimilar, as an occasion of a creation under the real art of matching words, is that no matter how much you try to link a new world to a profound mystery, in which few things are concrete and clear, you will eventually have to accept the existence of a mystery that you cannot penetrate.

The wisdom and significance of a hallucinating mind, imagining a subjectivity capable of telling its own appearance and recompositing, in the past and future, inside and out, to the state in which it becomes itself a prisoner of a too complex reality, has as support the mastery of combining everything you feel, want and think, which makes you overcome suffering and win the comfort of a journey into a world that strives to make a difference and transforms you into someone else. Into a limitless Creator.

Leadership: Is your freedom of appropriating the elements of a perfect science conditioned by reactions of thinking about oneself, closely related to what fascinates you?

Regarding the reality created, we need to consider the possibility of highlighting the quality of what is not alterable, but rather admissible, i.e. of the revelation of those parts of your being that science hasn't repressed, provides the prerequisites of acquiring new impulses of mystical deepness. In studying the most advanced methods to outdo yourself as an individual, to become a leader, one must take into account the reaction of self-thinking within this created reality, that is, the way in which you perceive the world and things differently.

The creator's thinking of himself can be closely related to the ability to see a reality by reference to God, or by the revelation of a spiritual union with the harmony of the universe and the "inner numbers" of a life that is still unreachable in its true mysteries. Also, the creator's thinking can be closely related to the hypostasis of a magician who wants to dominate public attention through enigmas, magical tricks and riddles of all kinds.

In this case, your Ego, generated by a certain stage of development of the "production" of understandings based on experience, but especially on those connections with the imaginary, meant to offer science and research a certain level of quality and a high degree of authenticity, begins to define you entirely, like a stain that covers every part of you.

Can you turn leadership into a journey into the universe of a mind from another universe, a mind that perceives "reality" as fantasy and experiences its fantasy with frenzy, as a reality?

The creator's thinking is the chance to introduce yourself in a space where it is easy to allow yourself to be enchanted by an atypical landscape, by a character who as complex as he is, is as direct and thorough in its existence, in an introspective journey. When you expose your knowledge in a game of confusion of information and perspectives, it is very likely that you are struggling with the certainty of a new fact, of a new beginning, of the triumph of guessing on logic.

In turn, your thinking takes on other values, ensuring the premises for additional investments of achieving a so-called "madness", something inexplicable that projects you into an unusual imaginary, absorbing naturally in your own embodiment the real and the unreal, being a structure of images that aims to create or enlarge harmonious combinations between art and science.

Anytime you can make yourself an explorer of horizons that grub an imaginary path into a world many consider to be untouchable. It is normal, in this case, for people to perceive you as a man with two faces and to not trust you, because they fear what they do not understand. Because your superiority, extrapolated from the association of scientific thought with refined needs, often indicates the inferiority of their intelligence.

Sometimes, to lead creation to another level through a visionary breath, through a deployment of imagination in large spaces, through a rare synthesis capacity, is to live in a world of appearances in which nothing is what it seems to be.

The Hallucinations Of A Brain Endowed With The Attributes Of Perfection suggests the construction of a new reality, paving the way towards a wellspring of inspiration and vision, but only acquires value for satisfying your own curiosity and awareness.

These "functions" of your own uniqueness, which process large amounts of imaginative material, don't create a bridge towards human and social leadership, it only satisfies that demanding and sophisticated clientele willing to acquire a scientific product that meets all criteria of defining new components of reality.

The Handler Of Souls

On February 15, 2010

Direct with precision people's emotions, so that they perceive your leadership characteristics at a higher intensity.

There are days that will remain forever imprinted in your memory. I will remember for a long time, very clearly and enjoyably, that beautiful day of my childhood. I was about 13 years old, I was on the summer holiday, and my friends had convinced me to accompany them to an illusionism show which, I tell you with all my sincerity, fascinated me like no other. Let me tell you briefly the most successful representation of the great illusionist.

The magician took off his black cloak and put it down. He called his assistant, a pretty tall, skinny and agile young girl, covered her eyes with a scarf, so that she could not see a thing, and then he asked her to lie down on the specially-prepared table. The magician closed the table in a certain way, making a box out of it. It could be seen only her head, hands and edge of her feet.

Somewhere behind the scene, in the shadows, you could see the silhouette of a man whose dark face was impossible to distinguish. He appeared after a few moments, bringing six very sharp steel swords. The magician took one of the swords and raised it above his head with its top down.

Leadership: Are you confronted with a reality to which you are part of only when the unity between the idea of a glimpse of the experience and the image behind what you communicate about yourself reigns?

As you can easily understand, this act aroused a strong sense of curiosity in us, the audience. Our wish to see the most bizarre situations became true. Very nervous, we were ready for what was about to happen. I realized by looking at the magician, understanding the silence broken by his nervous traits, that something strange was happening in him. Probably, he was very nervous or perhaps that is what he wanted to make us believe.

The magician stood unyielding, triumphant, like an angel of evil, with the sword raised above his head and the box containing his assistant. After a long pause, with force and unyielding determination, he stuck the sword in one of the specially built holes in the box. The tip of his sword seemed to go through the body of the girl and came out on the other side of the box. However, the girl, facing us, smiled, without giving way to the slightest emotion, and waved her hands as if nothing had happened. We, those in the audience, on the contrary, were all trembling.

In a very short time, the other five swords were stuck in the box and, apparently, in the girl's body, without her suffering the slightest wound. Then, the girl was released from the box. We all applauded. It was a spectacular illusionism show. Moreover, when you are not used to seeing such a show, it can create strong emotions in you.

You experience authenticity when you accept a challenge, but it is given by the image you assume in secret, behind what you communicate about yourself.

The key to an illusionist's success lies in the art of making a show, in the power and dexterity of his hands, in the way he builds his illusions and the ability they are staged in.

Only if he succeeds in creating a tenseness, emotion and suggestibility atmosphere, people will be able to enjoy the mysteries he creates. The people's interest in watching the show is even greater as the illusions created by him are better performed.

Dominant, trustful, determined to win, having a very good understanding of the human nature and possessing the techniques on which optic, acoustic and psychological illusions are based upon, the illusionists manage to create unforgettable shows, inducing the audience a state of inhibition that affects the perception of reality. Are you half artist, half master?

Making use of their personal charm, taking a curious and playful attitude at the same time, and using methods that only they know in order to deceive people, they surely manage to attract everybody on their side. They always find a way to obtain what they want, creating that electrifying atmosphere of mystery and miracle. In popular terms, they have the cookie that you will not find anywhere and from which people want to eat avidly.

Leadership: Do you take the risk of listening to your instinct and accepting a challenge without limiting yourself to the role of promoter of the enigmas you feel you are made up of?

The one who is truly interested in developing his leadership abilities can learn a lot of things from an illusionist, especially how to draw and keep the people's attention. And that is because the illusionists are the only ones who manage every time to catch the people's interest and emotions, setting at an emotional level a direct and powerful connection with them by visual contact, making them live everything at a higher intensity.

Illusionists completely dominate the situation, the connection with people, precisely directing their attention, perceptions, emotions, thoughts as they wish and where they wish, towards the reality that they create. They are the world's best manipulators, the only ones always able to control and coordinate people by their own will.

In order to reach the maximum level of success in leadership, you must raise your level of efficiency, to meet people's needs, to respond as effectively their desires, making everything necessary in order to get the desired results.

To accept a challenge without limiting yourself to the role of promoter of enigmas is to redefine how you are perceived as the sole content of the highest knowledge, when the real cause of this lies in the precise distinction between "miracle" and "imposture."

Just like a talented illusionist, by perfectly delivering his act, gets in people's minds and incites their interest, more and more - so do you, as a leader, you must communicate your vision to others, put your mark on them, making them understand that you are a very creative thinker, that you think only of their future and the organization's future, imposing your ideas, beliefs, visions and points of view, giving your leadership an electrifying shade, beyond what seems impossible, enjoying them with your "magic".

If people are not efficient, means that you have failed to impose your own model of leadership, it means you failed to capture their attention and make yourself heard, and then you have not been able to target accurately the emotions so that they perceive your leadership characteristics at a higher intensity.

A talented leader resembles in many respects with an illusionist, but he should not be confused with one of them. The profession of an illusionist is trickery, and, as a leader, you cannot lead people on a wrong path, because, if you do so, you will eventually be abandoned.

Leadership is the magic number that conquers not through suspense and well-crafted effects, but with admirable naturalness with which you show your dominance and unrestrained ambition to provide dynamic sensations in an unforgettable atmosphere.

The Handler Of Souls, in the good meaning of the word, is the one who manages to bring people together around him and lead them in the direction chosen by him, always catching their attention, keeping their interest awake for a long time, and they, being aware of their place and role in the great machinery, to work perfectly in order to achieve the intended purpose.

Direct with precision people's emotions, so that they perceive your leadership characteristics at a higher intensity.

The Hardest Part Is Seeing Whats Right In Front Of You

On March 17, 2023

The way you see things is not the way they are, but the way you are, in fact.

I carefully look at my ergonomic chair before sitting down at my desk. What would it think of me if it had sensations and emotions involved in the laws of sensitivity? As a rule, these dispositions are found especially in painters, and felt as a grace, as an uncreated divine energy. And the eyes cannot depict people's thoughts by means of figures or things, only a handful of artists manage to do this by following the concept: "the object visually represented in a coherent image means something other than what it really is".

Okay, I'm sitting in the chair. But immediately my gaze goes to the painting on the wall in front of the office. Another thing that willingly fills my eyes with the beauty of a spring landscape, giving way to experiences that took place a long time ago, remaining only mine. I let these experiences manifest themselves as intermediate spirits, in the excitement that seems to prompt me to carefully investigate the nature and depths of everything that surrounds me.

As can be seen, impressions caused by things, but especially thoughts about sensations characterized by depth, which can be more difficult to explain in words, are the source of ideas that make an artist a good observer of the surrounding things, even when other activities distract them.

Obviously, the realism that I show through a way of being, through an exuberant state of mind and through a lot of words, linking the meaning of each thought to some external thing, I came to evaluate my vision according to the principle: "The way I see things is not the way they are, but the way I really am."

Leadership: Does the work you focus on bring new experiences of visual representation through a predominance of emotions over reality produced by the oscillation between symbol and meaning?

I ask myself a question: to what extent does the eye need sight to be able to penetrate the reality of a picture based on symbolic meanings and in the middle of which, through vague relations with psychology, various games on the stage of life are suggested?

To a lesser or greater degree, according to the image whose object not only signifies the idea, but is itself. Without losing its meaning, the image of the eye is a symbolic image in that it materializes both in mirroring and in reality, but above all independently from a subjective point of view.

Obviously, what is repeated in the vision of the artist's eye, acquiring the significance of a symbolic image and becoming a form of expression of the idea of "isolated fact", is precisely that wonderful possibility of discovering something extremely deep in a reality capable of representing the forms of a higher world that intends to be the imprint of the absolute. For both the chair and the painting, as an immediate result of the action of the stimuli on the sense organs, are each accompanied by a mood and a generous affective coloration, making my passion for art remain constant and accentuate more and more that Wasotelas Otasojiteyi Relatheanek, the beautiful embraced by inner feelings.

Oops, I missed that. I never thought the eye could be sentimental. For as I admired everything around me, my gaze seemed to require me to turn my head towards certain points of real interest which I could not overlook. In vain I strove to control my eyes, in vain I tried to forget the things that leaped into my eyes. Something demanded of me, a strange power urged me to remember that I watched with great curiosity, like a contest between great visionaries, the dozens or hundreds of demonstrations that beauty lays before those who recognize good taste when it appears in their way.

Leadership: Can your creative spirit grasp the things around you as particular cases of intervention of logic in a "dynamism that preserves its sensitivity"?

In Othello, the famous play of Shakespeare, there are two admirable scenes in which Iago injects the Moor with all the poison of jealousy, out of hatred, because he promoted Cassio to the rank of lieutenant, although he had not distinguished himself by any feat of arms. By committing this crime, subjugating Othello's soul with ferocious skill, Iago proceeds in such a way as to leave the impression that he is doing him a favor, and Othello thanks him by passionately striking him with the dagger he gives.

In this scene, the dagger is the thing that particularly attracted my attention, representing a symbol of the harder moments and even of a dark part of the human soul, having a moral problem in sight. Therefore, what the thing expresses, through the symbol, is precisely what decisively determines my attitude towards art, perceived not as a blinding luminosity that destroys the historical individual, but as a much more immediate reality that bears the consequences of an acute and invasive experience.

Shakespeare was an artist sensitive to everything that happens around him, because he knew how to transform experiences into symbols, obviously with the help of things. It is not by chance that the subtle eye of the artist, even if it appears as independent, a fact that belongs only to an appearance of normality, represents the unity of mood that the power of light to animate beings and things produces in itself. But the subtlety of the eye is, at the same time, a consequence of the struggle that light has with shadow.

The idea is the following. The more the eye leans towards color, in the spectrum of a particular light projected vertically on the canvas, the more its direct possessor is animated by the desire to ecstasy, crossing the border of physical reality. So he can give a special meaning to the picture of the world. But the more your eye leans toward the depth of the symbols brought forth from the darkness of suffering and inner struggle, the easier it is to adjust your vision to the area of reactions, emotions, and senses.

This time the leadership, under the sign of the mode of reporting to the image, takes control of the connection between things and emotions, specifying that what you see up close will not always be open to the view from a distance.

In this case, the image in which you mirror yourself is a description of the thing around you, even in front of you !

Is it not so? It seems surprising that the eyes could invoke psychic agitation alongside other elements arranged in harmony, to such an extent that the artistic spirit encompasses them together as some particular cases of intervention of logic in a "dynamism that preserves its sensitivity". Often things are dominated by a certain dynamism in which antagonistic relationships are less visible, which gives them a more pronounced aspect of materiality.

The Hardest Part Is Seeing What's Right In Front Of You. I say this because many times we see, but we do not realize the value of what we see. Or, as someone well said, the detail is the one that enriches the moment, the one that can change the world: and it finds its origin only inside us, then it is reflected outside in the form of things.

The Harrowing Cry Of The Mystery That Sheds Its Labyrinths

On February 19, 2017

Be a seeker of the meaning of your own mystery, expressing your purpose and needs through an "angel".

I looked apprehensively around me, burdened by the silence of the night's embrace. I looked in the direction of a match of inspiration in the rich tapestry of a unique experience, on the establishment of an obsession that faced the giant heights of greatness. With great difficulty, I have understood how much the correlation between shock and motivation, message and communication is worth. I recognized myself as being someone else in darkness' embrace, in this perfect non-action according to certain universal laws, a bit different, more inspired rather by the fictive universe of a game of something unknown.

I know that nobody would want the fears of another when he has those of himself in wait. I know that I will no longer have to live a unique experience with shock, measurable only due to the reduction of clarity, to which corresponds the temptation of entering the fight of the Ego, that of retreating to the secondary plane of a multiple subject with different deadlines for completion.

Especially, I do not wish upon anyone to try such a temptation of expressiveness under the sign of an exteriority that exceeds man through the power of imagination. Conditioning him to a perpetual reflection of a lesson of sleeplessness, as a form of manifestation of somnambulism, specific to the internet era, in order to fulfill the unusual roles of the need to overcome the harrowing cry of the mystery that sheds its labyrinths.

Leadership: Can you discern the particular significance of the process of awareness of your inner thoughts and states, conferred by your belonging to another reality, superior to the contingent, non-essential one, to which the other beings belong?

Of all the arts of thinking, meditation in darkness did not resist the classification of its content in the narrow headings of the profile of a Révélateur des vérités, in the moment of reference of a full moon. It is apparent that I was attracted by something ghostly, mysterious, and full of energy, full of legend, which seemed to be created in another world, which conjugated the activity of forces and the capabilities of the living man.

I was experiencing that moment as if someone would have made their presence felt near me, the more unreal the more concrete, with the role of an enhancer of blood circulation, a sort of flash of a universal language of feelings and reason, something that elevated me above my own theories and thrashed me in the magic fire of otherworldly understandings, conducted quietly, in the name of a superstition.

If I had transposed myself for a moment into a character of the writer Colin Falconer, from the novel "Aztec", these words would probably have reached my ears, motivated by a reality that can never be exhausted: "Someone once told me life is just a dream and lasts only for a moment. All our fears are like the shadows cast on the wall by a child's hand. We have to let ourselves be guided by our hearts. In the end, nothing matters anyway."

Leadership: Do you intensify your drive to create a New Man, through a reflection produced in the virtue of a customized obsession?

One night, Nicolas Flamel, the creator of the Philosopher's Stone, had a dream. The sky had opened to let a bright spirit descend down to earth. The angel held a book with a bright brass cover. Its warm voice, with a sublime timbre, focused on a message with a strong emotional impact:

- Gaze upon this book, Nicolas. It seems unknown to you, as it is to others. But one day, you will see within it what you must see and you will know what no other knows...

A shadow is always something rare, but rarer it is to turn it into a light source. Without it you wouldn't explore the power through which the intellect sees itself. Without it you wouldn't be able to gaze upon unknown distances, you would experience unique feelings as burdens or feelings of plentitude, in the absence of a clear representation of what membership to the space of a miracle means which itself, in turn, breathes a certain air: the filled with adrenaline mirage of a liberating utopia.

Human personality is part of the command structures of a psychological experience. It requires to be addressed as a distinct unit between traits of temperament, found in an unbreakable bond with the situation you're in, and hallucinatory experiences that decisively give birth to that feeling of a possible wholeness and perfection, in the presence of an imagined force or of an enigmatic phenomenon.

To connect to such a force, to such a phenomenon, to an energy of high vibration, means to give a new and full of meaning storyline to your existence. To follow such a storyline, correlated with the tendency of being dependent on a pressing need of conception of the self, means to simulate the complexity of a development phase in the form of a construction of fantasy.

The New Man is a creation of the mind, a form of fantasy from which you never want to detach yourself, conditioning yourself to a perpetual reflection vis-à-vis the way you can contribute to changing the reality of the world around you.

If you want to chisel your way of thinking and broaden your vision of yourself, then be a seeker of the meaning of your own mystery. Play your role in the customized obsession of an identity that best fits a model of fantasy that has never before been approached, but one which leads to an increase in the importance of your value as a filmmaker. Direct your profile well and turn yourself into your favorite dream. Express your purpose and needs through an "angel".

The New Man is called to give to the notion of "psychological experience" the meaning due to the representation of the knowledge of a being who, exposing himself to the contrast between appearance and essence, wants to keep our hope awake and strengthen the courage of freedom to think beyond the limits of this world.

The Harrowing Cry Of The Mystery That Sheds Its Labyrinths is that measure of the type of psychological nuance that uses the speculation of finding an answer to the question: "What must you see in order to find out what no other knows?"

Let your mind escape into a chimeric universe. Let yourself be drawn into a feverish vortex with the power of a revealing dream. And when you will be ready, an angel will reveal itself to you.

The Harsh Law Of The Elders (II)

On January 04, 2013

Find the right way to express your winning attitude without losing your sense of finitude.

Almost everything changes and disappears in this fierce storm at the crossroads of time. Only one person remains, always at the same point, in all the actions that he carries out, and with all the beliefs that he has: Tom Bell. And the assassin, Anton Chigurh, continues to kill and is not to be found.

The whole world seems to be collapsing, it is clear that life in those places meant more and more a fast way towards death. Bell remains, and consistently continues to draw new horizons to his ambition. Only he, due to his refined responsible attitude and his bravery to be entirely worthy of his call, of his job, seems to gets along with his destiny.

He was always clinging to another chimera, to a new very fine thread of hope. He does not want to quit. An infinite shudder crosses his being. He was whipping his demon more and more to remind him about his purpose, to give the necessary impetus for victory. However, he could not catch Chigurh; he is always left behind, more and more behind him.

Leadership: Do you maintain your vision, even in the face of impending defeat, accepting that you cannot control reality?

The old age does not pull the faith from him, like tearing from the calendar the sheet of the passed day; on the contrary, strengthens his goals, and hardens his will to achieve them. But until when? Until the demon by itself will favor to leave his body.

As if out of respect for his immense will, the fate threw him, but out of pity, a bait, one clue - and that one confusing, but just to separate him further from the true reality. The reality, which barely in the end, he fully accepted it. Defeat. Recognition of helplessness. Abandoning the false identity. The death of the hero inside him. Returning to that universal value: the measure.

"I always knew you must be willing to die to do your duty. However, I do not want to risk anymore, and to meet something I do not understand. I am overwhelmed. "

Leadership: Is it time to free yourself from your opponent by defining a test variable to represent you in a realistic picture of yourself?

The French writer, Anatole France, pulled a warning signal for today's and tomorrow's leaders: "The elders hold too much on their ideas. Therefore, the natives from Fiji Islands kill their parents as they get older. In this way, they facilitate the course of evolution."

Do you have the wisdom to take the decision of renunciation? Can you restrain your impulses and excesses, or you continue to whip the devil within you to achieve the impossible? Are you feeding with the illusion that you could go back to the status of a hero that you were? How do you assess your progress - by sorrows and disappointments that are racing around you?

The opponent within you is the illusion of achieving a success that will strengthen your authority when you are past your prime. The evolve does not mean to devalue your identity through a boundless enthusiasm towards the sensational successes. But, it means to rediscover yourself, to really open up towards change, to be wiser. A road that has its purpose, even if this means abandoning all the others. The road of withdrawal, the acceptance of truth: "I do not wanna risk anymore, and to meet something I do not understand. I am overwhelmed."

Even retreat is a virtue. And as a variable of testing the reasoning that stands behind the real motive of avoiding action with negative consequences, restraint becomes a sort of identifier of your own resources to stay on the world stage or in the backstage. Retreating is the free expression of the truth that frees you from any pressure, from any hesitation, from any psychic pressure that can force you worse into the terrible things that would happen to you before.

Leadership is a well-deserved retreat from the superior world of the absolute ideal, from which you gain the image of your own physical and moral constitution.

Leadership: What happens when you shoot a few bullets in your own image?

Paraphrasing a famous writer, to keep yourself hanging by the illusion of perfection, through a forced tension of your potential is like you shoot a few bullets in your own image reflected in the mirror: in this case it disappears only the threatening image, but not your opponent, who continues to lie in wait within you.

The seductive momentum towards the new heights, all your impulses towards the actions that apparently lead to success, but actually narrow or amplify the horizon up to the absurd, preventing your steps, outlines that reflection opposite to the true direction that you must follow. That mirror reflection, which may contrast with your personality if you were not what you have already accepted to become - a slave of the "demon".

The factor that helps you to prevent an eventual wandering – that fine disconnection from the reality, the element that comes to essentially define your identity, is the control, the temperance of the demon within you, this triumph over your own limits.

Confront the demon within you, without keeping yourself anchored in the illusion of the evolution that he persistently imposes to you. In leadership, the winning attitude sometimes occurs through a retreat from the "hallway of champions" to make way for honor and self-esteem to place itself on the pedestal of triumph.

The image you take in a phase of life seen from the perspective of fatality suggests your desire to escape from reality and to take refuge in a world that is constantly trying to make you become someone more than you are capable of being.

The Harsh Law Of The Elders can be enunciated as follows: "Find the right way to express your winning attitude without losing your sense of finesse."

The Harsh Law Of The Elders (I)

On January 04, 2013

Confront the demon within you, without keeping yourself anchored in the illusion of the evolution that he persistently imposes to you.

He was in a perpetual delirium. Among all the illusions that could be born in the brain of this old sheriff from Desert Aire, the most ridiculous was the ambition not to abandon his purpose. A light of immortality, an odyssey of the spirit towered over the relativity and contingency of fatal occurrences that were smacking the banal everyday life.

His name was Ed Tom Bell. The purpose of his life, more and more fierce, more oppressive, more enslaving, became quite clear as the events had acquired proportions: the capture and the arrest of Anton Chigurh, the ruthless assassin, this cursed ghost, a sort of Hector Barbossa, who spread fear in only with the name, and which the darkness hid it very well in the boat of fatality.

However, catching a ghost and untangling the mystery that surrounded it, it was not an easy task for Tom Bell. His thoughts, increasingly haunted by this inhuman form of existence, who appeared and disappeared, always in a different place, feeding itself only with innocent blood, were revolting against his own laws, his harsh law that just hatched from his conscience, and still have not tensed his muscles. When it would be fully approved?

The struggle with the Demon. Tormented by the thought that maintained the flame of his insistence, the sheriff Tom Bell left himself grabbed by the demon of hope and confidence, and threw himself with all the energy into the unknown. A flight towards absolute that always ends in the same way - a new victim, a new victory of the "ghost". And he imagined that would succeed eventually the impossible, to catch it.

Anton Chigurh is always undiscoverable. Tom Bell follows again the demon from him, remains in position, and continues the tracking. Nevertheless, like a cruelty of fate, more and more people are killed, more and more old people. Was it a kind of warning given to his own weakness? Was it the signal of an involution?

Leadership: is your ambition to evolve based on a philosophy centered solely on the idea: "Did I turn the darkness of my life into an impossible mission?"

Are you possessed by the demon of excess? Are you falling into the trap of a false identity? How much should change the events for you to adapt to reality? Are you throwing yourself into the unknown and continue to wander into a reckless race for "ghosts"? Are you facing a self-imposed Alter Ego? Are you following the demon within you, do you continue a chase in vain that distorts your perception about the possibilities of change and over your own role?

An uninspired decision, centered exclusively on the idea, "I turned the darkness of my life into an impossible mission", is to continue to draw new horizons of your ambition even when you are moving in the opposite direction to your evolution. The potential of the form of being constantly in a self-assessment situation and the potential of the form to meet the demands of a consciousness that wants to face the world depends on the facet of self-reliance.

Self-dependency is the reflection of the image of a subjective reality that arises from the conception that the world has been created according to the patterns of destiny, everything relating to time. It is the equivalent of selecting a creed that constantly pulses the challenge of its own ability to cope with the demands of a great role. Therefore, in creating self-dependency, you tend to feed yourself constantly with illusions of self-reliance, self-pacing, and self-promotion, trying to accede where your chances are not favorable.

Leadership is the result of a firm choice that corresponds to a two-stage scenario: first you analyze the reasons why you would fit a major role, then revert back to your normal course. Otherwise you will bear the consequences of your vulnerability in the face of the unforeseen and that of paradoxes.

This option can bring an added value to your basic characteristics, or can activate that part of you, that "demon" - a different kind of Ego that may distort your perception towards reality, and on what you are capable of doing.

A disagreement between "to be" and "not to be" too old for a new experience, can go too far, up to antagonism between reality and illusion. It's a state of degradation of the identity granted to you due to the place, function, roles, and the status that lies to you in the society - but that does not honor leadership.

To have confidence in you is the path towards the ultimate success, and anyone can combine courage, integrity, ability and ambition to change the events by his own example. However, to qualify yourself for the status of a leader, you must avoid the effect of "too busy" over your area of development. The undesirable effect of melting your own relational individuality, whose first reality it is to constantly keep you in check.

I think the following saying refers to the too high expectations of each leader overtaken by his limits: "If you change your position towards the sun, it does not mean that the world spins around you."

Abstain yourself at reaping the rewards of your own demon that requires you stubbornly to be more than your limits allow you.

Abstain yourself in broadening your horizons beyond the border with the balance. Do not change your position towards the highest parts of leadership, the only valid ones, deeply embedded in the human-socio-professional field, and that can be identified and described by a single effort of virtue "to be abstinent from the excess of being in whatever you undertake"

Is it the moment to retire from the professional life? Do you keep trying to adapt yourself to a hostile environment, regardless of the consequences that entails your refusal?

Sheriff Tom Bell is the materialization of a metaphor that can be understood as follows: we are all driven by an invisible force to lay a path full of successes, but that does not mean to be totally in agreement with it.

When you try to pursue your life's goal and, with it, acquire a new understanding of things, remember that what can break you is the skill of your will to function according to the rules conditioned by events that you cannot prevent from happening.

The harsh law of the elders expresses the following reality the more you get older, even if your will is strong, the yield decreases. And so the lofty goals, towards which you aspire, cannot be accomplished anymore. In this context, you must know when to put the point. And if you want to take it over again, you must choose your appropriate way.

Are you adopting a stereotypical and egocentric behavior, in those circumstances that you cannot control? Are you always staying in the same point, in all the approaches that you carry out, and with all the beliefs that you have?

The Healers

On February 17, 2010

Provide continuity to your leadership, ordering your practices into a mosaic to form an accurate picture of performance.

The last patient was a little girl of only 10 years old, accompanied by her mother. She was complaining of chest pains and in the heart area. She was breathing heavily, coughing and choking from time to time. She could not sleep all night. Her mother was very worried, thought she has tuberculosis.

The little girl laid down on the bed at the doctor's request. Impatiently, she orderly and nervously waited for the doctor's verdict.

The doctor examined her carefully at a glance and then slowly touched her chest with his right hand.

- Does it hurt over here?

- No.

Then the doctor moved his hand a little lower, to her stomach.

- How about here?

- Yes, said the little girl starting to cry and with a shaking voice.

The doctor put on his stethoscope and listened to her heart and lungs. Finally, he gave the verdict. The girl had nothing wrong with her heart or lungs, but the pain came from colitis and spread towards her thorax, causing respiratory problems and coughing. The doctor gave her a simple treatment which proved to be effective.

Leadership: Do you confirm your participation in a "cause of pain" event through an attitude of understanding the side-effects caused by a greater vulnerability to the factor: "am I the only one who can fill this gap?"

Trying to make the company work in such harsh times resembles a lot with a doctor's attempt to offer a patient the suitable treatment, more or less complex, and then to follow his evolution until complete healing. The more skillful and closer to people you are, the more you will be able to find a suitable treatment, so that they would regain their performances, and the company would regain and maintain its "health".

As a leader, the company's destiny rests in your hands. Even if its chances of survival are minimal, even if nobody believes in a miracle any more, you must try your best to find the best solution in order to save it. However, the first step in this direction it is obviously the careful and competent consultation. Being able to see what the company "suffers from", to notice the details and establish its staff situation, and then, depending on the symptoms, the gravity of the illness, to give the appropriate treatment.

A cause of pain that can feed another moving hypostasis is the opportunity of finding yourself again in a similar situation in which the one next to you was put when you feel that you have to act in some way, but the context forces you to let things follow their course without being able to change anything.

Just as diagnosis is the most important component of the activity carried on doctors, so determining their ability to organize and carry out an action necessary to achieve a performance is the most important component of your leadership and your efficiency mainly reflects that leader. The best leaders heal their organizations from their problems by indicating the most effective treatments.

Placing on a high position doesn't ensure your full success. You only gain success only if you are able to take the company to a front level and keep it there. The people depend on you, on your dexterity and ability to lead, and they put all their hopes in you. If you are not always attentive and careful with them, always prepared to give them a helping hand, always very professional, if you don't take care of them and the company at all times, and if you are not always focused on the objective, you will not have such great performances. As a leader, you must be able to make a change in every person at the level of the entire organization, so it would increase its powers.

The gap that only you are able to fill so that people can figure out what the appropriate "cards" are for them is the effect of manifesting the sense of guilt that gains significance when you are willing to get involved in their struggle, but you cannot win.

With what do you fill this gap? With the transformation of a defeat into a victory !

Do you try to raise the leadership to its true greatness by accepting and using a kitsch?

Leadership, old-established in international vocabulary, designates exactly a science built on fair and sufficiently clarified intentions, that have a well-defined purpose in the concrete framework of existence of the individual or the company, and reinforces on facts concerning the jurisdiction of he who engages voluntarily in the fight against „the disease" that causes a low rate of professional success.

Kitsch, the substitute for art, which has become a real threat to leadership instead of the genuine art of loving the experience in the field (which gives man the chance to bring significant contribution to the life of the company), can produce up to a certain point – to the uninitiated – a feeling somewhat similar to that specific to the original.

It leads to a strange situation, when reporting leadership to the true art is made in the light of an extract of surrogates, which only alienate him from his true purpose and understanding. Resorting to performance evaluation criteria, unfit to true science, which promises only what can be achieved, notwithstanding the competence of those who lead.

A disturbing confusion of values takes place in the relationship between believing and knowing, between understanding and interpreting. And the inconsistency in interfering on the existing problems and solving them based on the aspects observed in practice becomes alarming. Therefore, the checks over the fulfillment of duties specific to a certain position and the appreciation of the true value of the leader become so necessary.

Experts can be found today in the position to assess the functional status of a company using intuition or at random, an obscure production of diagnoses, solutions and procedures set out in a general form. In fact, the surrogate is a placebo effect product, consumed and managed without a prior "consultation", in the absence of the genuine product.

But leadership cannot be raised to his true greatness by accepting and using kitsch, be it good or bad, an imitation of kitsch itself.

Leadership is the exception you need to point out to a report on your attitude towards life that confirms the rule: "you only have one chance to make a first impression with your erudition."

Try to always experience the challenge of transforming a man's existence, without failing to choose the best option to maximize the impetus to continue the path towards change.

Conclusion: All the practices and methods that you use, together, are forming a mosaic image that defines your overall leadership, respectively of your efficiency. The more you manage to prescribe recipes for "recovery" that have long-term positive effects, the more grows and the level of your performance, and even more you will improve your relationships with others.

Provide continuity to your leadership, ordering your practices into a mosaic to form an accurate picture of performance.

The Healing Force Of The Soul

On April 26, 2015

Identify new ways of transmitting the revelation you own, imposing the meaning given to it by your soul.

- Did you truly believe that I could console myself? Asked Maximilien, bitterly looking at the count.

- Listen – said Monte Cristo – understand my words well, Maximilien ! When I ask if you have consoled yourself, I speak to you as a man for which human hearts hold no secrets. Come now, Maximilien, let us descend together to the bottom of your heart and investigate. Situations exist that people can feel instinctively, but they cannot discuss them with their minds.

Do you still feel the burning impatience of the pain that makes you jump up and down same as the lion bit by a mosquito? Do you feel the same searing thirst that is only quenched in the grave? Are you still the prey of the idealizing of self-pity that flings the living outside of life, in search of death? Or do you only feel the carelesness of those tired nerves, the boredom that stifles the ray of hope that wishes to shine? Do you feel, I wonder, the loss of memory, bringing about the impotence of tears?

*Dear friend, if this is what you feel, if you cannot cry, if you feel your numb heart dead, if you have no strength other than that of God, if you have no eyes but for the heavens, then, my friend, let us leave aside the words too tight for the meaning that our soul gives us. **

Leadership: Can you find a good use of the potential to control what people see in you, by calling on the strange game of association between the tremendous aspects of life and the memorable images of patience faced with seemingly inescapable situations?

The process of maturation and of consolidation of personality, involving advantages of increasing emotional information for a better reception of the message you transmit, in the sense of an intervention that can support your way of being, the performance, objectives, ideas and their making, can be distinguished by a less usual characteristic, uncommon.

Namely, the control of reality supported by the power of the soul to assimilate it, produces or transmits a state, an emotion, a message that can be directly or indirectly dressed up into a meaning that sits between hope, doubt and revelation.

The famous writer, Stefan Zweig, wrote about the founder of Christian Science, Mary Baker-Eddy: "She observed that indisputable truth that any imaginary representation of a feeling, therefore of a pain, contains in itself the tendency of transforming itself into reality and that, therefore, a preventive suggestion removes the fear of getting sick which is as dangerous as the disease itself."

The meaning you give to your soul and transmit to others, rather by supporting with humility a revelation that doesn't need evidence to realize a new image of reality, turns you into a man adaptable to life, to its circumstances, to the context in which people live, develop and are fulfilled.

The consolation effect fills you up with emotional states that you did not suspect you could experience, justifying the pain you feel when you think someone has something that belongs to you, especially that spark of intelligence, kindness, and wisdom that come from the mind and heart in respect for the values of life.

And the only suggestion that you will receive from someone truly experienced in the algorithm of life, from a truly impressive spirit, is to find a refuge in the face of the difficulties and contradictions of your personality, instead of worldly vanities, in the place of numerous passing adventures.

Leadership: Can you be yourself in a world that constantly tries to mold you into something other than what you are prepared to accept as a restructuring phenomenon of your inner world as compared to the plausible interpretation of reality that you cannot deny?

When you want to help a man first you have to open his interest to the meanings of a higher revelation. Revelation requires self-disclosure, a disclosure of your will or of a superior entity, as an initiative towards a representation of certain points of view, alternative and motivated vis-a-vis the way in which the aspects of life should be interpreted. To mutual benefit.

If you have embedded within you the ability to believe in something superior, bending your reasoning to the most favorable approach in what regards fulfillment and gracious force that nothing evil can penetrate, then you will fall prey to the "idealization of self-pity that flings the living outside of life, in the pursuit of death". Letting yourself be influenced by a superior spirit means believing in a reality that cannot be denied, one that at any time can turn into an inner dynamism force almost to shake up any understanding of life.

The most poignant leadership bears the mark of that mentality based on the recognition of the "unseen" spirit that a superior entity – providence – offers in the darkest situations of life. Providence is the answer you give to life when you are led by a superior understanding of the necessary renunciations in order to achieve effective and outstanding results over time.

Finding a new order for the great answers of life, which God prepared before you merged with them and understood them even in the pale light of pain, as a glimpse of certain truths progressively revealed by subjecting reason and consciousness to the will of the heart, is necessary for a good use of your potential of controlling what people see in you.

What people need to see in you is not "the gaze up to the heavens" that is required by the most powerful faith, but what makes you feel alive when the meaning that you give to your soul causes a reaction of pushing the limits, of the type: "I am more than what I am."

The Healing Force Of The Soul is won by the momentum given to the virtue of behaving disciplined amid the disorder of life. If you manage this performance, which involves a series of compromises, but especially a large dose of belief in something good, only then will you be able to get other "souls" closer to a state that can be motivated by faith in a superior entity.

The Heart Feels What The Eyes Hesitate To Recognize

On August 28, 2024

A gesture of complete generosity can be accompanied by a final symbol of vanity, preserved as a reminiscence of the human desire to protect a part of oneself.

Laura Quinn, from the movie "Flawless (2007)", was face to face with a reality that seemed to end its cycle. Her story, so well hidden under the veil of silence, was about to be revealed in an unexpected way. The reporter, attentive and eager to find out the truth, delved deeply into the story of her life. And so, in that moment of unexpected confession, the words flowed without stopping. Something in the reporter's soul seemed to break slowly, under the weight of the untold stories.

Silence then fell between the two of us, a moment suspended in time with no exit. I could see Laura leaning forward slightly, like a silent witness to an unspoken confession, searching my eyes for answers that she too dared not utter. The question was there, like a subtle shadow in her gaze, but nevertheless it only intensified the silence, deepened the space between the words, made the fragility of the moment awkward. It was a silent, almost palpable curiosity, a kind of unspoken tension that paradoxically said more than any articulate question would, causing me to lose myself in a fuzzy confusion.

"Excuse me, but I have to know. What happened to the money? Did they get to Mr. Hobbs?"

Leadership: Can the truth you attach to your face as protection become a barrier between the total openness of your soul and the unspoken struggle you carry in silence?

In moments of deep confession, silence and gaze can communicate truths more powerful than words, revealing unexpected vulnerabilities. Laura paused for a second, staring out the window that looked out onto the bustling city, as if reflecting on a truth only she knew. A kind of deaf struggle was going on in her, Emensuz Anaanacest , she lived a kind of inner contrasts that consumed her in silence, always swinging between unspeakable desires and fears. Something in her seemed to be breaking, oscillating between the strength to move on and the fear of exposing herself completely to her own conscience.

"Mr Hobbs... well, we never spoke. But I received a letter from a bank in Switzerland informing me that an amount has been deposited into an account in my name. More precisely, the sum of one hundred million pounds. All the money. And, only from there, my real story begins."

In a simple and unpretentious gesture, Laura handed a manuscript to the reporter, this gesture representing a total opening of the soul, a kind of bridge beyond appearances.

"Your article is about successful women, isn't it? I give you this manuscript with all my notes, about my life. I hope you are inspired and I hope you can inspire others. You can contact me if you want. My details are on the back."

Leadership: Can your inner world expand to a new level of awareness of lived experiences, in a moment of revelation where vulnerability becomes a bridge between past and present?

With a meaningful silence, the reporter slowly unfolded the manuscript, like a painter delicately caressing his canvas, the pages seeming to sigh under the weight of time. When the pages opened, slowly and mysteriously, he noticed a short personal note from Laura, written in a trembling hand, as if engraved in the watermark of the paper. The silence had become a living presence, filling the surrounding air with an unexpected gravity. That note, lost among the words, seemed to reveal a sliver of soul, a gem of vulnerability, a confession hidden between the lines, and her heart beat in sync with each letter, as if she had discovered, for the first time, a secret world, not only Laura's, but also her world.

This fragment of soul, laid out on paper with such vulnerability, became the mirror of my own questions and turmoil, in the extension of an introspección profundis . I wondered anxiously, how many of my own secrets could be read between the lines of my articles, how many unspoken emotions I was hiding? How many of my own fears and hopes are echoed in the words I write? In that moment of revelation, I realized that I had discovered more than just a personal note. I had found a key to understanding human nature in all its complexity, a bridge between past and present, between myself and others. And in this discovery, I could feel my own inner world expanding, becoming richer, deeper, and more mysterious than ever.

"I didn't mean for it to happen, but the burden of Hobbs' money sent me in another direction. I discovered the world and through it I discovered myself. You'd be surprised how long it takes you to give away £100 million. It took me 40 years to do that. And only today I donated the last penny for charitable purposes, especially in the field of science, in medical research. I'm finally free. It's a remarkable world out there..."

Leadership: Do you feel your own inner world expand when you explore the lives of others, as vanity becomes the virtue of expressing your own vulnerability?

At the end of the last page, the words came off the paper with the force of a question addressed not to the mind, but to the soul of the one who read them: "You will be a giver, or a taker?" Will you be a giver or a taker?

I felt like this question was not only for me, but for every soul who would have reached this point in the manuscript. Faced with these words, anyone would have been forced to confront their own essence, their own balance between generosity and selfishness, between light and shadow. Laura, however, did not stop there, no, she could not leave the past behind, deny it like an artist forgets his first sketch. I could see her walking away from me, with a faint smile on her lips, continuing as if to herself an almost whispered confession.

Sometimes a seemingly small thing can represent all that we really are: "We gave it all. Except for that jewel you held in your hand, so rare and valuable." I saved this one for rainy days. Or maybe... maybe it's the last shred of vanity I have left."

In these words was hidden not only the story of a life dedicated to the transformation of the world, but also the inner struggle of a woman who, in the end, had managed to find her peace. When all is gone, eyes still follow what's left safe. It's a story about courage, introspection, and the choices that define us. In the end, all that remains in the soul are the traces of those uncertain choices, small fragments of emotions, and the echoes of fulfilled or lost dreams, which we have avoided admitting even to ourselves.

Leadership explores the finesse of human choices, fusing between sacrifice and preservation, in search of an inner peace that transcends the struggle between light and dark. More specifically, leadership evokes the inner struggle of one who, faced with his own choices, finds the courage to transform the world starting with himself.

The heart feels what the eyes hesitate to recognize , hiding the truth under the veil of uncertainty. Thus the soul remains caught between desire and denial, seeking solace in uncertain silence.

The Heart's Impulse

On October 11, 2010

Keep intact your relationship with people, revealing them that detail of your character due to which they would accept your leadership.

I feel tempted – and I cannot resist the temptation to speak to you again, in this serene time of full autumn, about the famous character Count of Monte Cristo, from the famous eponym novel, written by Alexandre Dumas.

After the Count reached his goal – revenging on those who sent him to prison, where he was abandoned for many years – he decided to share his riches to his only friends, Maximilien and Valentine, and to restore Haydee's freedom, the daughter of the ruler Ali Pasa, whose life he saved, but who was a slave.

With an inquietude that he vainly tried to hide, Monte Cristo asked Valentine to take care of Haydee, for he shall go away, and she shall remain alone in the world.

Leadership: What delimits you and defines you as a personality must be lost in order to live an authentic experience of identification with someone else?

The time for the great attempt. Hearing this, Haydee, whose presence the Count did not feel at that moment, turned pale. She untied her diaphanous hands, as virgins do before God and, with tears in her voice, she said:

- Ok, your orders will be fulfilled, master. I am your slave and I will listen to you. I'll forget even your name and I'll be happy. Then, she took a step back and got ready to go.

Hearing that woeful voice, which touched the most secret string of his heart, Monte Cristo shuddered. His eyes met the girl's look, and he could not bear what he saw in her eyes.

- Jesus Christ ! – Said Monte Cristo – so it may be true what you left me guess? Haydee, you would be happy if I didn't leave you?

- I'm young – she replied gently – I love the life you always made so enjoyable for me. And I would regret to die... Yes, I would die, my lord, I would die if you leave me. Then, rushing to his chest, she cried – Yes, I love you ! I love you like I would love my father, my brother, my husband ! I love you like I love my life, how I love God, because you are nicer, better and greater than all beings for me !

Leadership: Are the search results of an existential sense the sole assessment criterion of your value?

He was right, the one who said: "What delimits and defines you as a person must be lost in order to live an authentic experience of identification with someone else". Always remember you as you were before you merged with the role of another character !

Most often, in the appreciation of a man's reference value, his search results of an existential sense are the sole assessment criterion. But this value is often distorted by the reality subject to tortuous conjunctures, to a mix of factors and situations aligned on the axis of consciousness independent of the inner world representations, in fine tune with discontinuances, oscillations and alternations between "to be" and "not to be".

But there are complex situations or twists, where partial or total success to get possession of an appreciation or loyalty evidence can be considered a valuable unconditioned income. That if the leader, as well as his supporters, give importance and value to spiritual, emotional and intellectual maturation amid an accumulation of daunting experiences.

Leaders, no matter their state and field of activity, are always conditioned by the amount of "light" in the deeper layers of their soul, constantly accompanied by the need to develop stable emotional bonds, motivated by the sense of unconditional belonging to family first and then to community, living life experiences that have the power of positive transformation.

It is very possible that they better understand the world precisely through these personalization or depersonalization phenomena, which will again and again put them in different situations until they learn healthy life lessons: forgiveness, giving up selfishness, releasing old wounds, relational healing, positive impact, gratitude and tolerance.

Your belonging to a broader understanding of reciprocity can be made by fulfilling the purpose of your existential nature and by abandoning the longing for what is above you.

Above you is an effort to overcome what hurts you, what ails you, what makes you distance yourself from the true values, what makes you hate yourself or what makes you plan a revenge.

These life lessons should be accepted as a normal fact, not necessarily as fundamental truths, but as a form of gain with better or worse results, required to life's exam or admission in management. Small grades are always clear evidence that the leader's positive transformation has not occurred or is not yet completed. And society gives great importance to the results of his evolution, hence the subjective character in certain situations, of success or failure in leadership.

The time that Monte Cristo wasted into a feverish desire for personal revenge, was replaced by one that was going to elapse "beyond the footlights" in the universe where he finds out his natural purpose, the one he coveted so much for in his youth, with someone apparently destined for his happy future.

Haydee's love made him forget what he had to. A single word of hers enlightened him more than all those years of wisdom acquired with Abbe Faria. Through her, he could feel connected to life again, through her, he could be happy again. The heart's impulse gave him another ideal realm, replacing his conceptions about life.

Leadership: Are you confronted with the existence tendency to overcome conventional boundaries imposed by strict definitions of the idea of seeing everything in terms of the humiliation you feel about everything that happens to you?

You can never penetrate the great mystery of leadership if you act against your own feelings. In spite of all your accomplishments, even if you have conquered your spectators, becoming one of their favorites, if you will not establish a lasting connection between you and them, you will destroy the bridge that you must pass by yourself. Then, do not leave these feelings fade, but often put them before the role you have to play.

Imagine that hundreds, thousands of people love you. They smile, their eyes sparkle, you brought joy into their souls. They want you, you belong to them. They enable you to regain your past and build a great future, getting excited with those shades of an active sensitiveness. Moreover, they inspire you the same gratitude and inner peace you inspired to them. That is the definite proof that they were blinded by the light irradiated from your seductive personality.

Your ability to lead is seen in the emotional reactions of the other people around you. Do you feel that your presence is part of them, and that is their half? Are you loved due to your sensitive nature, due to your receptive spirit, because of your beautiful manners of behaving, because of your particular charm of your genius, or due to the impulse of your heart?

Leadership captures the way you relate to what is happening so that the final gratitude will replace the original humility.

The heart's impulse is that heart-stirring fire which represents you, which always accompanies you and affects your existence on all levels, personal, social, and professional. It is the time for the great attempt, when you establish a lasting connection with those around you. It is that something that engraves forever in other people's souls. It is the detail of your character, because of which they want to stay around you and even lean on you.

The heart's impulse must sometimes precede the urge of the mind, in order for you to penetrate the great mystery of leadership, acting in accordance with what your heart dictates.

The Heights Of Success

On December 02, 2024

Looking towards a wider horizon reveals a new meaning of personal victory.

I have always wanted to be a winner, and my sister, Oana Fântânaru, managed to achieve this goal for me. Every alert step, every sustained effort of Oana on the mountain paths becomes a "Nexoris Temporal Eternix" – a point of convergence between personal effort and collective impact, so that every perseverance, every challenge becomes an opportunity to display one's spiritual identity, revealing the determination of a true champion.

Watching her run, as an artist wields a brush to create a masterpiece, I am reminded of the words of Saint-Exupéry: "If you want to build a ship, do not start by gathering people to chop wood and divide tasks, but awaken in them a desire for the vast and endless sea."

In light of this wisdom, I see how each half marathon won by Oana becomes more than a personal victory transposed into collective inspiration. Rather, it becomes a symbol of the possibility of transcending human limits, by corresponding with the desire for self-improvement. Because the greatness of a champion is reflected in how much he can lift others alongside him.

Leadership: Can the victories achieved contribute to redefining your greatness, confirming that inner peace is a more powerful force than any demonstration of physical strength?

With the spirit of a fearless warrior, she transforms each race into a lesson in overcoming limits and inspiring others, just as a painter transforms emotion into art, rendering a masterpiece in tireless strokes. Not to mention her impeccable running style – l'arte di superare i limiti – which makes every victory an expression of her own creation, a celebration of overcoming inner barriers.

For this reason, I believe that unity is needed, following the motto "all for one and one for all", to understand that, in fact, Oana, looking beyond the sporting results, is experiencing a kind of continuous revelation, a kind of spiritual call towards collective fulfillment. Yes, that's right. Transforming a simple race into collective inspiration is an act of spiritual creation.

Leadership: To what extent do you manage to transform personal success into a catalyst for the evolution of others, making your victory a manifestation of the will to master your limits?

With each personal victory, the tireless spirit of the champion ignites the spark of transformation in the souls of those around him. And the sacred space of competition, this teatro dell'autotrascendenza, a place where visibility and control intertwine with collective energy, becomes the silent witness of this transformation. Like a painting by Joseph Mallord Turner, where light pierces the fog to reveal the essence of the landscape, each race reveals the true nature of victory, but more than that, it offers a touch of transcendence to the art of overcoming ordinary limits, which Oana's singular creation transforms into collective inspiration.

What is Oana's creation? In the ability to transform each step into a living testimony of the power of her vibrant spirit, where personal effort becomes a catalyst for the evolution of the entire sports community in Romania. So, it is vital to understand that authentic success transcends the simple measurement of time or distance. Always, looking at the peaks that surround us, we, all runners, realize that in this sacred space of nature something more valuable than any champion's trophy was born: the understanding that "true greatness lies in the ability to lift others with you."

This painting is all the more interesting because its idea came from Napoleon himself. It is said that David wanted to paint him as a hero with a sword in his hand, on the battlefield. Bonaparte, however, uttered the memorable words: "No! Battles are not won with the sword. I want to be painted quietly, on a wild horse."

Leadership: Can your effort be perceived as a figurative creation that values the testimony of a life lived with authenticity, thus becoming a visual representation of expressive greatness?

Greatness is not in the battles won, but in the calmness with which you master your limits, transforming challenges into moments of grace that lift those around you. Or rather, only when you witness authentic greatness, do you discover that true power lies not in personal victories, but in the ability to master calm in the face of challenges and inspire others.

Isn't Oana doing justice to the spirit of the example set by Napoleon, by understanding the essence of greatness: that it is not demonstrations of strength that create heroes, but the power to remain master of oneself in the face of challenges, and to lift others through her example of transforming each trial into a valuable lesson for others?

Just as the calmness of a leader on a restless horse speaks louder than any triumphal speech, the mountain runner inspires the world not through the noise of victory, but through the modesty and calm with which she faces the trail. The mountains become witnesses to an inner struggle that, once won, reflects on the sporting community. In this sense, greatness becomes an act of collective creation. Whether you master the strength of a ferocious animal or your own fears, it is the impact on others that counts. And, as a true leader, the runner leaves a legacy that transcends time or podiums.

True greatness is not measured in noisy victories, but in the calmness with which you dominate difficult situations, thus recognizing yourself as a teacher of your own path.

The Heights of Success are measured in the echoes of the changes you inspire. Especially when considering all of Oana's remarkable achievements, I have come to the conclusion that her determination reflects an unwavering will, by correlating it with the positive impact on other runners, that everything she undertakes becomes an example of excellence and inspiration. The power of a unified vision always surpasses the value of an individual achievement.

The eyes that follow a mountain runner see more than movement – they see a story, even more than that, a celebration of the indomitable spirit and the connection with nature. And I am sincerely moved by the echo that my sister's performance arouses in the souls of runners, and I still believe that the power of her example will continue to change many destinies.

In this meeting space between the individual and the collective, between performance and inspiration, Oana demonstrates every time that authentic victory has echoes far beyond the finish line. Each race always becomes a story of transcendence and transformation, where the measurable result is intertwined with the immeasurable impact on the running community in Romania.

The Heir Of A Large Fortune

On June 21, 2015

Obey a solid check of the validity of a man of great character by using the power of thinking that survives "death."

- Now I understand why you wanted to meet me here, on this desolate island, in the middle of an ocean, in this underground palace, in this tomb even a pharaoh would wish for: because I am dear to you, right Count? Because you love me enough to give me one of the deaths you spoke to me of earlier, a death without agony, a death that would allow me to go off uttering Valentine's name and holding your hand.

- Listen, Maximilien – adds the Count aloud, I see that your pain is endless. And yet, you still believe in God and do not want to let your soul perish.

- Count, he replied sadly, you know all too well that my soul is no longer mine.

*- Listen, Maximilien, Monte Cristo continues, you know that I have no relative in the world. I have gotten used to seeing you as my own son; in order to save my son, I would sacrifice my life and more-so, my fortune. I mean to say that you think of death because you do not know the joys of life a great fortune offers you. Maximilien, almost everything I have I give unto thee. With such a fortune, you will be able to reach all that you desire. Are you ambitious? All careers will be open to you. Move the world, change your face, do foolish things if you must, but live ! **

Leadership: Do you separate yourself from the shearing depth of experiences, looking for the extreme limits of spirituality that never ceases to engage life in an authentic story meant to highlight your degree of understanding the mysteries of a superior intelligence?

The phenomenon of "Torn Depth" causes a placing of man in relation with the self that criticizes and punishes, very close to that state of indifference capable of distance him from the aspirations for a freedom of thought which urges good by word and deed. Reflected unto others, this phenomenon imprints that idea to reject everything that could confirm the individual as being invested with superior connotations.

Leadership is the image of self-control resulting from the struggle against prejudices, passions, limitations, motions, grievances that blur your vision and beliefs. Often, man has to go through despair, pain, and embarrassment to reach a higher level of confidence, respect and self-esteem, so that the temperament can change radically by exercising self-control and verticality, by exercising the abstinence from counteracting a phenomenon that happens anyway.

Man reaches a consciousness based on representations of reality that meet his expectations as he proceeds towards learning and power, towards maturity and fulfillment. Spirituality contributes to determining in the individual a particular way of reacting to thoughts and feelings as a means of adapting to the social and moralizing conditions of existence. Spirituality actually means accepting the challenge of new life experiences, without conditioning your consciousness to enter into a definitive impasse.

But the freedom of the man awoken from the state of confusion, of the man who is reborn out of a temporary decline, always seeks extreme limits: fulfilled life or rapid death. Truth be told, only when it is manifested as a reaction to what man experiences and to what happens around, as an essential component of an active attitude in what regards what is inspiring, but especially to what he must represent in the great equation of existence.

Leadership: Do you try to impose your own beliefs on a situation that you feel you do not master, according to your way of perceiving the expected denouement?

When you think the end is near, it's because of the beliefs that sabotage you. The writer of Romanian origin Lungu Laura (alias Alexia McGray) was right when she said:

"Life is a carousel you get in and wait for what will follow. You look when you're up and you wish to always be there. Then suddenly, the carousel falls and it's hard to be down on the edge of the abyss. You ask that you always be up, because you are not the one driving the carousel, the carousel is driving you. This is the life that sets its games before you appear, and you are but a mere participant in the game."

Any denouement can be postponed by a drop of divine help, just as any action has a reaction. Life is the direction of "yourself" in a whirlwind that can destroy you, and whoever you expect less will help you get up.

This "Yourself", subjected to a solid check of the validity of a man of great character, perceived as one direction to follow by experiencing the freedom to act in accordance with the realities of life, becomes the symbol of a polarity which confers to the spiritual attitude a note of challenge to existence. This polarity can be expressed in two ways:

The first, that of the tragic consciousness that knows the meaning of total failure and the need for self-denial, in which the meaning of suffering is known through a vulnerability of the mind and of the soul. The second, that of becoming of a destiny of greatness which encompasses the entire being, focusing within itself the revivalist potential of trust in the future.

Leadership is the result of thinking that survives "death", allowing man to know and take on the joys allowed by the experiencing of faith and a truly uplifting experience. Before man is put into the state of feeling the usefulness of life, someone must teach him its rules, without neglecting the very kernel of rational theory according to which minor changes, carefully designed and intelligently implemented can trigger major consequences.

Life seen through leadership can be defined by the following motto: "Move the world, change its face, do foolish things if you must, but live ! "

The Heir Of A Large Fortune is the individual who, by swimming through the deepest waters of inner life, facing the most decisive circumstances, comes to achieve what he believed was no longer possible: the miracle of being someone else.

This is the whole secret of becoming, testified Alexandre Dumas in his famous novel: "There is no happiness, nor misery in the world. There is only the comparison of a state with another and that is all. Only the one who has felt the worst misfortune is able to feel the greatest happiness. To realize how good it is to live, you must have wanted to die."

The Hidden Side Of Leadership

On January 26, 2017

Examine your life through a subtle selection of meaningful happenings, at the opening of which often shake the awareness and perception of the deep truths of your being.

- You say you believe in God? Asked Caderousse, gravely injured. For me, God does not exist !

- If I would've had the misfortune to believe up until now, answered Monte Cristo, I would believe now, watching you suffer to death !

Listen, the Abbot said to him, reaching with his hand for the wounded as if he'd want to command faith to him: this is what He did for you. This God you refuse to recognize in the last moment of your life: He has given you health, power, steady work, and even friends. Finally, he has given you life, as man should have it for him to be kind, with the peace and consciousness of fulfilling his natural desires. Instead of using God's gifts, so rarely given by Him fully, here is what you have done: you have let your fall prey to sloth, envy, pride, drunkenness, and in your drunkenness, you have betrayed one of your closest friends.

- Such a strange priest you are, those of you who despair the dying instead of consoling them !

- Listen – continued Monte Cristo – when you have betrayed your friend, God began not hitting you, but warning you !

A second unexpected wealth came down from the heavens upon you, you have once again found your money and peace, you could've recommenced living the life you dream about. And then, outlaw, then you have again begun to anger God. You became greedier, more arrogant, more selfish, and more without spirit. "I do not have enough", you'd tell yourself, when in fact you had more than you had ever had, and you have committed a third transgression, senseless, inexcusable. And God endured you no longer and punished you. *

Leadership: Do you have to generate a superior understanding from within the cause of your states of "blindness" and not from outside of secondary conditionings, in order to recognize yourself close to the nature of God?

The man who examines his life through a subtle selection of significant happenings, at the opening towards what often shakes consciousness and perception of deep truths of his being, has neither as a support of self-assessment the gift of a clearer vision, nor the gift of an extremely intuitive mind, inclined towards research. Perhaps the whole story of life must be examined as a significant selection of subtle facts and events, of which man's consciousness may or may not resist, through an opening of the soul to the high and bright ones that come from God, but man often leaves no room for painful truths about himself to come to light. Thus, he is guilty of hypocrisy.

Complementing the picture of a life that finalizes its experiences and ends the struggle of a state of wakefulness or rebellion from facing all challenges, this man sees himself compelled to project his spiritual complexity over what forms the object of a background, universal judgment. Which is not devoid of, naturally, the fear of punishment, the conscience of committed sins. And the conscience, necessarily, means to accept the inevitability of a face-to-face confrontation with God's justice.

Always the man who aims to reveal the truths he's made out of, sees himself put in relation to what comes from the outside, to what is brought to his consciousness, to what is reminded of him in his moments of doubt, for him to become the protagonist of a new beginning or of a troubling finale. To recognize yourself close to the nature of God means to accept that everything you do with everything that happens to you is a test of your own inner strength, of your own credibility, of your own soul, in the face of a destiny that first imposes suffering, then joy.

Leadership: Do the events you take part in represent the interactions of an oversized Ego with an exceptional way of living, measured independently of a consciousness that starts from the potential of a phenomenon of depth?

And one of the features of the realism of a man who probes his truths resides in the sum of two instances of the model of transitioning to a new reality:

An instance called "Guide", stemming from the conjuncture of events with a taste of remorse, which help him exhaust the possibilities proposed by the integration into a sad scenario. And an instance called "Navigator" which contains a reference of what needs to happen for man to understand the true value of what is desired to be corrected through direct and immediate experience.

The validity of your power to build a significant life, which prevents possible disharmonies in the shaping of personality, is outlined from the necessity of assuming your own experiences in the form of a recap. And, further, we can speak of a phenomenon of depth perceptible at the level of the vulnerable side of the personality if everything a man does has the effect of a distance from communion with God or even a rupture of this communion.

Just as Napoleon Bonaparte would do, get used to recapping important events at the end of the day, and think of what exactly constituted an exception to the rule, a coincidence, a divine intervention, a warning or a feeling ! Can you find a meaningful correlation between all of these?

Well, Napoleon did not consider any sign, his ego being oversized by a lazy, Corsican pride, and he came to recognize at the end of his life, through the pain suffered in loneliness, that there is a God who does not forgive the deviations from sacred laws.

Leadership: Do you resonate with what is called "guilt" that allows you an attitude of respect for the value that depends on the agreement of faith in a Higher Power, or are you limited to ideas like "the shutter pulled does not let light in"?

This type of self-exploration, caused by contradictions between the good and the bad, which cross the infinite stretches of meaningful existential sequences from the past, puts into function that freedom of the spirit to push man into a certain conjecture. And makes him able to constitute himself as a basis for his liability in the exclusive conditions of aspirations of ascension above daily living, contained in the narrow edges of needs and concerns.

Just as allergies pass, but do not completely heal, so too do years pass, but the somewhat disturbing feeling of an action happened long ago returns. The Ego itself doesn't forgive the facts and the fundamentals that generated them.

The experience of guilt, of the lack of merit to life, of resentment, the unimaginable weight of abandonment, these are some of the signals telling you that you relate to an experience that happened to contain the saying: "Give man the mind of back then, namely, that final wisdom before something happens."

The man who approaches perfection is the one who experiences "living in awakening." So try to understand the reasons behind your actions, even if you are not prepared to face the truths about yourself. The One above watches, and does not forgive.

The Hidden Side Of Leadership sees the shape of your own existence that turns against the foundation you built yourself upon. Make a step forward towards strengthening the power to act like a responsible man, not as a sheep that doesn't resist the one who shears it.

The Highest Level Of Leadership

On December 15, 2016

Proceed in constructing a perfect art, achieving a mix between the experience of ecstasy and the requirements of everything around.

A cosmic silence, born from the integration of man in the landscape, in nature, in the strange life of this country. Once alone with nature, an unusual sensation of self-dissolution in nature embraces you, one of merging with it, perfect harmony. The sensation of the most sublime joy of ecstasy is born. The ecstasy whose laws were the object of so many feverish research, so many meticulous calculations of the artist. Now, however, it has become a concrete sensation. So, the initial thoughts about film are toppled.

He only finds cinema exciting in the measure in which it is a small experimental universe. There will have to be a period of purification, of complete transformation of cinema in which no stone will be left unturned from our dear decedent works. What is around here is much more interesting, incomparably more exciting than any type of cinema. He no longer finds the problem of montage interesting. That of sound even less.

*Now, having reached the core of ecstasy, Eisenstein does, however, have an allergic reaction to cinema. "Still, as conscientious as I have worked here I have never worked before." Now, the unique and so coveted voluptuousness of experiencing a harmony and inner unity is born. **

Leadership: Do you recognize the role of a category of forces required in capturing the essential nature of an experience lived through everything that surrounds you, so to bring the creation to the level of timeless art?

Ecstasy is the path, not without meaning, crossed by a man full of knowledge on the surface of a reality of a supreme order, one which we call the invisible plentitude in flowing movement, after he has traversed the vastness of an experience that broadened his consciousness and refined his sensibility. Here It can be see the uniqueness of creation carried to the level of timeless art: by the fact that what you experience through the thing you believe in fulfills you without justifying yourself, without having the other things.

A man who experiences ecstasy, the man penetrated by a content of the sublime, no matter how crazy the sensation of being surrounded by everything good, beautiful, inspirational, artistic is, lives like a true creator according to the rules of a life and an art that means continuity. An art marked by meticulous calculations, by ever more suggestive colors, which gain a certain symbolism, up to the construction of a true arsenal of "fantasy" elements with a landmark value for the shaping of the new.

The man faced with such an arsenal of elements, corresponds in turn to a whole called "infinity", being able to attribute his work subjected to a unitary concept – an uplifting destiny, full of magnetism and virtuosity. He acquires an unusual power, like a shining star, getting closer to the perfection of the one who loves and borrows terms from his own operating conditions, in the authority of an absolute transcendence.

The personality revolving around leadership is that which, by connecting to everything around, manages to create an experimental universe, always expanding, formed out of a dimension of experiences that beg to be shared, out of the dimension of a way of life full of meaning and out of the dimension of a broader theme of creation.

The construction of art, same as the greatness of man, resembles a newer form of leadership, which I call "Inside-Out". Meaning something that happens inside of you, in relation to the exterior that pulls your gaze and bewitches you fully. And to surpass the limit of experimental knowledge, by relating to what you feel in the context of a certain type of answer to what happens around you, is a masterpiece of the sublime.

The forces that contribute to capturing the essential nature of an experience lived exclusively through everything that surrounds you consist in the unity between idea and image, in which is blended a harmony of emotions, thus integrating man into a landscape of the unusual that constantly reinvents itself.

Inside-out is the inner quality of man transferred in value and spirit in the form of a creation that suggests the perfect harmony between nature and feeling. Or the evaluation of the quality of a creation focused on the requirements of "everything around", meaning that by depending on the features of each model of inspiration, is done in the same way, by the value and inner transfer (in the great book of nature) of a sensitive perception of a counterfeit reality.

The true fulfillment of creation is obtained by experiencing a harmony and inner unity through communion with the life of nature, with its elements, with its forces, with its values, so as to include the NOVELTY of a way of thinking in a theme of great daring, of great visibility, of great interest.

The Highest Level Of Leadership can be achieved only by the man who perceive creation by deepening the understanding of the contexts of exploring the new that depend on the harmonization between the experience of ecstasy and the requirements of everything around.

The Highest Peaks Of Appreciation In Art

On October 27, 2014

Come with precise ideas on the work you intend to bring to life in order to find the most expressive form of uniqueness.

Sergei Eisenstein starts shooting with precise ideas on the work to be done with a clear vision. It is his first sound film and he seems to want to apply the products of the whole theoretical meditation in recent years. Although he starts without sound equipment - it should have appeared only in Kharkov – he shoots all the time taking into account the sound solutions of each scene.

He explained his collaborators: "During the montage this episode will be treated the same way as a composer works on a run on the voices. The material we shoot now is just one of those voices. Most will be used for rear projections and transparency, while close-ups will create a second voice in the foreground ... The third and fourth voice (or theme or reason) are the sound - sound and words."

*The whole audio-visual construction of the film - and every shooting follows it - is intentionally making a sound film become an expression of specific artistic form and the psychological expression of reality. Likewise, towards finding the most expressive form, the sets are built: sometimes within exaggerated perspective lines, sometimes stylized with metaphorical intentions.

Leadership: Do you start at achieving an "update setup" with some subjective elements that confer originality to the treatment of reference composition?

The content of the art expands not because of what results from the mixture or combination of several forms of creation, but because of what more original thinking has to offer, relative to an axis of the resultant of forces acting simultaneously: a structure force, a transformation one, continuity force and valuation force. And capitalizing on artistic potential is not just an objectivity-associated form that provides certainties, it is also a form derived from the subjectivity of what "significant" is, from the activation of what can be played in another form and from the acceptance of what we call the imaginary projections.

Total art, designed to combine new contrasts of the forms of expression that admit a linear approach of relations between concepts and notions, under the effect of parallel inspirations intersecting in the stable reference point of creation, require a certain freedom of spirit - supported somehow by searching the absolute. It claims, in particular, a certain independence in the face of a reality that does not hear and speak, but always opens further, against appearances (damaging perception of what "improvement" means) before becoming permanent.

In this case the "update setup" is an accentuation of the trend of associating the innovations, which pushes forward the boundaries of what can be achieved through science, sometimes by exaggerating the perspective of looking at things - between intuitive and logical. This setup defines and shapes your creative work, helping to generate expectations and predictions of items of expressivity by adding a mix of innovations that facilitate the discovery of the rigorously designed laws, correlations and relations between meanings and forms.

The creation that becomes a psychological expression of reality stems from the fact that the separate elements placed in relation amortize the space inherent to the formation of an image that tries to answer the question: "How did it get to this?"

Starting to achieve an "update setup" with some subjective elements that confer originality of treating reference composition actually means trying to express an idea suite adjusting its effects by doing research on how it can be enhanced and exploited at its maximum. In short, it means easily adding extra value to your creation because of the rarity and uniqueness provided by thinking that seeks for itself, which introspects, always formulating new findings and interpretations.

Finding the form of expression of personal identity, through the idea linking productively two distinct worlds of art - vision and interpretation - by deliberately exploring theoretical trends, starts where the intention is manifested not only as a lost connection between thoughts and questions, but as the essence and structure of a work that is required to be investigated before it is shared.

The appreciation owed to you is a plus of respect for what your authentic essence means in exercising the act of creation, even in the absence of defining elements of the final "form" of the work.

The Highest Peaks of Appreciation in Art dominate everything you try to project on others, everything you try to convey through creation, in order to meet the clearly defined and recognized self-imposed performance criteria. Appreciation is a form of respect for what you do based on what you are.

The Holy Eye Of Paracelsus

On December 20, 2021

Any gaze, even if lost, can be restored by a single consideration: "feeling knows everything before actual thought takes place".

When you walk alone, strongly anchored in the spiritual, you begin to notice everything around you more leisurely. Only then do you reflect best on life, on yourself, on God. And as you walk alone, especially in the evening, when the lights in your room look like miniature silver stars, even if the sky wears its gray cape and doesn't allow any conversation, you realize how important it is to have a mindset based on feelings, "on intangible assets", so on what you have, not on what you lack.

And what exactly do you have that is so precious? You have a vision that drives the operations of thought, capturing the real nature of things, as this nature is designed by God for humanity and progress. A view based on science, first of all, but also a view strongly inclined to the supreme heights of art, because that means true spirituality: "to rediscover yourself through the act of seeing things differently than they seem."

And as I walk alone, reflecting on what sets one thing apart from another, I come to find out what sets me apart from other people, without trying to draw attention to the various superficial conceptions of the nature of unexplored spaces of artistic manifestation which give the impression of incomprehensible depths, or give the impression of smaller or larger miracles, which defy the laws of nature.

Leadership: Can you look more clearly at yourself and what influences your relationships with things around you, through a stated affinity of thinking that goes beyond appearance – to essence?

Like white butterflies coming from another world, the lights still surround me on all sides, soft and preventive, as the darkness of the night grows more and more, but without deepening in my soul. Somehow, I feel protected by a clear thinking that fulfills the condition of purity: to look with your inquisitive eyes through the eyes of God, very clearly and in the finality of being. Because any gaze, even if lost, can be restored by a single consideration: "feeling knows everything before actual thought takes place."

The famous alchemist, Paracelsus, took into account the feeling aroused by this supreme condition, saying*: "And this which you must take heed of is of a great magnitude: that there is nothing in heaven and on earth that is not in man. And God, which is in heaven, is in man."*

This means that the sky, even cloudy, is not devoid of that artistic tendency, deep in the consciousness and soul of man, manifested in the world of creation by researching the expressive values of shapes and colors, the line and the point from which everything is made.

So whatever you see, by investigating and researching the nature of everything around you, tell yourself right away: what makes it more special, what makes it indispensable to the mind, what makes it the best choice for the soul? What high purpose does this have in the eyes of the Creator?

Leadership: Have you developed an attitude of awareness of the things that are required to be penetrated by an orientation of the gaze from the edges to the center, for the sake of a realistic and spiritual order?

If the rule of mind does not belong to you, and if it is not researched in the bosom of Nature, imagining that there is no teacher in the world to teach you, then you will fail in trying to draw a path in the dimension of the sacred. And the sacred, only art reveals it through the creation and discoveries of science that only your own mind, included in the spirit of matter, can cling to without letting go.

Research things well, even those that cannot be seen, bit by bit, far above those that can be seen from a distance. And so the mind, being in favor of artistic investigations, without any kind of artificiality continuously felt, will seek to decipher and understand the divine origin of creation in the composition of all matter. And emotional language must become the instrument of a deep imagination.

Whoever succeeds in perfecting his science only by studying Nature, making his imagination the only religion, no matter how difficult it may be, will only give the key to the full understanding of the Creator. In the end, the man shaped by the artistic act arrives in front of a gaze that looks primarily at him, after which it also looks at itself.

Everything around is art and science, discovery and creation, and darkness best highlights light. Illustrative here is the fact that the clairvoyant eye sees well in both light and darkness. And it sees things that are not the same, although they are very similar. Therefore, man has the freedom to separate things from the whole, to consent to what is happening to him, and he can return to the whole after separating from it, by the fascinating quality of the gaze of capturing the reverse more than the averse of things.

In art, leadership promotes the development of the vision that can be obtained by trying to see the nature of one's being, but also the image of the Creator, in everything around.

The Holy Eye Of Paracelsus refers to that sense of sight directed toward things that really matter to an extended conscience for the judgment of the things we use every day when we open our minds to the study of sacred science. This science is closely related to the art of seeing the nature of one's being, but also the image of the Creator, in everything around.

Man who does not study art as a connoisseur will never understand the ins and outs of creation from the impenetrable mysteries of things, as they are rooted in God's thinking.

The Honesty Principle

On January 22, 2010

Don't ask from people more than you are asking from yourself.

I strongly believe that everything happens for a purpose. Being intelligent creatures, we have the power and it's our duty to learn something from each and every one of our experiences, pleasant or not, entertaining or discouraging. And if everything recurs in life, that means we haven't learned a thing from the lessons we were supposed to learn. That's why I believe that people can progress only if they want to. Otherwise, there will be nothing new under the sun.

Last week, I met a special man. I call him special because, in some way, he doesn't resemble anyone else. And, especially, because he taught me a valuable lesson that I'm sure I will find useful in the future.

I was in a gym, playing football with my friends, some of them with which I had been colleague at the same football club years ago. The gym was pretty large and modern. We had a nice game. But one of the three teams didn't play that well. It was obvious. It's no wonder the players' passes didn't bond, because they were random. They were losing many balls, they didn't run at all, they didn't help each other, but played individually. There was no connection. Their game was evolving on the wrong lines.

The moment we took a break, sitting on the bench next to Andrei, the captain of the team, I couldn't help but ask him: "Andrei, why don't you talk with the boys of your team to make them concentrate more on the game? Don't you see you're getting nowhere? You never played so weak like you did today."

In the answer I received is only praise: "Nicu, these boys played by my side for years. We know each other well. They also trust me, like I trust them. But if I don't play well, they notice and they don't struggle to better me. Don't you see that I also play like a rag today? That's why I can't ask them more than I ask from myself. When I'll perform a fine game and I won't lose that easily so many passes, only then I could lay claims to them. Otherwise, I can't do that. How could they follow me if I'm the one playing the weakest of all?"

Leadership: Do you honor yourself as a winner in a performance test by trusting your authority's reply to a message such as "Failed Authentication"?

The results of a team depend on its leader's efforts. That day, Andrei taught me an important lesson that many refuse to learn: when the leader "plays" weakly, the rest of the team immediately abandons the race. But, moreover, that a leader can't criticize or judge the members of his team and can't lay claims on them while he can't fulfill his duty flawlessly.

The authority of a leader fails considerably, causing a disadvantage of image that does not cancel itself when his reaction to the pressure of a party is directed to another facet of his nature – manifested by the duality of the will to want to change something pertaining to yourself and the instinct to support a greater cause. In other words, a failed authentication takes place in an image experience through which the leader reaches a level of interiorization that shakes his old beliefs and principles from their roots, being called upon to have a partial behavior towards himself.

There are many leaders, and now I'm talking in general, who aren't that sincere and honest like Andrei is. They ask from people more than asking from themselves. Is this normal? Of course, I do realize that some who have leadership positions have the authority to intervene and implement various changes, to impose rules, to take decisions and demand the subordinates to obey them in order to achieve their goals.

But I find it an outrageous lack of professionalism to demand from people something beyond what you're capable to offer yourself. An absolute lack of fair-play. A total absence of respect to the members of the team who struggle to make a good work, who do their best in order to achieve better results.

Leadership: Are you hurt by the instinct to relate how you perceive your role and what you assume when you alienate yourself from the chance of making a difference in team results?

To form a certain conviction of your non-acceptance as a whole of emotions and tensions, then to act according to it, is to become a man known under the cover of a seeming comedian, not under a cover of aspiration towards performance and perfection. Solemn is only the one who wants to be, in all respects, pretentious with the performance he is proud of.

And who gets anchored in a man wounded by the instinct of linking the way he sees his role and what he assumes when he is alienated from the chance of making a difference in the team's result by taking care of managing the emotions lived through firm commitments, will remain in a constant state of dissatisfaction until he abandons any relationship with will.

The duty of a leader is to be close to people, to give them a hand at need, to reward each of them according to their performance. But if he doesn't struggle at all, if he doesn't care for the team's results and doesn't involve himself into supporting and developing the team, then the subordinates, at their turn, won't have concrete reasons to be interested either. And if the leader challenges people more than he does with himself, then they'll label him as being "inadequate" and they'll come to replace the leader.

Leadership is the chance to make a difference in the team's result, without letting yourself be guided by the background circumstances created by an act of renunciation, leniency or mercy.

P.S. If you want to achieve your goals, you always have to keep in mind the competences of the team and not to ask from people more than you are asking from yourself.

The Honey Drop Fable

On April 19, 2020

Try to determine the measure of your character, without making it the main reason for the occurrence of uninsured events of adequate moral coverage.

*- A hunter returning from a hunt stopped to buy a jar of honey. As he poured the honey into the jar, the merchant dropped a drop. A fly came and sat there. From the edge of the roof, a bird came and grabbed it. The merchant's cat saw it and threw itself at it, but the hunter's dog also threw itself at the cat and killed it with its fangs. Angry, the merchant threw the stone at the hunter, who hit him in the head and killed him. To avenge him, the hunter's family attacked the merchant's house and killed his family, robbing the shop. Then all the villagers encamped on the hunter's parents, and the two villages eventually found themselves at war. Believe me, once he has made a decision, the cunning man always finds the drop of honey to start the quarrel.

Leadership: How do you evaluate your experience of using reason as unfolding events that imply an immediate need, correlating them with the interaction between what is observed and what is expected to happen?

Writer Mika Waltari said it well: "He who makes the first step must also undertake a second one. The first step is the most difficult and, when the moment comes, reasons for war will not be absent." In particular, the connection between what is happening outside of you and what is happening in your mind is possible to manage, but only with the agreement of the balance between emotional control and allowing for the free expression of emotions in a healthy way.

It is not a question of the fact that a fire can start from a small spark, but it must be taken into account that the events take place according to man's capacity to bear his reason in his "falls".

Through the simple use of one's own reason, in order to avoid the production of dangerous "sparks", the distinction between "knowing" and "solving" is most clearly seen, being embodied, as an ideal, only by the Stoic sage. In the cold light of reason, to turn a fact on all sides and define it in the toxic substance of events, in the tendentious chaining of other actions in your life, in their tangled and serious becoming, one can see your true character.

Between what is observed and what is expected to happen is the experience of self-contouring in accordance with the role that the "unforeseen" can play in carrying out actions to achieve the right balance between what is known and what is hidden.

The man who has a right character differentiates between what is seen at first sight and what actually happens behind appearances, behind the curtain. Even if he cannot find the way or the opportunity to suppress in time a reaction that can have the opposite effect, sometimes produced in the form of a warning, he still intensifies his attempt to resist the freedom of self-expression in the face of the darkness of the minds in which light has not penetrated.

To put it another way. The right man subtly turns into an attempt to show that he is right, not opposing the event that has already taken place, but relying on the faculty of reason to formulate arguments oriented in the field of an inverted intentionality: the evil thing happened because someone went on the opposite lane and there he collided with a car traveling in the opposite direction. In other words, try not to intersect with something just because you intend to win something.

Leadership is the event that has already taken place, from which two conclusions can be drawn: "Never be interested in lost causes, meaning those in which no one else wants to get involved" and "never intersect with someone who shows too much interest for himself".

The Honey Drop Fable can help us identify the measure of a leader's character, which is given by his ability to be flexible. A leader knows that he must turn a complicated situation into a promising beginning, in order to correspond to certain requirements or a certain context. Moreover, the advice of the English writer Daniel Defoe must be heeded: "The highest degree of human wisdom is to know how to adapt your character to the circumstances and keep your soul calm despite the storm outside."

The Horizon Of A Gaze That Retains Its Expressiveness

On May 22, 2020

That he surpassed not only everyone, but also himself...

To understand a part of what the complexity of a remarkable work means, through the eyes of a writer whose vision outlines an entire symbolic world, and to become enlightened in this world, this is the true measure of a look thrown feverishly into the whirlpool of art. I understood everything, because I am an enlightened, a creator of surreal images, accustomed to the gaze of an eye that observes everything from the height of an integrative vision in the field of fine arts, un frammento del sogno di un momento senza pari, where nothing is the same as in the previous version.

Here is the sight of a special writer, the unique project of an enlightened, in the grandeur of a world full of skillful, suggestive, invigorating words, beating in the heart of an art book: it begins with a leaf so warm to look at, so graceful in a snapshot of random observations, entered under the incidence of art and science, so that it is confused with the explosion of colors offered by the easel of a fragile eternity capable of giving the impression of an "intangible" plan of the Universal Essence.

A look beyond imagination. It begins with a leaf left over from autumn, and continues with the petal of a dear, charming, quiet rose, which comes to life in a timeless story, so close to the stories of Scheherazade, full of teachings, leaving you enveloped in absolutely delightful scents, as if pulled straight out of a thousand and one nights.

Both the leaf, so pleasing to the eye, and the rose petal, so in love with the sun, are part of the recreated atmosphere of a world that the writer's imagination and sensitivity continually shape in the deep plane of practicing a memorable art: Elassfenthil, or manifestation of the affective soul in the concrete of a universal reality.

Leadership: Can you stimulate the development of a spiritual creation that is "above the turmoil", where there is no clear image of yourself, in an attempt to go beyond the accepted boundaries of art?

But it wasn't always like that. For a long time, I did not know how to see, I did not know how, I could not extract from the essence of a look thrown "from here to there" the sublime message of a work of art: background, content, meaning. I didn't always know how to write, I didn't know how to connect even the simplest conversation with angels, with the wind, with flowers, with everything that the charm of nature had in store for me, and maybe that's why my eyes were so sad, tired, discouraged, just like seeing a photo that you feel is missing something special: life.

The leaves were just colorful polka dots that I literally stepped on, just to fill them with mud, or to gather them together with the rake before setting them on fire to breathe in the pleasant smoke of the autumn fire. And the roses smelled nice, and that's it. I was probably just as insignificant as I considered them to be.

I never listened to their voice, I never saw their true spiritual face, because my eyes lacked the depth so necessary for the development of emotional, chromatic, literary sensitivity, meant to manifest between the temptations of another world, where the eyes of the soul can follow a small part of the plan of another reality. The compromise I endured daily, the primordial chaos of a remnant of respect for the feeling of communion with nature, was the processing of Serbian information, without special significance, arranged in a background that said nothing, that did not highlight the memorable plasticity of a living, un-improvised world. I was numb and blind at the same time.

I assume that the eyes that do not see the affective element in everything around them are the same eyes that do not perceive the difference between lucidity and expressiveness.

Leadership: How does your mind and soul react to the sight of a brilliant creation accompanied by an image whose message you have to discover, to unravel its story in the great transfiguration of art?

Nothing in my leaf betrays any emotion, yet it exists as the mystery of all things. Next to it, the red rose cannot build the ideal work of the creative god, hence the causes of happiness or unhappiness, of harmony or intimate discord between the viewer and the object of the gaze. However, the appearance of the rose causes the representation of a phenomenon considered pleasant, called painting in the words, by means of fine movements of the artist which in his mind are precious stones, flowing waters, or whirlwinds.

I confess. My only bridge with art, with representations of nature through images, paintings, stories, dreams and emotions, before learning about this world as a life lived in another life, in another space and another time, was the novel "The Egyptian", written by Mika Waltari. If it were not for this book, also founded by the will of nature, with the acceptance of the higher spirits who always earn another life, other new lives, other bodies, other missions, mediating the understanding between the worlds, you probably would not have come to read my works.

Neither the leaves, nor the roses, nor the wind led me to its pages, but only that mystery of nature which lies hidden in the souls of the saints, foretells great confessions, and which makes an ordinary man, without standing out in any way, transform almost imperceptibly into a legendary En Soph invested with the power to write in the universal voice. I did not reach this book, nature gave it to me as inspiration when the heart of the right time beat for me, and I beat the impossible.

Transfiguration is, according to the dictionary, a process specific to the creative process by which the elements of external reality, filtered by the vision of the imagination and the power of expression of the artist, are transformed into a new reality. In this case, I have risen to the level of a creator who can give life to an otherness in a literary condition.

Leadership: Does the aesthetic of your creation broaden its horizon beyond the art world, to the sphere of a life detached as if from the imaginary reversibility of all the world's histories?

And this universal voice that taught me the language of nature, to cherish a leaf as much as a rose, to raise the wind like a paper kite, to turn everything around into something more than it is, in a spiritual context, superior and unadulterated, it has brought me even now, towards the reconsolidation of an affective memory, the precious words from the heart of a book, which someday, if not today, someone will open:

"All these books are written by me, Sinuhe, the Egyptian, just for me. Not for the gods, not for other people, not for my name to be kept for eternity. I wrote them only for my poor heart full of bitterness and sadness.

I keep these books carefully, and the wise Muti sewed for each book a durable palm-fiber cover. All these books will be put in a silver box, the silver box will be put in a hardwood box, the hardwood box in a copper box, as the books of the god Thoth were once guarded to be kept and were thrown into the Nile.

I don't know if Muti will be able to put the books in my grave without the guards seeing her, but this does not trouble me. Because I, Sinuhe, am only a man, I have lived in every man who lived before me and I will live in every man who will live after me."

So, between me and the little leaf, just as between me and the rose petal, as well as between me and the desert wind, a book full of lessons was interposed, written with a pen, with magic and openness, with the same sensitivity with which the leaf, taken by the wind, turned into a rose petal which, in turn, ignited the spark of inspiration in the emanation of a character (self) located in different evolutionary phases.

The purity of a vast creation can be acquired only by the subjectivity of the artist, sensitive and empathetic, who knows how to look beyond the history of art, beyond the space of a single body, to open the gates of a story world that never ends.

The Horizon Of A Gaze That Retains Its Expressiveness is open to the reading of an authentic creation, sometimes remembered by the destiny of a double personality: one that manifests itself through the written word and one that manifests itself through an eternal spirit.

I, Neculai Fântânaru, embrace the spiritual destiny of Sinuhe, the image of the union of the soul with the resurrected body of one who could see at will all the histories of the worlds, according to the script written by a hand of an artist who sees, feels, deepening again and again under the copper cloak of nature prone to take on the outline of a story with metaphorical interpretation.

Please, stay by my side throughout the boundlessness of time...

The Horizon Of A Winged Vision

On November 12, 2009

On June 26, 1963, the U.S. President John Fitzgerald Kennedy was visiting Berlin. A crowd of 120,000 Berliners gathered in front of the Schöneberg Rathaus (City Hall) to hear President Kennedy speech. They began gathering in the square long before he was due to arrive, and when he finally appeared on the podium they gave him an ovation of several minutes.

Kennedy started his speech by saying: "Freedom has many difficulties and democracy is not perfect, but we have never had to put a wall up to keep our people in." In an impassioned speech, the President told them West Berlin was a symbol of freedom in a world threatened by the Cold War. In the end, he uttered the following words, which got famous: "All free men, wherever they may live, are citizens of Berlin, and therefore, as a free man, I take pride in the words, 'Ich bin ein Berliner.'"

Kennedy was the man who made unforgettable the day of June 26th. His speech was punctuated throughout by cheers of approval. Expressing support for the people of the Western enclave in East Germany, he managed to shape their consciousness and generate those values that would help them maintain their motivations. Practically, Kennedy transmitted a new message, a call towards conditioning, towards freedom - thus towards the authentic spiritual growth, individual to each person apart.

Leadership: Do you strive to create a climate conducive to cultivating your vision by rhetorically appealing to the authority of that virtue of humanity manifested in the form of a deterministic relationship between "overwhelming" and "unforgettable"?

People will accept and follow you only if your philosophy is similar with theirs. It will be difficult to influence those whose beliefs and values are very different from yours. That is why is so important to direct people's beliefs concerning the need to change the mentality that would serve as a "purificatory" of positive energy – that would clarify their thoughts and fulfill their hopes. For this you must use in a positive way your power of persuasion.

Just as at digital cameras, the already registered images can be edited, so the people's mentality and the emotions, on which they support their existence and undertakings - can be easily "edited" if you manage to induce them certain emotions, if you manage to prove them, by giving the appropriate arguments that you are "one of them', that you are made from the same dough - that you have the same affinities, moral values and objectives. By addressing yourself to the spirit of the people, you will beautify their thinking; you will help them regain faith in their potential to recover, to heal themselves of any wounds caused by the past.

I want you to address the following questions:

1. Are you giving your best to create a favorable climate for cultivating your vision? (meaning a warm and positive climate, full of confidence, which is based on fundamental values that underpin your leadership?)

2. Is it the time to lean more carefully on the way, in which you can shape people? This thing means to use those qualities that transmit energy and a new breath of hope that would contribute to the renewal, at changing people's mentality. These qualities can ensure excellence to you, and they cannot be materialized without passion, knowledge, courage, and mastering the art of working with people.

3. How do you use your qualities in order to offer a new horizon to the people?

This question must point out the introspection process, by which you analyze your beliefs and traits that highlight these beliefs.

Leadership: Do you build your influence on an ideal that arouses people's desire to pursue a higher calling but goes beyond their choices in terms of their ability to identify with an ideal?

The role of a leader is very similar to that of the host. A host must be nice with all the guests who cross her threshold. She must inspire a comforting feeling, to be able to see something good in everyone, to perceive the essence of each guest and do not ever make comparisons; to intervene in the dialogue between two interlocutors where it is necessary, and sometimes to reconcile the divergent points of view.

The leader, in a similar way, must be able to perceive the potential of those that surrounds him, otherwise, he will fail to induce those constructive and positive emotions, with which to influence their attitude, to control their way of thinking and actions. The leader builds his influence on a single ideal: emotion, emotion, emotion at any cost. People need to see how much you love them before accepting your views and decisions. The emotions represent that ray of light that you have to perceive, is a way towards the inside of every being.

Where it is heading your leadership?

Before reading the rest of the sections of this seminar, whose purpose is the presentation and understanding the changes brought by the leadership, I have to ask you the following question: "Where do you want to be headed your leadership?"

If you find it difficult to glimpse the way that will follow your leadership development, it means that you have not yet created and structured a system of supporting all the people around you, it means that you lack determination in taking those decisions that influence their subsequent evolution, it means that you have not realized the importance of cooperation and mutual support. That is why, I want to mention that in order to raise your level of influence, and you must discern and customize the way towards yourself. Everything starts from you, this is what Kennedy has managed to highlight by his presence and by his surprisingly balanced and emotional speech.

Leadership: Is the most difficult decision you can make to follow the evolution of a vision that keeps pace with current realities, but does not justify your self-ambition to abandon yourself in the arms of a dream?

The leader must perceive himself and objectively judge his own beliefs before asking from others to follow and support him. In every leader endowed with the skill to understand the hidden motivations of the other people, there is that huge thirst of continuous search for their roots and their own values - for only their correct measurement, appreciation and respect for them – inspires his activities and decisions. In fact, must exist in him an immense desire for self-discovery, lest they disregard the great truths of the art of leadership.

Three basic pillars: values, integrity, attitude

For verifying the validity of your leadership, look objectively your good and weak points. The good points indicate the direction towards which you need to direct yourself when you relieve yourself of any conformism that significantly affects your morale, preventing you to see beyond what you are, and of what you can be. The bad points, highlight the negative assessment that people give to you, they are closely related to the inability of capturing the essence of leadership, which rely on those three pillars: values, integrity, attitude. For making the leap towards excellence, help people to overcome their weaknesses, to overcome all the barriers imposed by an unhealthy thinking and make in such a way that to get them closer to achieving their potential.

Have you created and structured a support system for the all around you? Do you objectively judge your own beliefs before asking from others to follow you?

Just as a mountain climber must be able to watch a mountain peak in order to see how to conquer it, so and you, for developing your leadership according to your expectations, first you need to revive the spirit of the people, that is looking forward for opening a new horizon before them, much wider, which would help them overcome the difficult times through which they have passed, to give them power and strength to go on.

Leadership: Could your transparency in providing a vibrant vision be the deciding factor in turning their intention to work with you into reality?

Is it the time of great confusion? The pursuit for glory, without expressing your leadership in an original way - by appealing more and more to emotions, it is like getting out the sun from the solar system. Basically, your entire leadership would turn into a big vacuum, in a big "incomprehensible". This is the time of great confusion; it is perhaps the drama of the leadership, or even the beginning of an "end". Are you orienting your leadership towards darkness – by raising the desire of glory above all else, or towards light – by using your emotions in order to serve people and for enlivening their existence? Are you, or not on the good way towards excellence?

Therefore, to cancel the appearance of any failure in terms of leadership, evaluate constantly your progress. Remove any confusion related to the limits beyond which you cannot pass.

How do you perceive your own being?

By the power of well-chosen words, you can influence the thinking and the mentality of those around you. However, the words also express your own level, of the mentality, education and of the values that you promote. Nevertheless, at the same time, the words reveal the horizon on which are placed your ideals, on which are profiling your values.

The horizon that you project, express and share to the other people is one of the pillars on which underlies the entire structure of your psyche, by opening or, conversely, closing your gate to the high standard of excellence, to which every leader wants to access. The horizon is influenced by your little corner of the world, where you are comparing with yourself and depending on the perception of your own being you share it with the others. Therefore, before making the change of others, ask yourself:

Depending on what qualities do you outline your horizon? How do you perceive your own being?

Leadership refers to the human urge to set aside a smaller ideal in order to pursue another ideal that is more important but more difficult to achieve.

The Horizon Of A Winged Vision is set by that man who constantly evaluates his progress and who manages to eliminate any confusion about his own limits. Such a man looks objectively at his strengths and weaknesses, and decides to focus on his ability to change the reality of others.

The Horizon Of An Advanced Mind

On February 09, 2016

Be the key to your searches, manifesting your tendency of making analogies between the truths of experience and the truths revealed by navigating in a variety of self-discoveries.

I manifested a boundless trust in something that conveyed a different view of things. The impulse of renewing my thinking could only be expanded by developing the capacity of knowing an unlimited horizon of references, comprising the world seen through the eyes of an artist who refuses to blindly obey conventional prejudices, in an attempt of connecting with the Creative Energy.

Here intertwined the most influential landmarks of the "Next Level" concept, extremely rich in artistic arguments by the fact that in everything I was trying to do I was confronted with more images illustrating a world full of personalized content, an openness to deeper exploration of the language of the soul, the mind, the human spirit. And the horizon, hidden from the world, I would open randomly like a window that doesn't exist and has no license for construction, but has a single code of activation specified: "Think Back". How different and wonderful everything looks !

The famous Italian writer, Umberto Eco, seemed to share the same desire to find the depth of things when he said: "The Great Science, remaining hidden to many, preserves its prestige and strength."

The experience of the life experienced by the writer through a higher self-discovery, in new and complex situations that we can conclude that it is the result of solid knowledge accumulation in various fields, finds its correspondent in the more in-depth research of the past that still hides many fragments or facets that are waiting to be discovered and capitalized.

So too, considering that there can be no art without works, no knowledge of progress, or a faith without God, I have given my consent to the rigor of exclusivity of filling anything with meaning, no matter how trivial it is, or to put together a theory of culture and interpretation from a few small things.

Leadership: Are you able to give a note of certainty to the events experienced at a given moment and to a certain intensity, as your understanding of Who You Really Are is more extended?

I obtained the activation code to understand things via an event in Alexander the Great's life. He was gifted several wonderful glass vessels, which were said to have faced the great events of time. He loved the gift immensely, especially for the history they hid. However, he broke the vessels. Why? Just because, he answered, because I'd hate to lose them. In time, they would all break anyone, one by one, and I would be sadder than I am now.

The horizon of all the knowledge that my whole life was connected to was born like from the desire of not being in trend with anything other than my twists of perspective, through the dynamism with which I constructed unlimited meanings, which another would not understand, but would suit them like a deaf man. I would get a result, however, expected only by the reasons that experienced the feeling of a history that can be guessed even when it gets lost.

The understanding of who I really was seemed more and more extended to the extent that things, facing the great events of time, could be considered miracles of existence. I had to provide a bit of radioactivity for my brain, which could have, at any time, given new meanings to the area called Art, difficult to access for many simple people. The art of seeing things through the lens of time, evolution, and the lessons we have to draw from the existential examples of the world's great rulers and artists.

Confessional as I am, I say everything now all the way. I prefer to test certain subjects approached through a certain amount of confusion, and the result can be seen on the screen of a different reality.

Leadership: Can you establish new priority directions of thinking in the context of a "Think Back" that makes the transition to a "Next Level"?

Establishing the development steps of the level of leadership, through the various stages of discovering new horizons of understanding things, consists of seeking the answers to the conclusion that you are the key to your searches for illumination. Everything becomes a sort of demonstration of the possibilities of defining certain directions of priority of thinking in the context of a "Think Back". You shine through what you learn from yourself on your own.

Think Back is how you reach yourself through a superior understanding of things you include in your life under the pretext of the need to belong to a time that has elapsed. You can give new meanings to an area difficult to access for many (the art of thinking through yourself) only if you manage to extract from yourself those lessons, that information and those points of view, referring to what you've done and what you were in relation to the world. After which you have to process them to build a special status: that of a man who doesn't remain trapped in a fragment that keeps repeating itself.

"Next Level" is your debut in a role in a feature length production whose dimensions depend on the need of projecting a new type of purpose in the world for yourself. But, at the same time, it depends on a new concept of being that is manifested through the tendency of making new analogies between the truths of experience and the truths revealed by navigating in a variety of self-discoveries.

The horizon is an image of what never climbs down from my true being in everyday existence, but rather gets colored in making a journey towards infinity, searching through the chaos of wandering travels in the search of a flicker of meaning. And, not finding one, I resort to various analogies with situations from a parallel world, with the works of other authors, with history long forgotten.

The lines of my horizon need not be altered by any obstacle, towards whose possession I tend with a zeal impossible to hold back, which, however, makes me wonder: "Will you be a giver or a taker?" I must be careful with what I fill this horizon, so others do not lose themselves permanently within it.

Leadership can have a personalized content for different time perspectives and approaches that fill it with things capable of giving your life a sense of belonging to a science that is "experienced" in order to be truly understood.

The Horizon Of An Advanced Mind opens up with the transformation of man in another stage of existence, through the very saps of inspiration offered by the analogy between his experience and the history he has behind him.

The Hour Of A Lost World

On March 01, 2017

Learn to capture the reality beyond your own reason, imposed by the verdict of an entity before human consciousness that supports the right to free will.

Mercedes burst into tears. Her woman heart broke in the face of the memories. Monte Cristo took her hand and kissed it respectfully. But she felt his kiss is cold, like kissing the marble hand of the statue of a saint.

- There exist predestined lives, whose future can be crushed by one mistake, she continues. I thought you were dead and would I should have died too, for what use did it have for me to forever mourn you? Only to turn a thirty-nine-year-old woman into a fifty-year-old one, and that's all. I have denied my love, and as all deniers, I bring misfortune to all those around me.

- No, Mercedes – said Monte Cristo – no ! You have to think more highly of yourself. You are a noble and holy woman and you have disarmed me with your suffering. But behind me, unseen, unknown, angry, is God. I was but his envoy, he used me as a weapon to draw evil out and did not want to stop the lightning I had cast. I take God as my witness, at whose feet I prostrate every day for ten years now, I take Him as a witness that I have sacrificed my life and with it I have also sacrificed all the plans we had.

I say this to you with pride, Mercedes, that God needed me, and I have lived. Search the past, search the present, try to guess the future and see if I am a tool, a work of an invisible intelligence. Pray to the Lord, who holds people's lives in His hands, to remove the death around me. For as the surrounding reality serves the great poets as a model of ideal creations, so too does the full force of His wrath serve a higher purpose than myself, taller than some life lessons that can better cope with the real course of the world.

The clock strikes the hour of a lost world of everything that was our great love. And even if our fate was decided forever, for us to separate, do not forget that He wants you to understand and to discuss His power. This is why He has given us free will. *****

Leadership: Do you highlight your purpose of life within the composition of the ensemble of reality whose significance is found by observing a series of facts and distinct happenings that demonstrate your compliance with the requirements of an unseen order?

By summarizing all the above, said by writer Alexandre Dumas, we understand that the mind and soul are the tools of an unseen intelligence, always constant in what it imposes, that in addition, is superior to that force that we ourselves are and the one that often tends to get twisted in a direction contrary to our internal structure. And the human soul, perceived as a tool of an invisible order, being much more important than a mind in accordance with the truths of life, can be imposed as the existence of a higher force that changes the direction of destiny to another personality, to other social circumstances.

In other words, we are led, without our will, through a series of physical, emotional and spiritual processes, as in the play of light of a fantastic mirage, towards the path of the art of living through self-giving and sacrifice painted on the canvas of a work which suggestively shows the theme or content of a "judicial" decree beyond our understanding.

Solidarity with this form of leadership, superior to the knowledge I acquired through a flash of feelings, through a living and active faith, through a virtuous life and the fulfillment of what ought to be followed, is a cause of the expansion of our consciousness to where we can discover increasingly more about how the world is shaped. To the point where the tendency to judge things is canceled, in which the implication into a cause to our liking can throw us.

The possibility of making up a leading force, superior and stable, is based on the proper positioning of a comprehensive vision, of an image of impact and of a life content, in the sense of a transformation affecting the source of all human actions from what causes a certain experience to what causes a certain consequence.

Leadership: Can the example of guiding your destiny intervene in the interpretation of a "Superior Force" that is required in the context of the expansion of your consciousness to the point where you can discover more and more about how an entire world is shaped?

The true value of high quality leadership, by participating in the formation of a whole system of representing a reality seen through a state of the soul, is a reminder of the point where the affirmation of the human will to "set the world straight" and play an important role in shaping it becomes the condition of making a higher order.

In order to achieve the unity between the essential fundamental of the world and carrying out an absolute superiority, one has to highlight his purpose in the composition of the ensemble of a reality whose significance is revealed by the parallel observation of a series of facts and distinct happenings that demonstrate his compliance with the requirements of an unseen order.

An order which, first of all, ask for an act of faith from man, an act of trust in a reality that exceeds the powers of reason, beyond the limits imposed by life experience.

The fulfillment of a man's destiny is required to be accomplished by the truthfulness of a world influenced by a superior force whose victory, which establishes balance in everything and everything, is given (in an unseen order) by the observance of an imperative law: "You reap what you sow."

May God help you, based on your soul !

The Hour of a Lost World is when you recognize yourself as being weak in the face of an infinite universal intelligence built into the living of life, of which you have only explored a small part in a bizarre chain of coincidences. Highlight that reality above your reason, imposed by the verdict of an entity before human consciousness that supports your right to free will only by influencing your life content and the supposed priorities of it.

The Hour Of The Last Sin

On August 23, 2011

Open your own way to performance and success, without disconnecting your protective field against negative influences.

John Milton. Aware that his law firm „Milton, Chadwick Waters" could not develop if they will not develop the leaders within it, decided to find a "successor". And, the most appropriate, the most able to take a position so high in this top company was Kevin Lomax - a very ambitious young man.

Milton instructs Kevin, teaches him all the ins and outs of the lawyer's profession, by helping understand the necessary changes that he needs to do in order to achieve the expected high performance.

In spite of that, Kevin in the new ring that he was spinning, no longer felt safe. Although he seemed to move more and more from the professional point of view, emotionally, he fell increasingly. He has disjoined of his conscience, of those solid principles which fall within the perceptions about him and people around him, about life and reality.

A change has produced within him. Nobody could comprehend his tenseness that almost exhausted and separated him from the old beliefs and attitudes. He fought with an unseen force, and did not want to give up. For, he expected more from himself.

Can you remember the movie "The Devil's Advocate (1997)"? Kevin refused to get inside „the devil" and decided to follow the call of the heart, to return to his true values and beliefs. He did not want to have on with all the dirty and devilish things. That meant his release from his own incarceration.

Leadership: Do you fulfill the attributions of fully depicting the dependence between the discontinuity that characterizes the phenomenon of expansion of the inclination towards diligence and the intensity of the phenomenon called "spiritual transfiguration"?

A diligence worthy of a good cause passed through the filter of adhering to the most realistic version of the role you are forced to deploy in the closed space of the necessity of affirming yourself. How? By appealing to the facts which fall within the criteria of good and evil, building only what can endure, creating only for pleasure, the pleasure of going beyond self-imposed borders.

The need to assert yourself is often a confined space because it is carried out only under outside supervision, within the terms of giving the guarantee of performance in an account meant for someone else.

Everything is permissible for the good ones, less the sin. Sin is the act that alienates you from your own clear conscience, that conscience fighting for something noble, which is based on truth and honesty that feels, thinks and defend yourself in whatever you do. If you do not listen to your inner voice, you will never find peace of heart, you will sink into the sin to change yourself to the will of others.

The phenomenon of spiritual transfiguration is applied in the case of overcoming yourself, when you give up on conforming to rules that do not characterize you, imposed by a rigid authority in what regards your efforts of building the foundations of a fulfilled life.

Thinking and sensitivity to what's happening to you must always be in a waking state. They are called upon to embody THE NEW MAN as perfectly as possible only if they are adapted to a new concept of your role in the world – which forces you to always be more evolved than others in terms of the costs you are willing to endure in the case of a loss of faith.

Leadership: Do you practice a philosophy based on gaining spiritual power by denying a state of fact expressed through an interrogation that expresses a sense of helplessness: "Are you witnessing the suicide of your own patient"?

If you do not start from the consideration that your moral and spiritual health is the most important pawn in the prevention and controlling the landslides to the bleak zone of leadership that someone may attract you, it means that you are a nature that cannot impose itself, a being that is easy to separate from the values that he had built his life, from the values which opened his own way to performance and success.

Your inner structure is the one that makes the difference between "light and darkness" between sin and virtue. Your self is like a patient of whom you need to take good care, but that first of all you must understand and accept him as a friend. Then, you must maintain your stability, and prevent him from slipping into that infectious disease, which is called "negative influence" which is transmitted mainly by the emotional and rational way, which is contrary to ethics and morals but, which brings prosperity for the present.

To obey a negative influence is to be witness to your own patient's suicide – your self. If your inner potential is "infected" of the excess of negative influence of others, you will destabilize your values that guide your path in life. In leadership, all it increases and diminishes depending on your tolerance to the influence of others.

Deliverance from the bondage of sin resembles the deliverance from the willful imprisonment in which you have been cast almost despairingly: first, you choose an inevitable destiny living the experience of noncompliance, then you find your point in the world anticipating the need for a change of heart.

The hour of the last sin designates the moment when you decided to get away from your true values and beliefs, when you stubbornly deny your essence and transform yourself into someone else, at the urging and insistence of others. The biggest sin you can do as a future leader, is to accept deliberately those negative influences by those who put themselves in the service of petty and obscure purposes.

Just as the blood, that although you do not feel it, is all for you, because of it you can live and breathe - so your inner essence, even if you do not feel it, is all for you, because of it you can increase or diminish your protecting field against negative influences.

Conclusion: There will always be people who are not driven by the best intentions, people who want to obtain only material benefits regardless of the paths followed. They use all means to attract by their side the ones weak in character, whose beliefs are not fixed, namely those who have not activated their "protective field".

Create a field that protects you against negative influences which you will not disable at any price, even if around you are acting people driven by the apparent good intentions. Remember that hell is also paved with good intentions...

The Human Side Of Leadership

On November 20, 2018

Restrain your feeling of deep sorrow that you feel before consciousness, do not allow yourself to be led by it !

My name is Cella Serghi. I will have to talk about myself, with the detachment given to me by years that have passed since then. It is now said that I was disturbingly beautiful. I think it is an exaggeration. I never thought I was beautiful. And precisely because I was insecure about my physique, dissatisfied, I was so chic, I was preoccupied to be liked. And I managed, because I was alive, anxious, vibrating like a leaf to the lightest breeze, permeable to all that life is.

Preoccupied to be liked, desiring a great reciprocated love, but life had denied me just what I was looking for. I had the anxiety of Cinderella when she lost her shoe. Maybe I was looking for my magic shoe, maybe for my childhood, maybe for myself, maybe a different fate than that which is usually accepted by women. Maybe I resembled no one, because it seemed to me that I always had to start over from the beginning and everything had to start with me.

I do not know how I understood, or felt, that only by doing something unusual, I would be myself. But I was looking, I was looking for myself... It was a search that kept me in a constant state of wake, in an anxiety that I was conveying, as if I was stopping and wondering where to go and everyone felt they could be a possible guide and approached me. But I, as in the game where someone guides you to find the hidden object, saying only "cold", "hot", "warm", "hot" (as you get close or stray away), I was looking for the "fire".

Leadership: Can you crush the gear of time without an apparent essence in which you have become just a simple wheel, always having a certain perspective upon yourself: you yourself within a world that denies and asserts itself both at the same time?

Do you have the courage to fight against that factor that stifles you in a state of denial of small and great joys? Do you feel abandoned in a world full of unrealistic expectations or too high in relation to your chances of satisfying them? Are you filled with poor and gloomy feelings that fully dominate you? What is the nature of the links that are established between your defining elements? Do you abandon the most precious values, everything you think is the reason for new choices? What is the only component in the system that defines you as a human, which can react in a unit of time, on a particular path?

Great American tycoon Warren Edward Buffett said: "The price is what you pay. Value is what you get." These words contain a wealth of meanings, but also a meaning that covers the whole essence of our existence.

A world that denies and affirms itself both at the same time is an encyclopedia of vanity that blurs the existence of all who live in the realm of a story that is hard to accept, one you will probably never meet again, but will find it many times in memories. Remember that in one of your dreams, in which you have founded a new world with a symbolic role of chasing out any regrets and pains, a character you have not immediately recognized, but has marked you by the fact that you have realized you have destroyed the possibilities of becoming a definitive substitute for reality.

And a time without apparent essence is an interruption of a life full of ideals. At one point, in your dream, where you have established a true kingdom of glory, a measureless glimmer, you have come upon an old man who has been burdened for years trying to pass of as a teenager. This old man seemed to have assumed for many years the role of welcoming strangers, being sadder as he so desperately wanted to be noticed.

The feeling you experience in the silence of a retrospect look at life can be a proof of the virtue of believing in yourself, or a consequence of the tendency to resign yourself. Living the complex illusion of a frequently encountered reality that surrounds you and keeps you in a state of uncertainty, bumping into the un-probable abyss of despair, ignoring the essence of life and the primordial purpose of the ego (to increase the perception of personal value).

This is usually the price you pay fully, the consequence of establishing relationships with other individuals, of another case, which did not have the content corresponding to your own aspirations.

A man endowed with the virtue of self-esteem overcomes his inability to react to any kind of disappointment through the exercise of confronting the image of a world that is revealed only under certain conditions of observation of life lessons that motivate him to better understand the path to follow.

Personal value, which often results in a total inconsistency between the asking price and the cost (what you want to get from life and what you are willing to pay to obtain it) is reflected in other indicators, in the level of professional performance you register – relative to your level of involvement in your personal life. This value reaches the zero threshold if the ratio is not continuity, but rupture.

The most experienced people do not find their brilliance where the sun shines, but where the dark nights reign, when the stars are lit and the stars in the sky are admired – they point the way to true self-understanding.

Like Cella Serghi, the people endowed with the virtue of completing themselves after a difficult attempt put the essence of their existence at the forefront. If you do not want to fall into despair and get stuck in a denial of reality, if you do not want to turn into an idle robot, if you do not want to fall into a compromising and lamentable extreme, if you do not want to be tormented by the tendency to become locked inside yourself, then strive to crush the gear of time without apparent essence in which you have become just a simple wheel.

Strive to remove, to free yourself, to prevent those circumstances in which the shortcomings, the aspirations show their true face. Break the bonds that keep you in captivity, which could definitively disqualify you from the race to the great prize: fullness. The most important lesson of life you have to learn from yourself is the following: "seek to understand your personal needs without deepening in the anxiousness of Cinderella who lost her shoe."

Leadership: Do you allocate time for your personal development in a one-on-one relationship of the inner world and the struggle with the outside world, without assuming the privilege of living in a space that shelters only the past of an illusion?

The importance of the path you are pursuing towards excellence, with all its add-ons, such as the ability to self-identify or identify with something that captivates and makes you special, is closely related to the relationships you establish with other people, especially professionally.

The importance of these relationships is not negligible in the slightest, because they determine the experiences you are going through. Inner conflicts are a loophole of insecurity, the most sensitive part of your entire process of functioning and existence.

A space that shelters only the past of an illusion can be an attraction that limits your personal freedoms or fidelity to a belief that is no longer of use to you. The situation in which you are a prisoner, actively, as a personal insecurity factor, accelerates your expansion to the limit, finding its outcome in the great wave of change. It all depends on your perception of what life means, on what the assimilation of a way of being means, solid and healthy.

The one-on-one relationship between the inner world and the struggle with the outside world is given by the simultaneous command of your "frequencies of agreement", that is, the way in which you structure your meaning of life in relations with other people. These pulse-like frequencies that put you in touch with yourself, are sending warning messages about any changes or personality changes resulting because of others.

Do you sustain a professional change that affects your personal life? What are the pros and cons that the agreement frequencies command you to heed?

Leadership is the opening to a spiritual plenary life that begins with: "I will have to talk about myself with the detachment given to me by the years that have passed since" and continue with the search for an ideal of essentialization of the present moment of life, meant to keep you in a constant state of wakefulness to the changing flow of the world.

The Human Side Of Leadership captures the expectations of a world that is hitting the nostalgia of a spiritual or emotional resignation, deaf and revolted at the same time because of some purposes of life that will never be the same again.

The primordial condition of the man concerned with the Ego and his reputation is not to accept defeat by the limits of one's own power or perspective, but to endure the exaggeration with which it follows the tendency to isolate itself from everything.

The Humble Performer Of His Difficult Mission

On October 31, 2013

Keep your leadership under control, accentuating the inner state, as well as the difference of the facts you unfold.

Up on a pile of hope the tormented soul of an innocent being watches, it looks as if it broke out from the world where dreams can easily come true. He is terrified by every twitch in his fibers, by every unfiltered thought that goes through the lenses of determination, which change their properties and become smokey as the request for "a life insurance" drops.

Catherine is the prisoner of Buffalo Bill, thrown into a dark and terrible dungeon, underground. Because in the very deep hole, in the furnace of fears that decreases the temperature of human possibilities to feel themselves, there is no expiration date for wishes and passions. In tense situations, thoughts don't respect the transparency standards of the being whose value system is turned upside down.

Catherine Martin looks in a fixed point, maybe the point of revelation that she had become almost unaccustomed with. Is she looking for a mirror in search of her own image? What should she see? What should she feel when she sees the human remains? The morbid visions, striking as a strong shock felt all the way to the bone, take over her liveliness. But they don't blow away the breathe that God put in her warrior soul.

Matter vibrates in the hands of the Creator. In a second of lucidity, as if produced by divine providence, Catherine goes from one extreme to the other. Suddenly, a succession of emotions warmly intertwine with the dearest memories, giving birth to a multitude of new beauties and glitters. Hope replaces disappointment. The man reborn out of pain, out of immense divine love, the man invested with new reforming strengths can't ask his court of judges to admit the resignation of that Myself recharged with new spiritual gifts.

Leadership: Can you develop an attitude and acceptance of what is happening, under the belief that all you live and experience requires validation by trying to know yourself better in a different way?

The harmonious structure resulting from this interior firmness in the battle for faith goes into a high-power cycle. Like an energy wave, the Ego intensely propagates new norms and apirations, new control points in the way captive's way of "being". The reactions to reduce toxic agents, such as fear, uncertainty, restlessness, lament, frustration, depression, are coupled with establishing new free radicals. And annihilated by new combat formations. The interior energy, which triggers new feelings and attitudes is activated in stages, avoiding the turbulences that its sudden release might produce.

There is no place for a free man together with a tyrannical attitude. In herself, Catherine, subject to the strongest emotions, has taken a decision. A capital one. But the release requires abolishing darkness, requires an effort just as huge as the rehabilitation process. She has to stand up to the most profound negative moods of her being and fight against them.

The heart doesn't accept to be silenced and to be attributed the inanimate harshness of a stone. But shouts with all its strength, with all the energy of the unpredictable illumination entailed in such circumstance. Waking up all the fibers that take part in the confrontation between present and future, between to ways of measuring life that are in full opposition.

"I will bear everything, I will walk down that immense hallway of questions without answer, that underground hallway of anxiety. Until I will be victorious ! "

And, with the extreme fervor produced by this thought, with that decision that could facilitate any upgrade of the interior configuration, Catherine decisively strikes in the weakness of the opposing fate that almost never accepts deviations from the rule. She begins to get to know herself better in a different way, in a state of utmost challenge, when she must definitively close the boundary of his "mother's child" and stand alone in battle, at the level of a Papillon who chooses to escape from a hopeless place.

Leadership: Do you respect the personal space through which you relate to yourself more than to the outside, with the cost of experiencing the situation where, as much as you try to fight, you can't say that you have outdone yourself?

What limits man to being strictly a passive entity, unable to oppose an external authority and which has the merit of being investigated as connected to leadership, is precisely that side of his personality, of other tens of sides. In which the supreme "I" begs for forgiveness. Especially when this authority, similarly to an aggressor who disturbs the individual's safety can't be silenced, can be brought to zero. Or at least to an acceptable controllable value.

To prove true strength and resolution when faced with your opponent, who keeps advancing, becomes the basis of sustainable development of your entire being. The basis for creating any vision of the world in the attempt to be aware of and to beautify life experience.

Catherine tries to cope with the circumstances of her destiny, she tries to prevent Buffalo Bill's plans from happening, puts her intelligence and cunning on the table, but she still does not seem to be able to outdo herself. She fails. Why?

Because she cannot give up the state of weakness of her nature, because she cannot get the recognition of others, because courage is nothing without power, because having something means nothing without luck, because looking in a mirror is meaningless if you do not see yourself as someone else, because your skills are for naught if you lack perspective, because you having a good message is worthless if you cannot package it right, because having a higher education is useless if you lack street smarts.

Leadership: Do you use your consciousness as a shield in interacting with the outside world, conforming to a situation that consumes you a lot or trying to make possible that thing you believe you cannot do?

The poet and Lebanese philosopher Kahlil Gibran mentioned a very wise aspect: "In order to get through the trials of life, we must respect that personal space through which we relate with ourselves and not with others." It is a progressive formula which can't be abandoned so easily, a way of expressing the agreement with the attitude that individualizes you in the ambiguous situations when weakness meets power.

In a game of chess, the opposition is the situation when two kings face each other on a rank or file, with only one square in-between them. In the case of leadership, the opposition is a situation when you are face to face with yourself with only a minimum or maximum accepted distance from your evolution potential. And from the potential of breaking ties with the rhythms of life that take control over you.

Ensuring a maximum efficiency of your own being in order to be fully prepared to take on the interior battle with your system of values, intensely developing those norms and aspirations, new control points in the way of "being", becomes absolutely necessary. Only in this way can a new perspective be drawn on one's own person and on others.

You will never be able to leave "the opposition" if you are at a disadvantage because of a complex of inadaptation to the "shocks" that life produces so often. And leadership will not be able to benefit from the advantage of being close to the wide area of future development. So arm yourself with that determination that could facilitate any upgrade of the interior configuration and strike in the weakness of the opposing fate that almost never accepts deviations from the rule.

Consciousness is the point where you feel self-satisfied and strong in the face of a difficult attempt, although you are sorry that this has happened to you.

The Humble Performer Of His Difficult Mission is the man who understood its mission and does everything he can in order to fulfill it. This implies a permanent interior battle against those negative demobilizing interior reactions.

The Husafell Stone

On March 06, 2009

Strive to grow in yourself, then lay stress on your talent to ensure your leadership a broader and more solid foundation.

Abraham Lincoln (1809-1865) was the sixteenth President of the United States. Although he takes the credit for the abolition of slavery, Lincoln led the bloodiest war in American history not to correct a historical injustice, but to support a historical principle, that of unity of a nation.

But what rarely anyone mentions are the steps that Lincoln had to climb in order to create his fame – his own startling story that travelled round the world. He came from a modest family. He was born in a little wooden cottage. But being self-taught, he perfected his knowledge and developed his personality. After becoming a lawyer, he chose the path of politics, entering as a member of the Whig party in the legislative room of Illinois (1834-1841), then in the Congress (1847-1849), where he also proposed a law conditioning the gradual and compensated emancipation of the slaves.

Finally, he joined the new Republican Party, acquiring national fame, after the election race in 1858 for occupying the position of Senator, when he discussed the issue of slavery against the candidate from the Democratic Party, Stephen A. Douglas.

Leadership: Would it be better to express your intention to analyze an experimental discovery – relational with the increased possibility of rooting on the formation of the concept such as: "being aware of one's own value"?

The Husafell Stone is one of the most ancient demonstrations of strength, speed and resistance, in which athletes must carry a trapezoidal stone on their chest (weighting between 150 kg – 180 kg), the assessment being made on two criteria:

- the speed which the stone is carried with on a certain distance in the shortest time possible.

- the resistance with which the athlete must carry the stone until he drops it, measuring the distance covered.

If I were to measure the time that Lincoln invested in himself, the time he invested in his research to be able to rise from anonymity, to emphasize his leadership (with boldness and perseverance) and to become a defender of human rights and freedoms, I would say it's a combination between the two heats: speed and strength, amid a tense context.

Lincoln's ascent to the bold destination that he established in his mind since he was a child ("One day, I will become president ! ") and which made him memorable was due to his personal interest, based on personal beliefs. That uphill – that all great men must overcome, is like a stone that very few can lift. Its weight pushes on the shoulders of every aspirant to a successful career, but only the truly powerful – morally and spiritually, have the chance to qualify to the finals for the title of leader. In leadership, the Husafell Stone is the test that you give before your own belief, that either you pass it or lose it, and the results of which should leave no room for interpretation.

Being aware of one's own value has as its main support the resistance you show in a situation where the causality of your own will (never conceived otherwise than under the idea of freedom) is elevated to the rank of absolute, meaning it cannot deviate from the commitments you undertook on your own behalf.

Before you decide to change something in the lives of others, set a goal and a clear vision of exactly what you want and achieve it without hesitation, mistakes and constraints of any nature. But be sure that something will oppose your plans: the ascent that you have to pass and which will change the course of things, if you are not tough enough, persistent and open-minded. And if you don't have a high resistance in a subconscious level which doesn't block your own development and transformation that you desire, you risk getting away from you goal and even crack.

Your resistance breaks little by little? You should focus on the great task that you have in front of you, which you alone have set for yourself, and become more devoted to the cause which you have shown your ultimate dedication to. Strive to grow in yourself, taking a firm stand in supporting your own aspirations, completing your mission, then lay stress on your talent to ensure your leadership a broader and more solid foundation.

Just as a painter must know how to use colors to render the space and perspective, how to combine them to render the final image, how to choose them to create a particular state – so and you, must know how to use your own potential in order to be all that you can be, how to combine your skills to cultivate and value them, how to bring out from your own inner riches the skills to achieve the best performance.

Leadership denotes a permanently self-conscious attitude that is seen only in the most unexpected life experiences you have wisely overcome, without falling into the impasse of not being able to make a decision to move to a higher level of personal power.

Do not fall into the trap of judging your own ideas, because you have no way of knowing if they are either good or bad.

Husafell's Stone is the test of your life to measure your desire and ability to achieve your goals (without which your personality could not dominate others). It is precisely by virtue of this that the importance given to dreams and the time you invest in yourself is placed so that, one day, you will reach the place where destiny awaits you.

Conclusion: Develop the qualities and skills to strengthen your position in front of people and to give you dominance over them, by your vision supported by convincing arguments, by proving the ways to follow, by properly assessing the consequences and by proving the advantages and even the disadvantages, those being the important accents in leadership. They are supported by those qualities developed over time through continuous training of thought, through knowledge achieved, through continuously practiced tenacity and through resistance to the effort of fighting every "parasitic" intervention, which aims to push you away from your intended purpose.

The Idea Of Composition

On February 27, 2016

Cast a light on the process of creation, developing a greater ability of perceiving truths manifested in day to day life.

This idea of the composition in terms of time was older, we know it. It was however fertilized and reanimated a few months back through lectures of the readings of English writer J.B. Priestley that gave birth to thoughts about composition in time. First Priestley's lecture – the charm of the fine mobility of his fantasy, and then, obsessively turns within my brain a verse from "Macbeth."

The connection of times has opened, associations from current life, of course, from the funds of emotional reserves accumulate and unfulfilled in Mexico, and then, those seen here, in Uzbekistan… Thus, is born the idea of composition of the film "Fergana Canal". Of course – we repeat it – the process is much more complicated, more nuanced, the associations much more numerous and referring to the entire cultural and emotional reserve. However, the detection of even a few of them casts a light on the process of creation.

These elements are obviously not crucial, but they do however have the role of stimuli. Even Eisenstein says it about Priestley's plays, of which he had recently read and meditated upon:

*"They are interesting here, because they have probably helped with the clearing of the field around the theme of time in the exact moment I encountered the problem of time in the script about the Fergana Channel. For too long have these things been thought of and spread, he confesses elsewhere, that under Priestley's influence they could not burst. And if we look at Priestley's case as an example, he will clear it all up for us, through multiplication and from here, generalization, yet another hidden fold of the problem we pursue."***

Leadership: Can you develop a point of view on a contemporary topic by discovering the compositional solutions of a key factor coming from the sphere of direct and immediate personal experience?

An unlimited personal resource of the artist is his very own fund of managing those noticed along a winding line, according to the research through which the learning of work techniques, life lessons, new methods of using knowledge takes place, in an attempt to capture the essential beyond the limit of the visible.

Leadership impresses through the charm of the fine mobility of fantasy of the artist. The creative man participates in the process of giving reality from those seen and felt that give exhortation to the mind towards the seeing of things unseen.

Through the assimilating of information and a constructive approach to learning, in whose menus we find genuine "germs" for obtaining an aesthetic of production and representation, is always reflected a new theme to be addressed, a film script, which leads to a different level of experience.

Unseen things usually play out in a restricted environment, but sometimes they can be met with the soul and mind in various journeys in the world, through contact with great men. Wherever you are, wherever you find yourself, wherever you feel connected to important events, where "clues" can always be found, elements at times decisive with the role of stimuli, that lead to multiplication and from here to the generalization of results and notions springing from a broad inductive base (by following the passing from effects to causes.)

The key factors of transformations that lead to the discovery of compositional solutions to certain experiences previously processed in themes and scenarios are findings, associations, and comparisons with current life that establish the format of original ideas and lessons. They can be represented by the constant "Time", sometimes taking the form of a mental picture, sometimes revealing a hidden cut of a problem, etc.

The aesthetics of the representation of a new vision from the sphere of direct and immediate personal experience, in contrast to the unknown of long journeys through the universe of non-material creation, refers to the originality of improvisation with which you encounter a thinking whose wealth can be embraced in an original concept depicted in a work art.

The Idea Of Composition belongs to the man who knows to always trust "a new beginning", having within his administration the rich cultural and emotional reserve collected over time. Be mindful of how you relate to those seen in the places you pass through, but especially to those unseen, knowing that what is lost usually contains a great part of a truth that can propose a new perspective on the relationship between the power of creation and knowledge.

The Idea Of The Intellectual Film

On March 5, 2011

The editing process and reflection on the "intellectual film" can redefine the traditional boundaries of cinema, providing a platform for deep philosophical ideas.

Although the film enjoyed success abroad - in Germany, for example, it was selected as the best film of 1928 - "October" did not have the resonance that "Potemkin" had known anywhere. However, "October" and, later, Eisenstein's theoretical studies on film, exported the idea of "intellectual film" to the whole world, causing a wide and resounding echo everywhere.

Still while working on "October" - during the editing period - Eisenstein thinks further. If the intellectual film is possible, then even the system of notions in Marx's "Capital" can be transposed to the screen. This would have been a film about the method of dialectics, which was supposed to develop - as a cinematic language - what existed embryonically in "October".

In this direction Eisenstein believed that the theme of the cinema of the future lies: in the philosophical region. But before he could start this film, he thought a year or a year and a half of preparation was necessary. In this direction the land was totally virgin, a tabula rasa. He saw the urgent need for a lengthy preliminary investigation, in order not to risk compromising a theme of such importance. Eisenstein perceived this work as the "Magnitogorsk of cinema" - a thorough construction that would have laid the foundations of a new kind of cinematic language.

Leadership: To what extent can your creation open new perspectives on translating complex theoretical ideas into an engaging visual format?

The process of cinematic exploration of intellectual film requires rigorous methodology and extensive training. Before translating the dialectical system of "Capital" to the screen, the virgin terrain of this theme had to be studied through complex philosophical investigations. Each layer of cinematic language can hide significant structures that must be methodically developed to avoid compromising the potential of such a theme.

Exploring these uncharted territories of filmic expression requires constant adaptation of research methods, evoking echoes throughout the world of cinema. However, like a geologist painstakingly preparing his exploration of unknown territory, Eisenstein plans this intellectual work as a systematic mapping of a new artistic continent.

Although "October" did not have the same impact as "Potemkin", Eisenstein's film and theoretical studies exported the idea of "intellectual film", which opened up new artistic directions. During the editing of "October", Eisenstein began to contemplate new possibilities, believing that if the intellectual film was feasible, then even the complex concepts of Marx's "Capital" could be translated to the screen.

For Eisenstein, this project represented a scientific exploration of virgin cinematic terrain, a true "tabula rasa". As a pioneering researcher, he considered essential a prior period of rigorous investigation, necessary to construct an innovative cinematic language. The "Magnitogorsk of Cinema" symbolized Eisenstein's large-scale effort to create a platform for philosophical and dialectical ideas, thus laying the groundwork for future thematics in the "philosophical region" of cinema.

Intellectual creation involves the opening of new artistic directions, manifested in relation to the effort to transform the visual language into a vehicle for the exploration of abstract ideas.

The idea of "intellectual film" was born from the desire to translate abstract concepts into powerful cinematic images, according to Eisenstein's vision of the artistic potential of montage. This entails a "synthesis between symbol and idea", turning film into a vehicle for philosophical thought, using visual and emotional associations. Through this approach, cinematic language can become profound and innovative, redefining the limits of artistic expression.

The Ideal Candidate For Leadership

On February 23, 2013

Your propensity for leadership is determined by the attitude of a protector and mentor you manifest towards others.

In support of this statement, which I have very often expressed in both my books and my articles on leadership, with a very serious conviction and firmness, there is a particularly interesting happening in Pretty Woman, which I find as one of the most conclusive leadership lessons.

The end of the film is a full of lessons, a reflection of a general view, I believe. Having spent a full week with the controversial businessman Edward Lewis, and having, thanks to him, had penetrated the most exclusive salons of the high society, prostitute Vivian Ward, conquered by the paradise of the new world she had penetrated, decided to change her life – to continue her studies and to build a career.

Vivian is talking to her friend, Kit De Luca, who also was a prostitute, hoping she could persuade her to abandon that "job" without a future, and go with her to San Francisco to find a real job and change their lifestyle, that is, their way of thinking and attitude. But Kit is not open to change, not everyone embraces the chance of improving life.

Vivian fails to convince her, because Kit's convictions were well-rooted and cemented, so unshakeable. However, the fact that she has tried to change her convictions is a proof of great appreciation, respect, and profound sensitivity to her problems and shortcomings. And at the same time, she shows indisputable proof of her enviable inner beauty, for which her very own kind and loving soul stands witness.

Leadership: Are you in the midst of the experience of being unbeatable in the face of a demonstration of attitude that begins with a reflection on an independent desire for others and continues with the predestination of leaving something behind?

Paraphrasing the great Romanian writer Octavian Goga, I say that the leader is the man who filters the sufferings and problems of people through his soul, then turns them into an alarm sound.

Leadership is the alarm signal that reminds people of the need for change, it is the alarm signal with which you try to prepare others for the risks posed by an unhealthy mentality. Vivian left behind the proof that any woman can look like a princess, that every man has a lucky star that guides their steps in life, and this star (as a victory of light over darkness, of good over evil) is represented by the perfect moment of allowing a new horizon to manifest in its existence.

As a leader, you have to focus on the minds and feelings of people, seeking to defend, even under tremendous conditions, their dignity, freedom and happiness, proposing everything they can sustain in their personal and career life, urging them to action, and acting tenaciously and responsibly to promote their interests.

It is a terrible illusion to think that leadership is reduced only to occupy an important position. It means to despise your mission, efficiency and possibilities. For a high-class leadership is distinguished, first and foremost, by the high spirituality you show. In turn, spirituality is a form of giving yourself up to a great cause when you abandon yourself to a person other than yourself because of the way you distance yourself from an unfortunate life context meant to solicit your limits.

Trying to be useful first and foremost, struggling to fulfill people's dreams, imposing yourself through that inner nobility that manifests itself through the ability to truly look interested in their values, their hopes, their future, you will undoubtedly become a pathfinder.

Leadership: How important is how you react to what's happening to you as you are compelled to go on the same line in terms of profitability?

Kit turned away from Vivian's path because she was thinking about everything in terms of profitability, but especially because she did not know how to react to what life throws in her way in an unexpected manner. She appreciates her life on the basis of passing things, without crystallizing her preferences as a reflection of an ideal world, thus betting on a certain amount of indifference to the great hopes, to the norms imposed by society in order to be able to devote herself to inner development.

On the other hand, Vivian is an escalation of confrontation with her own limits, the miracle by which all the reproaches of a consciousness that strives to reason before fantasy are replaced. Vivian is not a change of perspective of one's own life, she is not the result of a world of perfection and spiritual purity, but rather she represents the predestination to leave something behind, a lesson of life that we best find in the novel "The Name of the Rose" by the writer "Umberto Eco":

"I have to confess the misfortune of a world that wrinkles. Young people do not want to learn anything, science is in decline, the world is walking on its head, some blind people are leading other blind people and making them crash in the abyss. I learned from my master the desire to learn and the understanding of the true path, which is preserved even when the path is twisted."

There is a certain rigor in the outer appearance of Vivian's life, because she does not see in the world the active manifestation of a fundamental, temporary and irreversible need, she does not recommended herself as an ally of a reality that has lost every trace of life, but manages to give an interpretation of the events that happen to her, which transforms her into an ally of a healthy heart that has approached another heart that beats tirelessly, tumultuously. She met Edward Lewis, who is not just anyone, rather a saver of a life lived randomly.

The predestination tool is the chance you give yourself to test your limits in a situation where profitability falls under the assessment of the degree of "inner development" adjacent to the feeling of accountability to your fate: "I do not know why, but I want to do this".

The Ideal Candidate For Leadership can also be you. And it can be anyone who wants and tries to change something for the better in the lives of others. Give people that genuine, consistent spiritual food to change their attitude and your leadership level will grow. Your understanding of the need to be better with those around you, and the attempt to bring others on the right path will turn into a magnet that will attract more and more supporters.

But you have to have the necessary inclinations and especially the desire to be a mentor for people, a defender of their rights and, at the same time, a modeler of their mentality – in order to improve their lives and the achievement of their ideals.

The Illusionist, Who Lurks From The Unknown The Extensions Of His Science (II)

On December 02, 2012

Change the context of reality which you impose upon yourself as a standard of genuine self-knowledge, without deviating from the path of a variant of accountability that guides perfection.

I was involved in research beyond my limits. An intellectual chivalrous contest between two constants, between knowledge and its applicability, between the meaning of knowledge and updating your possibilities of "to be" a contest where I had to be very careful. For I could be tempted to pursue an ideal far too high for my ability to attain it. And, following constantly this ideal, to realize that I actually entered an unknown realm, warmed by the purest knowledge, but still so complicated.

The man, who keeps deliberately to be someone else, to be more than he is, to outdo himself, the man, who puts his knowledge for the benefit of his perfection can reach, from an excess of inspiration, of energy and able to go beyond reality. The converse being as valid, only such a man can achieve maximum potential of maturity and responsibility. Into what category are you falling?

Just as during cell division the chromatin is organized in the form of chromosomes, so the man who fully devotes himself towards reaching his perfection - through the continuous development of ideas, and through enhancing the effectiveness of his thinking process, by renewing his power to fully devote himself, may end up channeling his energies around an empty space. A separation of his Ego. A door closing for the total success.

Leadership: Do you engage in an exploration of your inner world through a constant inspiration that forces you to coexist with the effects of a rushed ascension?

This was the critical point of my knowledge - to go further than I was originally scheduled to arrive, to climb a mountain until it falters and collapses. Or to reach the top of it, leaving the others behind me, having in front of me only uncertainty.

This was the point where I realized that I was limited by an absolute phenomenon, only to a single option: the uncertainty. And this half unknown territory, terribly crammed with abstractions, lies on the border that separates reality from illusion, when you simply get lost in the labyrinth of science, of life, search, creation, inspiration, and of the endless thoughts - with all their additions. Perfection cannot be achieved, unless you succeed to pass this boundary, or to see beyond it. And to become what you really are.

Inspiration is a product of the thoughts you create in a context that changes rapidly and often denies your deeds through words. The man who freely and uninhibitedly lays out his inspiration gets to deny himself by negating what is finite, followed by a negation of reality, becoming the only survivor of a story written by himself.

A rushed ascension, which is the fruit of a continual inspiration leading to saturation, is an attempt to keep your ego high and to create a higher self-image when in reality your intentions are as such to cause a deep and mysterious resonance, strongly marked, in your spirit.

Right in the act of perfection, in the sense of the absolute precision measures, which deserve to be taken for a more accurate assessment of your own knowledge, the uncertainty can be determined if you do not follow faithfully the thread of your becoming, real, under all appearances. You become confused, and you end up not distinguishing anymore reality from illusion, moving away from your destination, deviating from your mission, on the long way towards "absoluteness".

Leadership: Do you focus your whole energy of perfection in a "Remember what you really know" to ensure the understanding of the content of a journey that is meant to be relevant through the echo produced on another level of consciousness?

Perfection is an act of de-doubling: you become someone else by your approach from different perspectives of reality that you combine according to your own visions of the world, feelings and imagination. A new man is a shadow of an old pattern of thought, or a light of judgment that affirms or denies anything about a particular subject.

Do you always compare yourself with a human type that does not want change around him and in him? Are all your resources put at stake in a constant search for something new? Have you reached a level at which you abandon some ideas in favor of some newer ones? Do you discover that as long you evolve, in fact, you know nothing about you? Do you feel that everything turns against you? Are you disobeying more and more your own being, through an increase of knowledge?

Consciousness is what remains after you have redefined your identity. And the echo produced at another level of consciousness is a product of changing dominant thoughts towards a reality that exists beyond what you think is reality.

Whoever loses himself in the darkness of thoughts reaches a reality close to the imagined reality, which is equivalent to a statement of passivity or an act of defeat in the face of his own confusion.

Leadership can be assimilated by almost anyone, with a single condition, which perhaps only the Greek philosopher Plato expressed it very clearly: "The biggest part of your training is to remember what you already know." And I would add here, "what you already know" is given by a continuous accumulation of values and knowledge assimilated over time, while being determined of everything that changes incessantly around you.

Everything that exists around you changes incessantly, and has a strong echo in your entire way of being. And only if you have that kind of mood of the man who would bet everything on one card, of the man who buries all bridges behind him in order to rebuild them more lasting on long term, you will be able to get up to a higher level of leadership.

In other case, you will remain an unknown person, a simple man, who occasionally feeds with the illusion of a grand future. And the one who clings to any illusion, using all sorts of tricks in order to get hold of the land required for his raising at a high level, will never reach that landmark of favorable orientation. But, will always occupy a secondary role in an improvised playlet, cut off from the truth promoted by the art of leadership.

The potential that takes you out of the routine is the symbolic universe in which you dwell and feel yourself, about what is real or false in all this movement of thoughts towards one or the other, to objects, things or to your vital concerns.

The illusionist who lurks upon the stretches of his science from the unknown is the man who is a master of his own thoughts, one who can raise his knowledge to a higher level without losing too much in the space of a virtual reality.

The Illusionist, Who Lurks From The Unknown The Extensions Of His Science (I)

On December 02, 2012

Increase the knowledge and understanding of the "man" within you, without going beyond the boundaries of what you are experiencing from the perspective of what you can not encompass.

Everything that exists around me changes incessantly, but imperceptibly, and almost without my knowledge, as an unnatural emanation of vapors, in a kind of spiral of time fixed by the sides of a magical force called "double overflow of forms from original chaos". The clogged sounds of knowledge and self-knowledge made themselves heard, but accompanied by the echoes of doubt. I was at an impasse that could lead to a considerable decrease in the value that I assigned to me, without hesitation, in understanding life and accepting the reality.

How it was possible that any one fellow, subject to a constant pressure, feeding himself only with the illusion of a dream, a stranger, who hurries to bring out to the surface from the darkest corners of the reality his true purpose - to confound, to compare himself at a distance of only a few "counterattacks" with another human type, with a passionate player of the reality, with a magician who transforms his magic in a unique way?

Should I, perhaps, conclude that I had reached the result of my own excess of transfiguration, and that all were in fact only one and the same thing, a separatism of my own limits? Was the man within me beyond any mask? Or, was clinging to any illusion, using all sorts of tricks?

Leadership: Can you be a model of a consciousness that is its own object of research, discovering within yourself those mechanisms of checks and balances that help you discover a different reflexivity?

All sorts of well-defined ideas that we abandon in favor of other inconsistencies. All of the convincing resources put at stake in a constant search for something new. But, for something unpredictable. For something improbable. A magnetic battery around which was lined in bunches all the resources, all the creative effluvia, the more subtle ones, dotted with the finest set of qualities. But that was discharged more and more through their own energy consumption.

As a man who learned so much, discovering the more I advanced in my study more and more secrets, I was convinced that I will never know anything. That, in fact, everything was returning against me, like a ricocheted bullet. For I disobeyed more and more my being, through an increase of knowledge. A symbolic search of something incomprehensible, the fight around a convoluted truth. The exclusive exploitation of an understanding, opposite to my own thinking that must be concluded.

I felt placed in the middle of heaven and earth, framed into a certain category of reality - nuanced only at the level of science. Un coureur poussé des nouvelles epreuves. Being limited by an unknown phenomenon, only to a single option: the uncertainty.

Reflexivity is the ability to analyze your own thoughts, emotions, professional practices, or situations that you are going through in order to turn them into a response to the great dilemmas of life.

And one of the biggest dilemmas of life, starting from the analysis of one's own person, is the following: "Why does man continue to construct, invent, diversify, seek something, that something that, if you ask him, he will not know how to define?"

Leadership: Does your evolution still have many steps to make before it reaches its structure to redefine the essence of your determination in an approach called: "personal balancing"?

The spark was lit, suddenly and unexpectedly, like an eruption of thoughts into a more or less distant future. Nothing could stop the man, under the path breaker forces, to defeat his illusions in the mist of becoming, denser. And harsher. There where nothing can be seen, but where dwell all the answers, and are accounted all the secrets. There where everything changes, but above all it is weighed.

I had come to report myself on some concepts that were as foreign for me as the chromosomes could be for Tolstoy. I felt proud and troubled at the same time, like the one passing the bridge of scientific research in order to penetrate into an unknown land, warmed by the purest knowledge, but still so complicated.

It was all about how well I handled the stick which brought wealth to the mind, contained in the imperative: "Weigh the forces well" !

Personal balancing is a quench of the impulse whose intensity gives value to existence, summarizing the being in its original depth, meaning an indulgence of how you use knowledge to facilitate that understanding that helps you see the wisdom behind the pain.

What causes your pain of not organizing chaos to create a new world? Is your inability to move on to action, in an attempt to give the impression of more transparency to a meaningful universe to blame?

Weigh well your forces, lest it just might seem to you that you have all the resources of motivation, inspiration and imagination, and when you face the great challenge of the unknown and uncertainty, discover that it was just a false impression.

Is the perception of your reality verified from the perspective of what you know you do not understand, insofar as everything you try to encompass is limited by the value you give to fulfillment and evolution based on exploring your own thoughts and experiences?

The illusionist who lurks from the unknown the extenses of his science brings to the fore that total change of the man who, by manipulating in a more sophisticated way the science and the knowledge, he comes creating and assuming duties beyond his powers. Moving away slightly of the reality, and after that increasingly more, he ends up isolated in a world of illusions. A world that can falter and even fall like a mountain.

Are you falling into a certain category of the reality - only nuanced at the level of science? Are the limitations of your own knowledge given by exactly this uncertainty knocking on the door of your life, wondering: "Who you actually are?". Do this uncertainty highlights the lack of your ability to analyze the things objectively before coming to a firm decision, before finding out how the things really are?

Increase the knowledge and understanding of the "man" within you, without going beyond the boundaries of what you are experiencing from the perspective of what you can not encompass.

The Illusions Of A Brain Emerged From Nothingness

On July 06, 2015

Place yourself in the position of a navigator in the space of knowledge, without turning leadership into an introverted field.

Everything constituted as a staging of an unnamed reality in a universe that could not be computed by science, but only by the inner voice of an artist who evaluates his work, needing to confirm that his taste for the depth and mystery of his interiority is perfect. In a sense, I felt like I should have made a great discovery, a step forward in finding habitable celestial bodies, a new record in the field of space research, by resonating in listening to a wide range of sounds such as those of the heart.

The greatest clarity of the conviction of a relativist observer is that there are no innate ideas, but only a force that triggers certain mental processes. The thought rushed without being able to on the main ideas, small flashes of intuition and imagination condensed into a short-lasting material in which time, taking itself at times equal to zero, was justified by the fact that it behaved like a conversation with a stranger, later on gaining the value of a feeling.

I felt disoriented, as if I had to explain up to a certain point the existence of an ocean found thirty leagues below the surface of the globe. The thought was an integral part of a sensible universe, a mirage of a false Ego. Or, rather, an illusion of something presented in various forms, a mirror of a reality equal to the sum of forces of interaction between the profound and the sensational. The property of a phenomenon of depending on momentary actions, a bait of the desire of piercing the hidden. They all promised to interpret a new resonance in the spectrum of a revealing composition.

Leadership: Does the activation of your creator side rest on the uniqueness of the ability to overcome the time you have lived as a witness of a reality that cannot transfigure the human person except in the space of a discovery of his own nature?

The nature of my own personality was, in the nature of my thoughts, concentric. Thus, I was able to open my heart and mind to understand in depth the nature of my own reality and my relationship with the Universe.

Time became a double of thought, a set of neuronal connections created in high-speed by a mind that asks itself – not only a mind that seeks, in agreement with the convention "beginning-end": it is never too late or too early, it is when it should be.

Or in the case of certain distributions of tasks of its functions of access into a perimeter that fulfilled the versatility of an alternative universe. In an area which, often, was different from all others, regardless of measures, standards and rules, focusing and dilating based on circumstances, time was calculated based on "back-and-forth" variables. I wonder how stable this circuit was always renewed by answers and revelations?

The thought, same as the soul has two eyes, someone said, one sees time, the other is turned towards eternity. The materialization of thought depends somewhat on the power of man of penetrating the untold and of dominating nothingness, acknowledging the fact that his potential of probing is unlimited.

Leadership: Do you position yourself in a different region of space called "Yourself" in accordance with the convention of "beginning-end" from the impetus of thoughts stemming from a mysterious creator fluid that flows continuously in terms of interpreting reality?

What fascinates through the means through which the projections of thoughts manage to fulfill a purpose often fixed with anticipation, is the modality of triggering a new representation of the space called "yourself", without confusing the purpose with the cause. This space connects what you imagine and what you are experiencing in a reality that far exceeds what is unanimously accepted.

The reality that guides you in life is often synonymous with sabotaging thoughts, with the delicate aspects of your personality, which for a creator means to build yourself a second nature, above the nature already given by the Creator. This second nature is different depending on how you perceive the truth about the world you are living in, and how you manage to discover your landmarks of real use in life.

Judging by how man uses his intention of enrolling at any price in the order of the imaginary, can leadership be considered a placement of knowledge in a world in which its availability is an impediment?

If so, then leadership becomes a field closed within itself, as an increasingly weak echo in the masses, but with a greater orientation towards what the aspirant imagines of superiority, turning this science into a real art of abstraction, leading (eventually) to certain types or forms of presentation and representation of knowledge. But also with a guidance on how it positions itself to the act of thinking that goes beyond the nomenclature of moral themes, identity, philosophically accepted as benchmarks of setting social limits.

Leadership: Is it possible to acquire a new conception of the world without the very acquisition of this concept already being a personal interpretation of an image far removed from the truth?

The transformation of thought, the placing of man in the position of a navigator in the space of knowledge by using the power offered by small flashes of intuition and imagination, develops successfully within the framework of leadership a superiority, though, somewhat indirectly, but which may have a correspondence in what regards self-image. Man becomes superior through the unique conception he makes about the world after the interpretation he gives himself in a context of redefining reality.

A picture situated far from the truth is a catch of reality that does not agree with thoughts on one aspect: it is never too late or too early to recognize yourself as someone other than what you have been to a certain point in life.

Romanian philosopher, C. Rădulescu Motru said at one point: "Scientific truths sown in the intelligence of people are unproductive. They do not have within them the ability to be transformed into practical values. They change nothing from the usual routine."

In order for the truths to be accepted, you must discover them on your own and then become fully aware of them. Therefore, placing yourself in a different region of the space called "yourself" in accordance with the convention of "beginning-end" from the impetus of thoughts, on the warm level of imagination, in the various directions of experimental results, is a way of differentiating yourself from others, of recognizing yourself as being someone else, it is a way of feeling free to know everything that others do not understand.

Thus, you will not be able to live by knowing other people. But will they be able to be enlightened through what you have assimilated individually?

The interpretation you give to each thing is a meeting of thoughts and reality that can omit the usual analysis of the possibilities of the world to reveal itself as a valve of supporting existence in a universe without a beginning and an end.

The Illusions Of A Brain Emerged From Nothingness highlights that side of man in danger of obtaining more or less than it is due by probing the unknown to which corresponds the imaginary, depending on the amount of knowledge adapted to personal requirements and demands, but susceptible to being transferable to others.

The Image Obtained By The Senses In A True Image

On January 23, 2022

When we perceive a figure, we interpret it consciously or unconsciously, it representing the form of a content and being the visible form of its content.

Everything we taste, sweet or fragrant, is part of us. Even if the taste differs from case to case, we must enjoy the pleasure of feeling as intensely as possible that distinct aroma of eucalyptus or mint, mixed with good mood. For example, the Orbit chewing gum used immediately after the meal, by any type of taste we attribute to it, we share something of the intention with which we try to obtain an authentic taste without losing flavor, invigorating in this way the digestion of food consumed during the meal.

Without the hope that I will lose a few more pounds, I am used to chewing Orbit gum, with flavor, with the intense expression of an emotional feeling, only for one reason: it gives me the feeling that my teeth are finer and cleaner. And, by stimulating the nerve endings in my mouth, giving me the feeling that my mouth is colder than usual, Orbit gum unconditionally keeps that wave of serenity that many would like to touch in an attempt to have a harmonious physiognomy.

Right now, I have a serenity on my face that even the most skilled painter could hardly have rendered in vivid colors, because the artists themselves are very interested in studying physiognomies that are very well individualized, despite the naive treatment. In fact, a state of serenity gathers the opinions of many regarding the ideal beauty, while the painter perceives that high degree of immaculate white of chewing gum, correlated with the crystalline white of the teeth, as an expression of purity, untouchable, being also a representation of cleanliness and light.

Leadership: Can everything you enjoy savoring describe the depth of aesthetic perception that turns an everyday experience into a source of emphasis on the senses capable of creating unique emotions?

Worthy of all attention is the artistic side of what I want to know better. Therefore, I try to examine an Orbit pill on all sides, even if I do not have all the information about how to maintain its elastic consistency. Without making any effort, I realize that I am part of the privileged role it plays in people's lives: it has the role of enhancing the feeling of satisfaction. Simply the generosity of perceptions and sensations with which Orbit chewing gum entitles me, full of echoes of great artistic accuracy, can only be altered by the complex phenomena of life.

Indeed, wanting to honor me with a surprise, Orbit gum wears gallantly, as an actress would proudly behave when she does not seek the help of a make-up artist to mask the lines around her mouth. For example, the broken line shows anxiety, hardness, tension. And that's because the Orbit gum has a minimalist shape, is flexible, but difficult to represent on a canvas, and also difficult to translate into a sincere drawing if we perceive it as a characteristic of a troubled and defeated figure seeking relief, rest, or a comfort in a deterministic belief.

In art you have to understand the operation by which a given geometric figure corresponds to another figure, much more alive and closer to the rules of contemporary art, along with its spatial orientation or that of the environment. Alternatively, by going through an intrinsic freshness, by a characteristic movement of the mouth, accompanied by a specific, unarticulated sound, you can get the feeling of calm, or, conversely, that feeling of abandonment that detaches you from the real world when you go through difficult moments. But in the end, you struggle and fight with the moods you have to overcome.

Leadership: Can you connect directly to the object of your creation through a process of resemblance used in the process of revealing a common property present in both an image and the object in question?

At other times, when I chew Orbit gum, my smile seems fake, forced, distilled with unobtrusive cheerfulness, sketching a barely perceptible grimace. In this case, I think I look like that movie character named Arthur Fleck, aka JOKER, an individual ignored by society, with an unpredictable and fascinating personality who can't be included in any stereotype. What is achieved through the process of resemblance is an extensive study of a character despised by society who becomes a moralizing story.

More than that. Talking to myself as I chew Orbit gum, I feel like an artist is coloring my thoughts a pale red, but covered in a high degree of white. Probably the artist, measuring from the eyes the roundness of the cheeks, intuiting my desire to enjoy the sweetness and aroma of mint, tries to build an emotional trigger by subjecting the reality generated by the interaction of three factors: modeling, modulation (obtaining color transparency) and hatching (artistic process due to which the illusion of the volume of objects through different effects can be reproduced in painting).

So I look at how the artist knew how to encode meaning in a work of art. I simply formed myself as a pictorial model by the way my face looks, as it completely defines me, and the shape of my lips, the corners of my mouth greatly influence the appearance and expression. However, most often, Orbit chewing gum has become an increasingly popular occupation, and this activity can be practiced even by people who have no talent for painting.

The ideal of a creation that culminates in an idea of "art" is formed by the connection made between the way you perceive the referential "INSIDE" by resemblance to a trigger called "Representative Sense" that gives you the most frequent pleasures.

The Image Obtained By The Senses In A True Image is in fact an opportunity to explore the self, to search for a distinct identity. In this way, I would like to mention a piece of advice found on the Internet: "Use your senses as fully as possible when imagining the desired reality. Try to touch it, taste it, smell it and hear it in your imagination, not just visualize it."

The Image Of The Rose From The Height Of An Ageless Age

On June 01, 2020

A creation is total only when man reserves the metaphysical significance of a destiny that passes the test of time.

I look at this rose with candor, with chosen consideration, with the gentle eyes of a story painter, as I would move among the paintings of a distant history reconstructed by the snapshot of a moment of wandering extracted from the command of an alien, imaginary time that will never belong to me. Or at least not really. For nothing resembles its beauty, so close to the reproduction of a living, modern picture, with a landscape springing from another life, from another story, from a source of the fabulous that includes a grandiose destiny, an unforeseen journey full of mysteries and a vocation full of naturalness.

I look at him in amazement, in admiration, through the power of the word Nassegientyum(the word of God in the light of an eternal torch), in an attempt to comprehend the victorious temperament of a nobleman set on an almost insane search for a new wonder of the world during an endless flight above the desert. I notice the white sand, so fine, but full of sadness, which for millions of years contains in each of its grains a martyr's soul, but also a part of the whole of a mystery known only to the ancient Kabbalists. Nothing changes over time, they all come and go, but the desert remains the same. The Pyramid of Khufu, the Sphinx and the Song of the Harpist engraved in the stone tomb of King Antef II, are still a place of honor in the memory of the present.

So many times I have tried to forget who I am, to forget who I was, just to live through a rose, to give everything for it, "prime matter", the key to immortality, but I cannot realize it in the light of a modern vision, rather only by dominating the atmosphere of another world contained as if in a painting by Valerie Anne Kelly. It refers to other times, to other experiences, to other places in the desert, because that is where its kind comes from, with thorns and prestige.

But no one knows why roses exist and what their end is in a creation that is not based on the obsession with originality, but on visualization and attention to the alleged "reality".

Leadership: Does your significance in the world begin to acquire a sense of fulfillment, of accomplishment, of a whole, by increasing the tendency to receive the message contained in a destiny that transcends time, space and history?

The rose, something more than a history, has a unique meaning in the world, a special emphasis on the reputation of being impeccable, because it clearly reveals the power of those Egyptians whom Herodotus called "the most religious people". I am glad that because of him, and according to the depths of my soul, with the body I clothe with solar force, I no longer have to think of life or death, as both designate the fulfillment of a creation that deliberately mixes the register of the miraculous with that of the supernatural.

"Follow your desire and do good to yourself, as long as you live", the artist's voice of this passing world whispers to me secretly, in the context of the manifestation of a higher reality. And like any Egyptian who respects what is written in the book of Kohelet, the rose – enlivened by the frankness of a Boccaccio and the naturalness of an explorer of universal topos, continues to tell me its purpose in the world: "I have blessed those who died in ancient times, more than the living who are now alive."

But no one returns to the desert just to listen to the confessions of a sensitive, wise destiny, chained by the god Ra in a personification of desire, but also of supreme elegance, or in a personification of legendary figures. For no one knows my past, no one tries to look at me with the eyes of an artist, no one animates me with more sensitivity than the one who has lived more lives, knowing himself caught between several worlds.

That is why it is better for my destiny to be foreign to the wisdom of this world, for it is better to reveal myself behind an impenetrable enigma, elucidated only by the ancient Kabbalists, and which hides depths full of pain, full of joy, than to give this existence an unusual meaning.

Leadership: Do all your thoughts form the image of a creation that has common points in representing the conception of the world and life in the composition of a bookish destiny?

Even if I listened to the words of Imhotep or the words of the skillful narrator Herdedef, I could not overlook the fears of people who betray their souls just to get good food. I couldn't help but notice the color of the sky in the west when, after a war, everything was bathed in blood. I have seen animals feed on the meat of other animals, worms that live on other organisms, how plants change according to the season.

The painter encompasses them all in a vivid picture, with the brush of a ray of light which, passing from one medium to another, makes everything precious, blends perfectly and acquires a unitary, deeper meaning. And the same brush, considering the decipherment of the symbolic substratum of a work with spiritual content, is contradicted by something contrary to the natural, being immediately disturbed by the effort to deepen the meaning of the term Sycretexhium, summing up the promise of a purely imaginary, illusory happiness.

The universe has chosen its gods. One of the gods hid his identity under the cloak of an earthly king, the king outlined the image of a sage, and the sage dared to become a true miracle of nature. Only the saints know that this is the secret of the Great Work. And I am more than a saint, I am a Creator who has surpassed himself to receive what the universe has and can offer him: a star in the sky and the much-coveted immortality.

The most spectacular phase of leadership is a journey through time, it means following in the footsteps of the legendary destiny of the man who managed to survive an age without old age due to the understanding of things that cannot be interpreted before they happen.

My involvement in the process of "reconstituting" the image of a rose from a height of an ageless age is best revealed in an excerpt from the novel Pharaoh, written by Boleslaw Prus:

"Dress as beautifully as you can and do not allow your heart to grieve. For this is the life of man. Pleasures are like peaks, and sufferings like precipice valleys, and only altogether make up life, which is like the ragged chain of the Libyan mountains, which we look at with admiration. The man whose heart no longer beats not only does not grieve over the grief of another, but also does not enjoy his own life, however beautiful it may be.

What good is the beauty of life then, if you redeem it with pain and tears of blood? Priest Pentuer asks the astrologer Menes.

The night was getting darker. Menes wrapped himself in his cloak and replied:

- Whenever such thoughts overwhelm you, go to one of our temples and look at the walls adorned with faces of people, animals, trees, rivers and stars like those in the world in which we live. To the uneducated man, these paintings are priceless, and perhaps many have wondered what they are for and why so much work is wasted on making them. But the sage approaches with holiness and, embracing them with his eyes, reads in them the history of ancient times and the mysteries of wisdom."

This is my wisdom: Everything is repeated, but in a different version, and it will be repeated until the number of people born on earth equals the number of angels who once fell from paradise. Angels, or the embodied spirits of nature.

The Image Of The Rose From The Height of An Ageless Age is the image of a man who was able to produce an effective engagement in a symbolized universe, to discover himself behind the realistic scenario of a story destiny that was not interrupted by the vicissitudes of history.

The Image That Quite Clearly Depicts The Teachings Of Occultism

On September 28, 2022

A true leader knows how to create an image that up-close looks identical to the one from afar, without ending up identifying too much with the image he projects to the rest of the world.

Let me tell you what I saw again today in a book written by Papus. He wrote that man considers himself the sole creator and sole judge of his destiny, being free to act as he pleases in the circle of his fatality, just as a passenger can act in a steamship as he pleases in his compartment. God can no longer be pointed out as an accomplice to human error, any more than the captain of the ship is responsible for the fantasies of the passengers he carries forward.

But, read on, and you will find that God, as it appears at first sight, is the totality of all that exists, and man is subject to a change that he cannot control. Here is the picture which shows quite clearly the teachings of Occultism in regards to this problem of change caused by an unsuspected force.

A steamship is launched on the vast Ocean and floats towards the endpoint set by the term of the journey. Everything the ship contains is driven forward. And yet everyone is free to organize their compartment as they like. Everyone is free to go up on deck to contemplate the infinite, or go down to the bottom of the hold.

Forward progress is made every day for the whole mass of people. But each individuality is free to act as they please within the circle of action they are given to share. All classes are there on that ship, from the poor emigrant who sleeps in a sack to the rich Yankee who occupies a luxury compartment. And the speed is the same for all, be they rich, poor, great or small, all will reach the end of the journey at the same time.

Leadership: Can you outline the ideal image of a present that decides its future, in an attempt to analyze what happens in the relationship between a content that is called "will of power" and a compelling content that is not seen?

An unconscious machine operating according to strict laws sets the whole system in motion. A blind force (steam) channeled into metal tubes and organs, generated by a special factor (heat) animates the entire machine. One will, which dominates the organic machine together with the passenger assemblage, governs everything: the captain. Indifferent to the particular action of each passenger, the captain, eyes fixed on the target to be reached, hand on the rudder, leads the immense organism to the term of the journey, giving his orders to the army of intelligences that obey him.

But the captain does not directly command the propeller that sets the ship in motion, he has no immediate effect except on the rudder. Thus the Universe can be compared to a huge steamship, where the one we call God holds the helm. Nature is the machine synthesized in the propeller that sets the whole system in motion according to strict laws, and humans are the Passengers. The captain does not intervene in the details of the driving machinery (image of nature), or in the occupations of the passengers. He circumferentially governs the overall system. He has nothing to do with what happens inside the compartments.

Progress exists, generally, for the whole system, but each human being is absolutely free in the circle of his own fatality. Whether they want it or not, regardless of their will, whatever they have in their head and soul, whatever plans they have, all the passengers are heading in one direction. But not so much in the direction that the captain commands, but in the direction that the stormy sea decides: the heavy waves, the hard rocks, the ocean currents, the capricious weather. As you can see, the captain himself, together with his vessel, are two fragile entities totally subject to the forces of nature.

Of course, the understanding of this fact is much more complicated than it seems at first sight, although if we were to fit into a single picture everything that provides us as an example of everyday reality, we will find that we are powerless to follow a certain fixed path as we wanted. Or we follow a path that we believe is valid, and all we find is a dead end, an illusion, only to have to go back the way we came, retrace our steps, and try another approach. And so on... until our will happens to please the Divine Nature.

Leadership: Can you generate a certain manifestation of power where the feelings, thoughts and memory of an event are completely circumscribed to that past event, so that fragments of it are no longer automatically reproduced in other situations?

Shakespeare knew this well when he told about how Prospero directed all the elements of nature with a cosmic will. People try to make their way in life, not suspecting that there is another higher and truly unique knowledge that has a great influence on them.

Having some powerful spirits under his command, but obedient to his will, Prospero could by their means command the winds and waves of the sea. At his command, the spirits stirred up a violent storm, in the midst of which a ship was trying to stay afloat in the struggle with the wild waves of the sea that every moment threatened to swallow it. Prospero showed his daughter this beautiful ship, which he told her was full of living things. "Oh, my dear father", said she, "if by thy art thou hast raised this fearful tempest, pity their sad plight. See ! The vessel will be dashed to pieces. Poor souls ! they will all perish. If I had power, I would sink the sea under the earth, rather than the beautiful ship be destroyed, with all the precious souls within it."

What conclusion do we draw from this? Man conducts his life to such an extent that what happens in it appears as if it happens completely in him. His experiences, as vivid and varied as possible, are approached either in the memory of the event in its entirety, or they are circumscribed to that past event, so that fragments of it are no longer automatically produced in other situations. My objection to this is that man takes the Work of God as a discrete collection of events, and this in accordance with the word "introversion" which stutters into a deep vision of existence.

But God's science is so subtle that it sometimes gets confused with nature, and man takes nature as something that needs no help to function or exist. But what God leaves out of understanding, mainly, is the content of the relationship between leader and subordinate, and only by successfully fulfilling the role of leader can certain advantages be ensured to subordinates. Is it not so?

Leadership: Are you able to change your way of acting when you understand the primordial cause that led to a certain manifestation of will attributed to conditioning based on a priori premises?

Let's say that God is the personalized and well-determined content, that of pure a priori knowledge, a content that cannot be seen, and to which people refer with difficulties in understanding. It is the image of a permanent Self to which the ephemeral consequences of various situations gradually submit. Although it is not perfectly understood how exactly this "Primordial Consciousness" mediates these events and connections between facts, things and experiences, without which nothing would be possible, one thing is certain: it is impossible to perceive an insignificant thing, like a whisper in the storm, when you are isolated from your life context, without asking yourself why a trivial situation has a strange "I don't understand" effect.

You cannot only be a spectator of life. You are the subject of life, um passado absorvido em um presente que busca seu futuro , but you are also the promoter of your own vision of an invisible hand that guides things. Without being put in a state of trial you will not realize that there is a direct relationship between the meaning of an event and the affective reaction to it.

You do this by substituting for your immediate life experience a temporal interpretation in which your "true worth" is inevitably compromised by a strange presence that does not avoid you, watching absently at everything that happens to you, but changes everything that you set out to do. And if you try to forget what happened to you, moving away as much as possible from the event that happened, directing your thoughts elsewhere, suddenly you find yourself in the middle of the storm. In such a situation, don't be afraid to turn back from the road, because the weather can take you by surprise anyway (even if you want to find consolation in the thought that it can't get any worse).

In leadership, the conviction that you have to act to achieve your goal justifies the reason for eventual success, but it does not provide any future certainty, because success will always depend on random external phenomena, not only on your own actions.

Be willing to act by accepting this idea ! Use your intellectual capacities to the maximum to get a clear idea about the above points.

The Image That Quite Clearly Depicts The Teachings Of Occultism is the image of a ship whose main route becomes the bypass route that passes through several stages: stagnation (losing much of the importance it had), and correction (to prevent any opposition, any actions contrary to the divine will).

Be flexible and adaptable in the steps taken to achieve the proposed goal. Things will always take a different turn than you planned, just so you understand that everything depends only on God. By this, He demonstrates His unseen, unimaginable and inexplicable power.

P.S. In an age of unbelief, God demonstrates the truth of His Word through science.

The Image With Which The Eye Widens Its Horizon

On August 11, 2023

The ability to look at an image in an artistic or profound way cannot be developed in any other way than by observing and analyzing the images in which you find yourself reflected by the "other you".

When I look around, the interesting thing is that I can see everything, even the hidden meanings of things, or the hidden faces of people, more easily intuiting the causal links between deterioration and progress. And one can see how absurd it is to change a view or a cause, handcuffing reality in an alleged insularity that includes only the imagined form of a concrete knowledge, taken to an area forbidden to anyone's access to divine supremacy. People, as well as things, are from the point of view of the artist's eyes, islands that sink, disappear in the sea under the light of the burning sun, without being found. Only in God's eyes is everything found.

I am, as we speak, watching a man jogging, trying to conserve his vitality and energy with his every step, in perfect harmony with the rhythm of his pulse and the fleeting flight of his thoughts. He has a deep, expressive look, which can be immortalized in a painting by Grigorescu, as a Universe within a Multi-universe, because in his eyes are reflected the serenity of a pure world, the mystery and the incomprehensible beauty of the surrounding landscape. As I keep looking at him with unwavering curiosity, as if I wanted to penetrate his secret world and reveal his hidden thoughts, I see myself enjoying life, contemplating this life in all its deep and complex nuances, in all its ephemeral splendor.

Without a doubt, this man is an artist, because I knew how to see an artist in him, even if he was just another man among other people on the beach. In his mental landscape, where it becomes necessary to approach credibility, and not photograph reality, I get lost as in a labyrinth full of contrasts, memories and dreams, where every color, every shade, is an opening to another world. The artist himself becomes, through mirroring in his work, my guide through these captivating and magical worlds, and with each glance cast on their imaginary canvas, my memories and dreams come alive.

Leadership: Can the image to which you give a figurative representation stimulate your clairvoyance while also facilitating your inner visualization?

I'm on an unreal beautiful, isolated island with millions of milk-white pebbles. The Ionian Sea in western Greece is pure nature, wilderness, where turquoise dominates first and foremost. Obviously, sight helps me grasp this isolated world, which hides unknown stories, in a theme that encompasses nature in all its splendor, with the risk of losing the sense of orientation in a time of no return.

In this way, I pretend that I need a new frame to paint a barely visible scene, the meeting between a painter and a god. It is the vision of the artist who, seeking the solitude and tranquility of the islands to cultivate his imagination and to bring his creations to life, manages to reveal a subtle presence hidden in every piece of creation.

Man became another man, because his gaze included another similar gaze, capable of penetrating the meanings of art. But still, it is a different look through the colors and shapes he discovers in every sunrise, in every grain of sand, like a memory of the time spent in a living, impressionistic painting.

And if I have seen someone who looks like me, living in a perfectly reflected form in my mind, it is because my very creation is a game of constant substitution in which I explore multiple identities and perspectives to reveal the deep layers of my self.

Leadership: Can you create a visual image highlighting the contrast between two figurative entities silently collaborating to become one introspective manifestation?

Again, my eyes catch the appearance of another man on the beach. And their gaze is similar, they are both artists because of their eyes directed towards the same points of interest, seeming to see the same things. However, I can't figure out if the two of them are different, or if it's just one in two poses at the same time: viewer and creator. After all, all my life I have done nothing but turn life into fiction, as if there was always another person watching me, a divine presence, a god, a creator who sees beyond appearances what remains unnoticed.

I also encountered such a coincidence in John Fowles' novel:

"After all, what was I? I was nothing but the sum of my many wanderings. The Freudian jargon of the trial made me smile, but all my life all I did was turn life into fiction, refusing to face reality. I had always behaved as if there was another person watching me, listening to me, and giving me good or bad marks -- for everything I did. A god. Or a novelist to whom I turned, and I was his character, able to doing exactly what he had to in order to please, vulnerable to his insults, able to adapt to whatever he thought the novelist-god wanted.

I myself have created this variety of super-ego, like a leech. I myself have nurtured it, and because of it I have always been unable to act freely. It had been my defense system, but soon enough it had become my own tyrant. And now, I realized, but it was too late. I sat on the shore and waited for the dawn to break over the gray sea..."

Leadership highlights ideas related to perspective, unique interpretation, and reality transformation. To create something unique you have to see beyond appearances, highlighting the contrast between two people: one who metamorphoses into an artist, and another who gives his creation a divine presence.

The Image With Which The Eye Widens Its Horizon can only be truly understood in the context of other artistic forms, such as painting, literature, visual expression which, intertwining every nuance of the landscape and experiences, share the essence of every aspect of life and nature. Remember that the art of creating images can only be acquired by looking at images.

The Imaginary Of A World Beyond Us

On October 03, 2020

Only the privilege of being a Creator can give meaning to a life lived at a time when you must link the image of a vertical-spiritual aspiration with the image of a brilliant creation.

I began to write about myself as being in another world, to give the replica of a life from another life, with that revelation impossible to specify, which I tried to intuit artistically, with the brush and a knife for painting. I had to create reliefs and impasto, worthy of a sui generis, constructive surrealism. Of course, I relied entirely on the symbolic and suggestive force of vibrant images, corresponding to the words written through the game of chance, in the spirit of finesse and in the fragility of a genuinely lived emotion.

For this, I took as a dual model of existence, as a crossing point in another world, the image of a Double Delight rose, and such a futuristic technique of exploiting the worlds, is undoubtedly influenced by a writing of living, which belongs entirely to the next moment, revising every time what has been acquired by revelation and enlightenment.

And any revelation that has as a point of reference the passage of feelings through the succession of colors and the possibilities of personalizing a special world, with many lights, but especially through the use of point, line and shape, must be worthy of man and God, as to be at least comprehensible symbolically.

Leadership: Can your creation be interpreted as a part of the soul of nature, having as a point of reference the image of the human factor revealed as a replica of a life from another life?

I can't stop the colors from flickering and playing on top of each other, even at the moment of visual possession of a color theme called Exludasherr, meaning the movement of planes far from the nearest one to evoke an unseen spatial structure. But I can resize an art world with a writing that, starting from the rose, can reach the very Milky Way in which I get lost and find myself at the same time.

Probably, the divine that characterizes an artist's zeal for as much perfection as possible, can be likened to choosing a color that is not limited to the concept of Exludasherr, but would best reflect the pure spirit of the reconstruction of the astral plane. The rose itself is the mirror of an artist in the astral plane, an imitation of the creator in a divine frame, in a dream of the dream book, on the sublime territory of an easel which, since the Renaissance, has become the main form of pictorial representation.

In the same way, the symbol of connecting worlds beyond me or beyond the external reality, must imitate an enigmatic and fascinating character, so that the rules imposed by the writing of numbers and years, related to the writing destined by an invisible hand that puts things, shapes and colors in a certain order. I think that the Creator himself looks at me with eyes that really see the relationship of identity between subjectivity and objectivity, but he does not oppose the writing traveled with that quality of the writer to create the unpredictable, to objectively describe an unknown reality.

This is the discovery of the divine, in the spiritual property of the rose to influence writing and to serve as a promise of a brush to define a new reality.

The rose is part of my writing, because its purity is found (as a first-rate artistic tool) in the use of the right key for access to the Divine Self, individually. Whatever words I write with the magic pen, they contain the charm with which a brush can color the symbol of the divine, as well as of the human, nature and the universe in its immensity.

And the true manifestation of the divine has as a landmark the image of the human factor revealed as the replica of a life from another life, from another world, from another reality.

Yes, there are words that belong to the pen, through a creative expression with the help of the rose, just as there are words that belong to the brush, no matter what color we use to create a certain brightness specific to an acrylic painting, like Randy Burns' masterpiece. We also know that any artistic writing measures the finesse with which the Creator uses the brush to obtain a light effect, using the highest resonant frequency of a crystal globe in which are inscribed all the secrets of the world, the genetic codes of plants and animals.

Let us look at leadership through a unique, divine privilege: that of expressing the creative act of a Creator through a type of approach that speaks to aesthetic experience, and perhaps thus we will understand the personality of an artist who molds his reality from an accessible appearance.

The Imaginary Of A World Beyond Us is revealed by the meaning that the artist gives to life lived at a time when he must link the image of a vertical-spiritual aspiration with the image of a brilliant creation.

The climax of the creative process is reached when living a spiritual life is reflected in the image of a parallel world, shaped by the aspiration to penetrate the mysteries of the universe, starting from the idea that any body of nature is a reflection of a heavenly body, and that any reality is mirrored in multiplicity.

The Imaginative Universe Of Boundless Creation

On November 23, 2020

Man is more than a mind and a body, and by reuniting with the spiritual dimension the echo of his self is majorly transformed into a work of creation.

I try to translate into painting the words of an inner universe that I cannot explain by word of mouth, but only by the emotion with which I want to represent the framework of a deeper reality, closer to the obvious predominance of a quiet sky, with the decipherment of the logic of a law that regulates the form that the artist's agreement must take with the essence of the purposes of existence. I'm about to succeed.

All the time the brush speaks to me through colors, indicating to me the essential features that underlie existence, forming a harmonious unity: space, time, order, determination, all ranging from recreation to spiritual. From a certain point of view, the brush is a release and freedom at the same time, because it leaves me room for reflection, it helps me relax, calm down, while handling it finely, gracefully, with that freedom that goes from the frank expression of feelings of belonging to an overlapping universe, it is my form of communication with the eye of an imaginary form of expression, from fantastic to abstract.

Art highlights the unity of the multiplicity of reality in which the act of creation frames me. No wonder. Driven by a certain metaphysical disposition, I came to believe that they are just the written transposition of a universe that has identity in the mind and soul of a painter who dresses his canvas with the imaginary form of a geometry visible only in the mystical, spiritual way. The words hardly express the dimension of the things I believe in, but rather show the dimension of an inner epic that will never consume its possibilities of interpretation.

Leadership: Is the demiurgic creation of your self oriented towards a new variant and stylistic tendency, approaching in its theme a reinterpretation of the messages of art that are twinned with the religious?

It would be said that the work of the brush is the work of enlightening souls and free thoughts, reminding me that I have not seen for a long time a flower of paradise, the sky in the storm, or that "beyond the stars" that trembles to fly above a lifetime. In art, the image rendered in writing or through the pictorial layer of the canvas, can reflect an exclusively symbolic language, closely related to the religious part of the lyric. Art does things in a sensitive way, it shapes dreams in the way of an ideal of reporting to the universe, that of the purity of existence and movement of bodies, of the plurality of visions, of the simultaneous display of all existential virtualities and small everyday beauties.

By the celestial virtue conferred on me by the blessing of a full alchemical sanctification, with the passage to microconglomerates and sporadic concretions of active metaphors, a sanctification as solitary as it is eloquent, I have succeeded in producing a new pattern of transmitting ancient teachings to another level of expressiveness. Even astrologically, both the brush and the pen can develop some purely theoretical aspects, having a wider duality, that between the intellectual and the affective element, one being expressed through the eyes, the other through words.

The demiurgic creation of my self is a manifestation of the emotional instinct poured into artistic forms of free expression of feelings (of a high expressiveness), which indicate an immutable presence through grace and logos. In this case, the stylistic tendency that influences my creation coincides with my desire to be recognized and appreciated for what it is, to discover myself better, not to run away from myself, and to use usefully everything I have discovered to remake the harmony of the literary-artistic universe.

Leadership: Can you explain the reason for the search for the self in itself by the way of being of art that is achieved through works or actions with well-thought-out aesthetic meanings?

Who knows, maybe I myself am the work of beautifying through words an Ego that is believed to be above the illusion of a meaningful world, above the earthly and heavenly, without humbly standing before the altar of silence, in the empire of signs without meaning and symbols without a revealing correspondent, difficult to decipher anyway.

And if I engage in a skillful game of practicing writing, full of lyricism, from the instinct of self-exploration, as a prophetic call over time, it is because I am trying to reveal, at least in part, the fruit of an act of creation spontaneously triggered by the mysteries of spirituality.

With this being said, I am an artist through the power of the drops of wisdom shed in the memory of time, by choosing the meanings of words heard by someone whose eyes know how to look closely at an intellectual creation and recognize, receive that reality of my inner existence that resonates with the frequency of universal consciousness.

I am an artist of emotions unfolded in the empire of a sky that is only a dream, in the empire of a butterfly filled with many colors, which captures a lyrical world through fragility and zeal. In its light, free flight, untouched by unforgiving passions, the butterfly somehow managed to reach the clouds, to reach the sky. Eventually, I managed to reach the sublime of his flight by simply touching a canvas with a brush. The pen is the witness of this artistic animation.

The reason for the search for the self in itself can be to give meaning to a spiritual dimension that has its origin in the act of creation that begins with the attention directed towards listening to the inside of an overflow of existential geography.

The Imaginative Universe Of Boundless Creation captures the main characteristic of the self that is reflected in the eternal work of creation, being a transposition of thoughts and feelings into a symbiosis of space and time in which I assumed the duty to be the link between mind and spirit.

At the same time, they are the link between personal codes and those of the literary text, they are the link between matter and the conceptual substance of symbolic origin. I am the voice of the universe because I knew how to introduce myself to the universal of a world contained precisely in an immeasurable model of expressions and words.

The Immense Error Of Richard Wagner

Dedicate yourself fully to a remarkable art, without depreciating your knowledge or drowning it into a lack of meaning.

According to Nietzsche, the composer Richard Wagner started out with an immense error... he devoted himself recklessly, but with good faith, to an art with the most revolting of structure, namely to that art form that sees its purpose only in "pulling success from the public", using every artistic means destined for this purpose. It is on this very path however that Wagner came to be aware of his mistake, to the awareness of the sterility of this path and its lack of meaning, because he realized, in the desperation stemming from the recognized mistake, the lying essence of modern success, of the modern public, of the entire modern art.

The feeling of disappointment and repentance led Richard Wagner to the awareness of the intermediary stage of his spiritual development. The stage which Nietzsche designates, unlike the former and the latter, in two words: "Wagner became a revolutionary of society."

Leadership: What meaning can you give to an individual existence that is itself the result of the effects of "slow motion" in a space of art in which the form, the background and the meaning intersect in a barometer of public interest?

By increasing the knowledge capital, which unites elements of old and new to form others more evolved, into an array of matured ideas, of innovations fueled by that same source of revelations, is trying to actually support a position of authority in what regards performance in achieving scientific creations. Art is not just a privilege to unite your feelings in one place, but it is more of a privilege to see new perspectives of spiritual development that give you a certain social status.

And the man who cannot distinguish clearly between science and pseudo-science, neglecting any implementation of experience, which should start with extensive research and the formulation of new constructive conclusions, will suffer defeat precisely because of the limits of the science he loves. In him the feeling of disappointment and repentance will settle, if their views are invalidated by others and if their values become restrictions for different areas or thought patterns.

An artist's mistake may consist in forgetting his calling to direct, guide, and influence the knowledge he proves in establishing conceptual distinctions in favor of the desire to amaze. Reaching your fault awareness, awareness of the sterility of this path of development and its lack of meaning, in the desperation stemming from the recognized mistake, is the consequence of a lack of perspective or of an under appreciation of personal creation.

In terms of leadership, the "slow motion" effect refers precisely to this slowing, on its own initiative, of the pace of development due to imbalances in reversing the conditions of exploitation of already existing science – in favor of obtaining as many "applauses" as possible. The man who knows his own limits only invests time in a new form of interaction with the public as a way to understand himself, to self-evaluate by comparison with the public's reaction.

Therefore, the development of new methods of creation is a requirement of the evolution of art, but at the same time presupposes a standstill pending a reaction from the public. And it is more important to achieve a version of how to rethink and reform your own version of being smart and brilliant than to raise the value of your own image in the eyes of others.

Leadership: Do you value or eliminate the errors of exploration of new forms of innovation based on the hope of providing the general public a full picture of the "reaction-counter-reaction" phenomenon?

Often these artisans of scientific compositions, instead of basing their creations on the research data obtained, start out with great errors of exploration of new forms of innovation, uncertain and burdensome trials, setbacks, stops, in a field that does not ensure a guaranteed scientific intake.

They dedicated themselves, in good faith, to an art that has its purpose only in obtaining artistic and technical effects by completely new means, often combining reality with the fantastical. And this doesn't only make them "revolutionaries" but also propagandists, whose stake is the pride of being in control, of being superior, of achieving maximum success.

Innovation must not be an instrument to control news for the general public, but it is rather a demonstration of virtue in requiring you to do works of a certain standard offered only by the one who guarantees the assurance of an ideal aspiration that is purely scientific and cultural.

A great disorientation, a lack of meaning of the process of self-improvement, are the negative factors that determine or influence the strength characteristics of the personality of the leader, of his reason to look at all the "faces" of science in an objective or subjective manner. Leadership intervenes into this equation of effects, of their causes and risks, which can depreciate science or drown it into a lack of meaning, if its user falls prey to anxiety. He who cares more for his pride than his conscience, makes a grave mistake, eventually coming to hate himself.

The "stimulus-response" phenomenon aims at assessing the artist's ability to properly manage the balance between what he exposes to the world (as a culture and education entity) and what he must accept as "disappointment" when he denies merit due to his tendency to amaze.

The Great Error Of Richard Wagner concerns the possibility of making a mistake and failing in a field such as leadership, if the followed purpose is only temporary success, without bringing a significant and revolutionary contribution, worthy of being adopted and followed, to the renewal of a vision that meets people's preoccupations for art.

The Imminence Of A Higher Revelation

On December 07, 2014

Examine the means of sustaining the future of assuming a new status, by substantiating the delivery options of reality.

Only that closed space between the eternal and the ephemeral, itself a sum of contrasts, harmoniously combining the real with the unreal like meteors that burn to light the universe, can modify its consistency in the subjective dimension of interpretation, through the direct action of the laws of the unpredictable. I didn't quite know what to tie myself to so that I could glimpse a new reason of existence.

Abstract laws, that I myself established with the momentum of creative imagination, particularly fertile, through the way of wording unanswered questions, but from which a singular direction was born – of an insightful understanding, placed in the service of an irresistible intellectual temptation. I seemed to be virused by the ravages of an ever growing madness, like a man who forgets of his fleeting condition in this world.

Naturally, in order to spin all those invisible wheels that made the subtle mechanism of creation transform thought into reality, through associations between multiple distinct concepts, I had to probe the limits of the referential fantasy, undermining the conventions of reason which rest only on certainties. Guiding myself, I had to take into account the direction of the triggering current of the differential when summing up the meeting fictional forces, in a logical circuit that used appropriate combinations of And-Or-No type gates.

It is said that Nicolas Flames saw an angel in his sleep holding a beautifully adorned book, in which a dedication written by Abraham the Jew of the Jewish people was noted. The angel said to the future alchemist: "Behold this book from which you can understand nothing. For many others like yourself it will remain incomprehensible. But one day you will see that which no one else could ever see."

When you try to force a revelation higher than all wisdom and creation which beg to be used at their true value in order to be transmitted over the centuries, it is essential to see what does not yet exist.

Leadership: Can you master the art of a creator who has undertaken his contradictions by melting them into a Self that, far from being abstract, plasticizes itself through united associations with the matter of a new understanding of madness?

Resorting to the future form of the experience of using knowledge, seen as a bearer of a higher revelation, anticipating the continuation of the transforming process of reality in a way that can polish your identity and way of thinking, is one of the conditions needed to be met so that leadership can reach the threshold of the absolute and be able to compete with the area fitted with the potential of redefining and reinventing themselves.

The fair reward to an ever extending madness may result in very high yield productivity, providing added value to your potential to turn into an agent of change. A sort of conscious and interpretable process of unique construction sustained logically, sustainable and accessible to your needs of adapting to the new requests of performance raised at the level of genius.

Madness seems to be not the kind of widening of the Ego dimension by assimilation of the contents concealed in the unconscious, which are brought to light by participation in the spectacle of a surprising alternative to reality. It also has a role to play as a generator of ideas and correlative themes to the promise of an exit from the "Matrix", with an improvement in view from angles other than those required by the criteria of objectivity.

Accepting the existence of a fascination of madness from which any interrogation and the multitude of responses arise, we must accept, as well as the incursions into a possible eclectic imagination, a certain conditioning: we become attentive only to what responds to the needs of our nature. But at the same time, we can speak of maintaining consciousness in the patterns of another reality, alternatively or parallel, as a kind of unity of science to be the only way to decipher the complexity of the world.

Leadership: Can you introduce new configuration parameters in the "safe" system of your knowledge, based on the determined value of the extended projection of reason?

Which far exceeds even the most refined way of human understanding, that art of processing revelations, can become a catalyst of producing the future, a catalyst for a more complex identity, by highlighting the relationship between advanced knowledge and abstract intelligence. Or more specifically, the relationship between the idea that becomes representative on the physical plane and its means of sustaining a future of lucid assumption of a new status, by substantiating the delivery options of reality.

Here leadership indicates something other than an advanced process of thinking through which the characteristics of exceeded limits are identified by the force of a knowledge born out of imagination. It indicates that perception of separation between the source and center of the reality that represents you and the proximity to a reality that can only be known scientifically, more a priori. It indicates that intimate understanding of your role as a leader in the context of a model of advancement, placed under the control of intuitive reasoning, achieving through this new meanings of self-discovery and self-cultivation.

Introducing new configuration parameters in the "safe" system of your knowledge, based on the determined value of the extended projection of reasoning, is tantamount to sketching a new picture of reality, turned with one eye towards something new from the future, without negatively affecting your way of processing information, maximally using all those traits of intellect that, being truly useful to development, can turn you into an example of exceptionality.

The revelation of the "madness" that keeps you agitated is similar to the immersion in an imaginary that places the Ego in the context of an intrigue loaded with matter, a reason that is made safer and higher by the support it receives from the belief in the existence of another reality.

The Imminence of a Higher Revelation highlights the attempt to escape from a confusing present, lacking perspective. It's an excuse to conveniently make the connection between knowledge, wisdom and creation to shape the future – a fact which supports your potential of transforming into an agent of change.

The Impenetrable From A Time Without Orbits

On March 16, 2014

Evaluate your leadership potential from the perspective of the side effects of the science you own, so that you go beyond the boundaries of your own being.

To my astonishment, a stubborn fact remains inexplicable and I couldn't figure it out no matter what I did. A simple question could not find its answer, intensely creating a feeling of absurdity, a complementary interdependence between reason and instinct, between reality and imagination. After everything I tried to build for a life time, after everything I tried to explain through my own scientific recipe, the question still lingered. With a continuous negative impact.

Everything was closing within me, significantly, in the anxiety that the fervor and madness, gathered together in a single hour of rest, were fertilized by the arbitrary findings of the overwrought mind that lost contact with the reality of the soul, somehow attached to the heavy world of scientific accumulations from which it felt it had to flee.

I felt inferior in the face of a presumed rival, in the face of a strange fact, unexpected, pondering all the No's that cleaved any presumed answer, for reason and logic had disappeared around me altogether. As if I had to probe the depth of an ocean with a rope at the end of which a granite boulder was attached. I couldn't reach the bottom and I could only, with great difficulty, pull the weight back, without understanding anything from what I was to understand.

And the question so simple, so natural as any other, constantly hit my brain, creating the effect of a gong that pierces time, producing a high-frequency vibration, a disturbing resonance that begged to be experimentally verified. Bewildered, the mind stopped giving my any scientific explanation. For between the information carrying wave and the power of deduction capable to use the before mentioned information, a certain saturation pressure was being produced.

Leadership: Can you build a compelling picture of the relationship between life and fidelity to experience high vibration consciousness that keeps you in suspense, as can be expressed in a context such as "I'm lost in my own world"?

So how do you measure your daily experiences? Is it time to point the spotlight at your worthy "rival", at the meanings you attribute to your work? Do they create an intense feeling of absurdity that constantly haunts you, warning you about excessive accumulation of ideas that can transform into frustrations?

The writers who through their experiences have come to give life meaning, can discern beyond the reality invisible to others, one which they host within their thoughts, dealing equally with the things they love and those they fear.

And this reality, understood and capitalized through knowledge, over an indefinite period of time, in the sense of satisfying needs of self-realization, can only be perceived in a certain way. And can answer many questions whose fine coating dissipates slowly over the long revelations that help them better know themselves.

One of the attributes of this kind of life experience, when you are faced with a strange fact, unexpected, then reason and logic seem to completely disappear around you, is the feeling that your own consciousness has extended beyond the boundaries of the Ego. This is the moment in which unrest settles in, the one that stops you from reaching your potential, lowering the yield and productivity of your work. The moment you reach the stage of stagnation, dangerous for the development of leadership, and begin to make useless efforts, because you no longer see the progress that you've gotten used to in the beginning.

Leadership: Must you have an understanding of the reality sought in the logic of an interrogative horizon to build a self-revealing model capable of highlighting the mechanisms of measuring the distressing feelings?

An interrogative horizon aims to continually spot what you wrongly think about yourself. It is the way to demonstrate that you are motivated and interested in changing the life experience factors with a certain amount of unknown that always leads to a new attitude of astonishment in the face of a world we have forgotten that we carry in us: the realm of fantasy.

The Romanian writer Lucian Blaga remarked well: "The sense of reality has been given us to guide us, but also to make our wonder possible in the face of reality's unbelievability."

Is it necessary to focus your cognitive efforts towards new identities of self-expression? Is it necessary to hastily head towards a harmonization with yourself?

The question needing resolve comes from an experience derived from the interaction with the new conquests of the science of leadership. And it represents the signal of an incomprehensible mess that can complete turn upside down your whole very well established experience in the field in which you believe you know everything.

What lie is within a truth?

This question launches the idea of reformulating all conceptions of high-level practice of science that claim a systematic and comprehensive research, in the sense of determining the efficiency level of your abilities, with the ultimate goal of revealing the connection between introspection and self-evaluation. This connection can create harmony or, conversely, disharmony with your own being.

The measure of the distress that affects you is given by the factor of separation between what contains you in excess (a state of uncertainty on your individuality) and what rejects you from the space of a reality that you fail to master.

Are you driven by a thinking too convoluted to be able to handle the higher level of the understanding of existence?

The Impenetrable From A Time Without Orbits expresses that possible stagnation in the upward evolution of a leader, caused by the inefficiency of actions generated by the mind unprepared for the key questions science places in its hands, limiting them to the areas that he does not understand.

The Impenetrable Mystery Of Fate's Ponderings

On April 11, 2014

Adjust man's moral and spiritual height with great precision, to cancel his status as a weak player.

It's only a personal opinion here. But to say everything we think, we believe that Jean Valjean, in the mood he was in when he started to love Cosette, needed this refreshment to not stray from the path of good again. He had the opportunity to see human wickedness and the misery of society in many aspects, fragmented aspects and which, undoubtedly, only showed one part of the truth. Other sorrows overcame him. Disgust and fatigue again laid hold of him.

*Who knows whether Jean Valjean was about to lose courage and collapse again? He loved and felt strong again. Alas, not even he was more sure of himself than Cosette ! He offered her his support, and she gave him her strength. Through him, she managed to make her way in life. Through her, he managed to remain a good man. He guided her steps. She brightened his days. Oh, divine and impenetrable mystery of fate's ponderings ! **

Leadership: What kind of person would you be if you didn't know the shadow of life, referring to a of differentiating yourself from your old personality model through the effect of a special event due to destiny?

Cold reconstitution of the "lost" world that man faced, of these troubled times that required complicated and painful choices, in terms of uniqueness, but especially of the resistance only the soul can measure, in an unspoken record, but both assumed and accepted, reinforces the present and exalts it. Jean Valjean's destiny suited the encounter of a so-called villain with the soul of an innocent child, which determined the force of the action to allow things to happen based on a higher reason, that reason of being able to interpret the past through a plus of meaning in a glorious present.

Leadership aims at changing oneself in a framework of rejecting any guilt or tension, motivating that unquenchable thirst to control the reality of a new approach to life. It is a reflection of our moral and spiritual height, maximum or minimum of man, due to separating from the past, to which he can get in the stage of evolution.

Leadership is a central nucleus, made of imperfect matter, which will become energy, coming towards you from other directions. A light energy that makes you open yourself to life after having gone through many trials and experiences. For it is very had to get attached to a mode of "being" to motivate yourself, after your thinking has been altered by a position of inferiority, by the status of the weak "player" that you believed you were on the playing field of life.

What kind of man would you be if you didn't know the shadow of life, the history of the past? For only because of it can you see things as they are, as a whole, more in depth, more advanced than if you don't accept your concern for it.

And this shadow, felt through its direct effects that it spreads over the whole horizontal line of life, blowing over your own nature and over your own reality with the strength of a hurricane for which no barriers exist, only consequences, leads to total dependence on another variable, such as attachment to a special person. Which, in turn, generates a superior power, a clearer vision, covered with gentleness and light, which overlaps your initial duties and goals.

Leadership: Can you reform yourself through energy transfer at the level of change of the whole state of mind in a context like "Remind yourself in all those things that weren't supposed to happen"?

But who can demonstrate his quality and originality of the model of leadership through the opportunity presented to the player to take on an active role in the script of life?

Just when you're about to lose your courage and crash forever, something or someone puts you on your feet, becoming the master of the form embodied within you, the spark of genius that gives meaning to your new identity. It reforms your relationship with life under other terms, in the immediate vicinity of leadership that truly develops the collaborative spirit.

This means that you have reformed after the negotiation between a partial agreement with life, based on an oppressive past, and one totally connected to the present that you live through a "transfer of energy" towards something or someone, that brings you fulfillment.

Leadership captures that reason of the existence of being able to interpret the past correctly, in the light of the fact that you are able to forget that you were once able to do something beyond your dignity and conscience.

Man has the moral right to reform, to rectify himself, even when his only guilt is due to the fate that prevents happiness from achieving its purpose.

The Impenetrable Mystery Of Fate's Ponderings reflects that form of knowledge beyond understanding, only with an accumulation of trends, contained in specific cases, produced without the help of reason, but only in a spiritual way, which develops the sense of joy that completes man and his reality.

The Impenetrable Of Dante's Inferno

On March 01, 2014

Establish a better relationship with yourself in an imaginary reality that will help you become more aware of your mental endowments.

I have always imagined that I am one step ahead of time, thinking ahead of any physical size, making the most of all my existing resources on a land that is part of a dream about God. But somehow, I was struck by the uncertainty of an impossible reality. I reached the position of Professor Otto Lidenbrock of Jules Verne's work that attempted to deepen and strengthen his knowledge of the dark underworld, always deviating from the natural forward direction chosen by his companions. Living the restlessness and wandering, always waiting, always delayed.

Was it not Aristotle who said that in the belly of the earth, lead and all other ordinary materials eventually turn to gold? SO, I had to fight the impossible, woven into a unique conglomerate of doubt, true and false clues, concentrated around a quantity of unsuspected resources of knowledge. Meaning the definitive end of the link touched tangentially with the unexplored reality that continuously spilled its drops of mystery, as it was forming. Thoughts of this kind consumed me constantly.

The only reality that held me captive in a kind of image of a primordial universe, as in a kind of trance, was that I was seeing myself in a completely unknown place, but endowed with many magical virtues, a generator of wonders, of special laws and rules, of eternities stuck in immutable archetypes. This reality, one that you cannot avoid in a permanent quest to model time, in order to discover many other truths about life, is projected above anything enigmatic in a "then" that has ceased to be "now".

Leadership: Does your access to a new form of truth involve a substantial investment in the possibility of making a comparison between what you encounter with the influence of an enigmatic character and what is beyond your preconceived ideas?

I felt that, in one leap, I had turned back on the timeline with many centuries, increasing the ambitions related to the known of unknowns, like a scientist that, armed with increasingly effective research methods, succeed in penetrating beyond the appearance of objects and phenomena, sensing properties and connections often unapparent. It is strange how some people manage to rise above the coexisting phenomena of the real world only through a continuous exercise of imagination and living shared through the clear and sharp conscience, processed through the filter of a bookish memory of the best quality.

Inexorably, my curiosity of investigating the impenetrable of Dante's Inferno deepened, but with the firm measure of my own beliefs and prejudices. While the intensity of the thinking I was consuming in the attempt of acceding to the elements of novelty that were struggling awry in the chiaroscuro of a world abusively dispossessed by its properties and concentrations, creating the optical illusion of a subtended space, could be measured starting from absolute zero.

The truthfulness given to a great idea about the human essence lies in what you are capable of representing in the plane of a higher expectation from life, from the perspective of an inspiring vision. I was no longer just an anonymous passer through the world, the strange image of a being living through automatisms, the expression of a retained, discrete personality. But rather the reflection of the entire knowledge of a universe full of mysteries that the other researchers in the field tried with great difficulty to observe and, as much as they could, understand it.

Leadership: Can you clarify the useful meanings for maximizing the quality of what you want to convey, by referring to a creation of great scope that you have forged in order to set the rules for a new way of approaching a change of perspective?

When you feel close to a reality of a higher order, opener of new perspectives, whose shadow falls freely upon the whiteness of the fragile intention of assimilating new knowledge and experiences, things seem less striking, they no longer penetrate within you as deeply, losing a lot of their steadiness. And it is gratifying to look like you're clearing up what was only meant to be cleared up partially or not at all.

Whenever you reach a new level of knowledge by accessing a set of information that could lead to a change of perspective, you think: "I will not accept to go back to the old battlefront with what I had ingrained in me, in my mind. I will defect."

And, indeed, not only are you under the impression that you are teleporting into a world that seems unreal because you find out certain hidden aspects, unravel certain unknowns, gain access to certain revelations that elude even the most knowledgeable researchers in the field at first sight. Moreover, you attribute a certain ability of analysis and self-analysis to yourself, treating information in a constructive way and focused on questions, using analyzers of the "If-Then-Else" type. Discerning the meanings of complex correlations and offering useful explanations for maximizing the quality of what you want to convey.

Setting the rules for a new way of approaching a change of perspective means adapting to the requirements of a reality that, no matter how much you want to be aware of it, no matter how you try to avoid it, you still lose your "head" in it.

As a leader, you must develop your ability to discern precisely the sense that you seek to communicate, quantifying and reproducing the complexity of reality. And to play it faithfully without questioning the validity of the assumptions and arguments that you build in order to introduce a new way of thinking. A creation of great scope includes the reasons for why you are willing to take the measure of the things you value when you want to set the rules for a new way of approaching a change of perspective.

Thoroughly examine what you really are, the unknowns that are part of your own Ego, to discern the useful meanings of maximizing leadership quality. By better knowing yourself, unraveling the unseen aspects of what you are and of what you want to become, you will be able to crystallize your motivations and intentions in correlation with the reality in which you live and with the others' system of thinking.

Leadership means giving the image of an objective reality that gives the impression of novelty, even if it is just a figment of your imagination.

The Impenetrable Of Dante's Inferno symbolizes that aspects of relating with yourself, in an imaginary reality that helps you become more aware of your mental endowments. From the instinctive desire of possessing a better capacity of discerning and correctly interpreting the reality you experience, with ease and maximum results. Which is important to present and openly impose to others.

The Imperceptible Cry Of A Heart Possessed By The Spirits Of A Desolate World (II)

On January 10, 2014

Focus on what makes you special, pleading for the assumption of what happens to you in a reality that escapes the full understanding of the moment.

Instead of bursting into an uncontrolled reaction of anger, Marie increases her powers of understanding Jason, fighting fiercely to defeat his phobias and to convince him of the veracity of her feelings – she never casts him away from her. Moreover, she goes against the apparent dangerous elements of his nature, getting to know him based on two essential aspects of his – patience and strength of character, which are predicted at a deep level.

Jason refuses to remember the past, but predicts a good chunk of what had happened to him before the tragic accident.

The chemistry catches you and won't let go. Marie puts all her emotions into play. The convergence radius of the series of untouched inner powers moves towards the pillar of Bourne's identity, reaching that fragile element constituted by low self-confidence. Her influence tends not only towards creating a mixture of moods and feelings around which he can gravitate, but to obtain a solid inner stability through intensity. And this intensity needs to be fueled by the most subtle of vibrations that can instantaneously trigger a reaction of solidarity, that chemistry that catches you and won't let go.

"I'm fighting for my life ! For our lives ! You can think and feel, Jason ! Come on, think ! Feel ! Feel now ! Look at me and tell me you looked within yourself and you know without a doubt that you are an assassin. If you can't, then stay with me and let me help you. And love me ! For God's sake, love me, Jason ! "

The heart of the woman immediately sounds the alarm when the flames of despair taken all the way to paroxysm rise above the weaknesses of the man next to her. Only now the intermediary dimension of her nature – the will of acumen – can be taken into consideration, measuring new values.

Your reaction to events you cannot control depends on how you relate to the suffering that others feel in your presence.

The version of what makes a man special is a continuation of the reaction he has in the face of a reality that escapes the full understanding of the moment. To realize this moment means letting yourself get carried away through a whole experience of the senses, emotions, thoughts, which seem to be more vivid in the equation of the reaction of decomposing a reality of factors of rejection or attraction.

Who wants to know the true measure of his abilities of accelerating the development of those around him is invited to gaze upon a stage in which souls, completely different from one another, evolve in the complexity of a world recreated as a unified whole. The whole of a mindset that resides in the vivid tones of a part of the need of sharing, communicating and expressing their feelings: "I fight for my life ! For our lives ! "

There have always been profound communications and creative collaborations between consciousness and reality, between senses and reason, between functionality and harmony, between the two constants "to struggle" and "to stop the pain"– and the duty of the leader is to sprinkle them with plenty of enthusiasm and living conviction.

Leadership: Does your spiritual wealth rise to the justification created by the projection of a feeling of "being under pressure", under the constraint of a self-image that others regard as the test of an unusual sensibility?

How many efforts, how much enthusiasm must man show in the understanding of the most hidden of things about the self, before evaluating others and putting himself in their place? This is the question on which depends the intersecting of leadership with the reality lived by the individual, often perceived in an intangible way.

He who wants to assess leadership, through the perspective of an analysis of man's personalization tendencies, must pursue the acknowledged existence of real proportions of transmission of peculiarities from his functional structure. Just as the capacity of opening up to an ulterior truth that will be able to explain the meaning of life, or the capacity of trusting a different consciousness and obeying it.

The self-image is the reflection of what you convey to others by your way of being, through words and gestures, when they see you as a better version of themselves.

To singlehandedly decipher the map of man, entering the world full of meanings and emotions that establish his rule of functioning, is the first step towards discovering that reality of a surprising complexity, comparable to an ergonomic light bulb that flashes until it reaches the optimum temperature, after which it stabilizes and works under normal operating parameters.

Capturing those intensities, feelings lived with sincerity and expressed casually by man throughout your whole incursion into the psychology of his personality (hard to describe because it constantly changes) you will be able to move the double inner resource that gives color to his life and at the same time leads him to a professional triumph.

This resource, on the one hand offers man confirmation of the direction of development. On the other hand it enables man to bring to fulfilment, through all that he lives and feels, as natural as flowers and trees bloom in spring, that ideal harmony that can guide him on the winding paths of the ever challenging existence.

The sensitivity of a leader is measured by the self-sacrifice made in the name of other important life requirements, namely the experience of experiencing the suffering of others as a stage necessary to become a stronger person.

The Imperceptible Cry of The Heart Possessed by The Spirits of A Desolate World signifies that imperious desire, doubled by a strong will to induce benefic changes in the way of thinking and acting of mankind, in pursuit of common ideals.

He was right, the one who said: "Self-identity is reduced to a story that you always feel the need to say in your mind: Me and my story – in moments of lucidity."

To perceive the cry for help of man subjected to the effect of loss of self-identity, put into play all your feelings and try to generate an emotional reaction to invigorate his mood.

The Imperceptible Cry Of A Heart Possessed By The Spirits Of A Desolate World (I)

On January 10, 2014

Carefully explore the unknown within man, in order to find that inner world within him that can give free rein to his individuality's reunification.

"Who the hell do you think you are?" shouts Marie Jacques with an anxious voice, struck by thousands of feelings, stinging like fine needles, firmly planted in the rustling body. But can they unblock the latent energy circuits that operate in disharmony within the man she loves?

"I am a man who kills people for money. Governments want me dead. Canadians want me dead. And so does Carlos. Think about that ! " answers Jason Bourne, disoriented by an uncertain past, full of error and darkness, where none can enter anymore, not even himself. So many efforts, so much determination he pots into understanding the hidden things about himself.

But the determined woman has within the pocket of her heart a map of the man, a world full of meanings and emotions, along with its operating rule. Only she knows love in its most noble form, the pure part of it, infinite, which requires sacrifice and mercy. Only the woman who is truly loving can perceive the high-pitched cry of a soul that battles darkness, and the spirits of a desolate world. Only she holds the key to Bourne's inner transformation. But in order for his transformation to be complete and fully lived with all the senses, with all conviction, the vital source of all energies, hopes and aspirations, directed with precision, must generate a positive reaction.

All these forces of intervention that can balance the soul of a man casted by the past into a confusing space, impossible to control, are found within herself, in strict proportions, beneficial ones. They can neutralize flammable agents, any outburst, any anxiety, any sadness, any misgiving and any pain, only if it moves the inner resource – the strength of his soul.

Leadership: Can you prove the value of your emotional intelligence at a defining moment of life that fits into your evolution as a painful simulation of an expanding tragedy?

The emotional intelligence Marie Jacques proved was the ability to make a correlation between what she knew about Jason Bourne's life and what was left forbidden to find out in a moment of distress without letting herself be intimidated by the effects of a possible tragedy. So, emotional intelligence is closely linked to the decision you are about to take with a life-threatening risk when everything you experience in the middle of events has a great echo in another person's soul.

At one of the webinars I said that, in order to understand leadership, you have to step farther and farther into the garden full of spiritual temptations, to follow the evolution of future seeds of human transformation, to provide greater understanding of false values, to recognize what gives color to inclinations, to sprinkle a lot of light over existential anxieties. To observe the existing differences in the way a personality is formed, to decode the energy that allows the development of self-consciousness. To properly treat every part of the inner resources that shape human manifestation conditions, those that are or that are not felt.

After that you have to take a shovel and dig as many evenly spaced holes as possible so as not to overlap the two tendencies independent in principle, of isolation or integration. And in each of these holes pour in abundance, with a strong motivation, many senses and meanings. So that, amid the intensive work with your own beliefs, you can stabilize the soil surface which adversely affects fertility of the resources necessary to the rentability of the moral capital of social relationships.

And this is possible only through an intense action of renewing the most relevant and useful characteristics of becoming human, preventing the erosion of personal liberties of thought, feeling and acting according to self needs, inclinations, self-interests that play an essential role in the efficient managing of his whole functioning potential.

Who wants to understand leadership by exploring a broader human psychology, which is measured often by sharing pain or joy, must self-address that profound identification of the man with a specific cause, which doesn't necessarily have an end, remaining a solitary outburst.

Who wants to develop a leadership that relies on the high pillars of deep human knowledge, must embark on a search for the identity that says: "Do not worship a reality from which vision and your influence over it was omitted."

The Imperceptible Cry of A Heart Possessed by The Spirits of a Desolate World is that manifestation of pain caused by a wandering that leads man to wrong assessments of the situations he finds himself in and over the potential of assuming his own identity.

The Implicit Advantages Of A Nonconformist Mind

On July 11, 2014

Ensure the quality demanded by the high standards of a new form of individualization of scientific construction, following the assimilation process of concrete reality.

Eisenstein really tried to make a real American film in America. In order to know New York life, the director moves to the noisiest street in the city, in a hotel on Broadway. From here he starts exploring the city. As usual, he perceives the surrounding reality not only with his mind, but with all of senses. He opens up all the antennas and only then he lucidly filters the acquired sensations.

He follows street movement. At first sight, to him everyone seems focused on their own things, on multiple and urgent concerns that create that intense pace. He follows people's feet on the street. This pace appears to be hectic. He then moves his gaze to their faces and with astonishment discovers great concern, a marked anxiety. He focuses on the eyes of the passerby's: in them he deciphers uncertainty. A montage, thus, involuntary, but expressive: feet-face-eyes. And thus, he senses the contradiction of a world.

*Following the assimilation process of an unprecedented reality, discovered by Eisenstein, we can see another mechanism of the rational transformation of sensations. They are the cases in which immediate experience becomes the mobile of a theoretical meditation over certain unprecedented aspects.

Leadership: Can you explore the conceptual dimension of an art that has many constraints, stemming from objective reality which keeps you in the area of observing the surrounding world?

Immediate experience is not just the mobile of a theoretical meditation, but is also a great investigative tool in achieving scientific constructions through which we can ensure a better correlation between different models of perception of matter and methods of valuing future innovative elements. And these elements are likely to apply in what regards the fulfillment of any conceptual shortcomings.

In simpler words, you cannot create a new concept or a new installation of elements required to start a broader science if your experience does not prove the existence of new aspects, not captured by others, but that reflect a concrete reality. The experience of observing the surrounding world resembles an artist's attempt to create a wonderful work of various cultural materials and ensembles with a symbolic load, without waiting for material gain immediately, but only focusing on what gives it a note of novelty and multiple importance.

To ensure the required quality of the high standards of a new form of individualization of the scientific construct, filtering lucid tendencies, images, impulses, emotions or thoughts of a world outside your control, is to explore the conceptual dimensions of an art that has many constraints, stemming from objective reality.

Putting your whole creation above what reality reflects, maintained by the sensitivities of a modern lucidity that places thinking into a special, high sphere, you will be able to more easily approach what is essential in the formation of a new style of leadership.

Leadership: Do the means of investigation that underlie your science, equally serve to strengthen the link between experience, discovery, application and modeling?

At what level and how must you act and what means must you use in order for this whole called "Man" to not suffer due to the inability of adapting to the new?

The creative elements of added value, appropriate to a context of self-discovery and development, should be chose carefully, inventoried and brought to homogeneity. This is so that your power of analysis and the means of investigation underlying your science, to serve in equal measure to strengthen the link between experience, discovery and applicability of new concepts and modeling of a new mode of action.

Leadership is the result of a broader understanding over the applicability of new thought patterns, coordinated by a constant adaptation to the requirements and needs of science. And this understanding oscillates between two fronts. First, the duty to gain valuable experience from the perception of the external world. Second, the need to transform the various facets of this world in a powerful experimental arsenal and implement an experimental montage for a prototype of a "system of direction" within the manifestation of a new dimension of consciousness.

Knowing the world by observing and perceiving its course coincides with the attempt to define a new science based on the relationship between everything surrounding you in relation to the mutual existence of things to one another through a promise to guarantee the ability to produce new perspectives of handling creation.

The Implicit Advantages Of A Nonconformist Mind bring to the fore those aspects unexplored and sometimes not captured, related to the impact on people, the requirements to implement new outstanding modes of actions, consistent with the standards imposed by the present day, but echoing into the future of tomorrow.

The Importance Of A Leader's Vision

On December 22, 2012

Express your vision, so that to induce people acting into its spirit.

I want to start this article with reference to an old joke.

A ship flounders.

A passenger is approaching while swimming to the captain and asks him:

- Captain, how much we have to swim to the nearest land?

- Three miles - answers the captain.

- In which direction?

- Downwards !

Leadership: Can you determine your attitude to be consistent with a vision that moves the meaning of events "from the top down" without giving definitive and all-encompassing explanations of what is not working?

The joke that I told you highlights very well not only the leader's attitude, but also his vision. Establishing the vision depends on your leadership's fund of responsibility.

Some uncertainty in establishing the vision, which depends on your leadership's fund of responsibility, the lack of strong contrasts between your personality and the flair that you have developed over the years, as well as the indifference towards the intensity of the feelings of those around you, are the sign of a reduction in your level of thinking and approach to the delicate situations (or rather difficult) with which you are facing.

Just as the doctor makes some specialized blood tests to his patient in order to find out exactly the disease from which he suffers, so you - must start in the search of your own hidden capacities, and then develop them, to fully exploit them, and finally to use them in order to achieve the proposed objectives.

Do you set up the direction to be followed straight ahead or downwards?

Leadership is given by the distance that separates you from the land, not by the depths of the ocean.

Someone said that a relationship is like a ship that goes out to sea. While the leadership, I would add, is given by the distance that separates you from the land, not by the depths of the ocean, setting up your direction to be followed - straight ahead, not downwards, but neither upwards - towards the "sunset". The accentuated shades that compose your leadership and that are an extension of your attitude and personality helps you act on the virtue of all you feel, of all you believe that is under those beliefs that help you achieve your true potential.

Do you integrate awkwardly those initiatives worthy of an "underdeveloped" leadership?

A leader who integrates awkwardly, in the term of his planned or spontaneous actions, those initiatives worthy of an underdeveloped leadership – namely those initiatives that do not meet sufficient moral and spiritual support, that leader is not called to lead. He will never succeed to apply the networks used by the real masters in the art of influence, namely those who master the science of leadership with an amazing ability.

The vision is based on the convictions that we have acquired during the life, which limits or gives us strength, which supports or pulls us down, which motivates or demotivates us. The vision is the one that sets the tone in terms of leadership and personal development; it helps us achieve our true potential, allowing us to grow in a steady and natural pace, through the maximum efficiency of our own internal resources and mechanisms.

Leadership: Is risky thinking the "distance" that separates you from other people, even if you are not ready to activate your courage in difficult situations?

1. What distance separates you away from the other people? 2. Through what exactly is making noticed this distance, what does it indicate? Does it indicate your inability to see the horizon from the distance, and your incapacity to indicate the best direction? Is this distance indicating how poorly you are connecting to people?

3. Does your attitude help you act by virtue of what you feel, of what you believe, or is one of resignation, which obviously will have a negative turn? 4. By virtue of what convictions you build and impose your influence?

I want you to know that depending on your answers to these questions you will be able to measure your leadership. Obviously, it will take some time to reflect, but the answers are very, very important.

Leadership: Do you allow your beliefs to be influenced by the behavior of others because you can't consciously control the process they go through?

Therefore, leadership acquires a fundamental importance through the intensity of emotions, of the human feelings, which consolidates our vision. If I would made a comparison, for your better understanding of the vision’s importance is, well, I would say that vision is like a “mailbox” - always announcing us of something related to the direction we follow in our lives, in our business, and in our social and professional relationships.

According to the messages contained by this mailbox, we will better shape our own identity, our own qualities, prioritizing our actions for building the near and far future.

Are you looking at a door without having the courage to open it?

How is that possible to practice a leadership by looking at a door without having the courage to open it? For, yes, that door is nothing but the vision that meets you when you start the road. If your leadership is below the minimum limit of your own capacities of orientation, so if the vision with which you fill up your performance does not match the true reality, and if it does not denote more eloquently the beliefs, principles, and the ideology that you sustain and promote, then you will always situate yourself away from your proposed objectives. You will remain nothing more than a traveler who is in a constant search, which wanders from one station to another.

Leadership: Is it your intention to convey a vision that does not highlight your faith in a reality that requires many compromises?

A vision which is intended to be efficient raises your morale, and does not pull you downwards. Have it ever happened to you having a vision where you see yourself?

I think that is not useless to dwell on this point of view and to analyze if it can be supported in the case where the vision it is not clear or well-defined, or if it cannot come within the state of need that people have to take into account. It is not in the intention of the leader to convey a vision that does not highlight very-well the great belief that he has in it, because it would be risky and almost ridiculous, this thing being able to darken his performance. Hence, from this angle, it is necessary to stop and judge and the leadership practiced by the leader. And what we find?

A vision, which is intended to be efficient, raises your morale, and does not pull you downwards. Hence, it is up to your duty as a leader, or as a future leader, to strive in improving your image about you and your leadership, for reinvigorating the people around you and raising their expectations, inoculating in them constant hope.

Leadership means allowing compromises to manifest in a reality that urges alertness and caution, on all dimensions of the personality-building activity that can push you forward.

The Importance Of A Leader's Vision can be seen in the critical moments, when he must quickly make a decision approving the cancellation of the "resignation" that can be seen in the evasive behavior of people.

The Importance Of Leadership

On July 15, 2016

Confer relevance to leadership due to the method of inserting an image into a context-message which can be modified using the option Reduce/Enlarge.

The film is made thoroughly. Except for the pivotal unity of the characters found in the foreground, the rest of the figures are always grouped in a deliberate symmetrical order, or, rather blatantly asymmetrical. Director and film critic Jean Miltry gives an example in this sense: if a tower is found in the foreground and three steps in the background, then there will be three characters in the tower and one on the steps.

*The grouping of characters always follows a linear graphical trajectory or a geometric figure. Miltry and Gaston Bounoure even distinguish geometric figures precisely corresponding to certain feelings or mental states: aggressiveness, defense, authority... These artistic compositions are always created for the purpose of a more intense significance of the content shown. The making of a film is not a free game. **

Leadership: Do you explore experimental combinations in order to create the immortalizing moment of a unique reality from the plastic composition of a collage built around a single noble idea?

As you discover which are the forms of manifestation of a continuous resource's content, of information or image, of promoting a concept or an idea that triggers the key sequences of an amazing production, you begin your own exploration of experimental combinations.

Only one noble idea places the director on the crossroads between modern innovation and the appreciated traditional show: treating the characters based on the comparison with the behavior of the surrounding elements, which leads to effects such as: explosions, fires, collisions, background or foreground changes, etc.

These experimental combinations are the result of a creative thinking based on a subtle form of spatial arrangement of the reference elements of an image: the background, the foreground and middle-ground, whose produced effects determine the focus, the visual impact, the immortalizing moment of a unique reality.

The artistic composition of a collage is a processed reproduction of the outer world by the combination of the surrounding elements which must act according to the principle of "harmony", the principle of "symmetry" or according to the principle of "mirroring".

Due to the positioning in the area of experimental combinations, following the interesting formula that "if a tower is found in the foreground and three steps in the background, then there will be three characters in the tower and one on the steps", you may resort not only to that part of the theory of producing new presentational themes of a distinct subject, but rather a way of reconstructing an image from fragments, from several pieces. This procedure – a sort of editing – aims to the assessment of the capacity of visual perception.

Regarding leadership, similarly, you cannot restore an image out of composing parts after a model, without giving it a certain shape or certain points of reference. The more the reference points are grouped around an axis, some closer and some farther away, the stronger the connection is and the visual intensity increases.

Leadership is a unique format of representing the production called "reality" thanks to the way of approaching various expressed themes in the image crafted by the director. And it is relevant due to the method of inserting an image in a context-message which can be modified using the option Reduce/Enlarge.

The way in which the visual perception of an image is achieved is related to the grouping of the characters in a certain typology and in a certain situation, as well as the selection of the expressions that outline their character traits, in order to achieve a deeper understanding of the latent content of a real life scenario.

The importance of leadership is given by the image the director crafts and projects unto the world, formed from individual elements. He who takes part in the "Leadership" construction becomes conditioned to forge a unique vision due to the existing image on the entirety of its display surface, erupting in a combination of elements in the foreground and in the distance.

The Importance Of The Human Factor

On April 01, 2009

Learn to make the right choices at key times, so you do not have to expose yourself to the consequences of the outcome that you cannot ignore.

It hadn't been raining for two years; the Nile's waters were almost drought out. The consequences of the drought were very severe: there were no grain, there was no food. The people who were working at the construction of the pyramid were more and more tired; they were suffering because of the starvation and were announcing a rebellion. The worker's messengers said to the Majesty that they will not work anymore, because they are too weak to handle the big stones.

"We will all have patience" was the pharaoh answer. Even though he wanted so much that the great pyramid to be finished as fast as it could, Keops decided that people should stop working until it rained. Then, he opened the royal treasure and sold a lot of jewels in order to buy grains from Canaan and Kharu. He also sacrificed some of the temple and royal domain cattle's so that he could ensure the food needs of the population.

Leadership: Do you accept your tendency to dominate a world according to the level of price acceptability that you set regarding the perceptions of quality influenced by the values on which the Personal Brand is built?

The more a man has, the more he wants. This adage carries a grain of truth, but it does not come true for everybody. Keops was a powerful pharaoh, good and correct who cherished the human being. Putting the people above everything, even above his greatest dream - the dream to build an enormous pyramid, to last for centuries, Keops commanded to stop working until the Nile's waters will rise again. Thus, what mattered to him, first of all, were the people, so that it won't shy of a thing and that it would rise in the world.

Unlike other leaders, who fallowed their interests, Keops got involved in the internal problems of his country, paying a special attention to develop the human and economic factor. In order to win his people by his side, he was concerned about the way people are living. And in case of a crisis, he had the power to sell even from his part of treasure in the use of his people. With certainty, Keops represents a worthy example to follow for all the managers, politicians and presidents from the whole world.

Keops' price of quality perceptions influenced by the values upon which he had built his personal "Brand" was due to his concern with all the transformations his country had undergone, the utility with which he acted for a common cause, the rarity with which he was willing to make some oases appear in the desert. Above all, the price was given by the financial equivalent of the resources spent on the timely purchase of the food.

Leadership: Can you conclude a compromise between what is seen, what is not foreseen, and all the things projected by a reality that you will not escape by ignoring it?

If you don't consider the human factor, it's unlikely that you obtain fast and efficient results. One of the reasons because a lot of companies don't manage to climb the top is because managers don't communicate efficiently with the employees and they don't manage to build a performant way of working. Instead of determining the employees to have a cooperative attitude, stimulating them in building a career, some managers trace some targets and give orders without thinking at the needs, the pretences and the aspirations of their employees.

The fact that certain work skills can tire the people doesn't affect at all some managers, who many times ask for the impossible and they are also displeased that the employees are not productive, are not interested and they are very little involved in the company activities.

People are active part of any company, and the managers have to count on their strong points to obtain good results. Also, people represents the most important source of increasing the profitability of a company and without it, the company could not function. It's clear why the most dynamic companies in the world give so much importance to the human factor and make all that is possible to form a professional team, who will be able to accomplish with devotion and responsibility the tasks they were given.

The responsibility with which you authentically define your Personal Brand depends on the skills you assume in unexpected situations that require insight, the making of quick decisions, a quick adaptation to difficult circumstances, prolonged effort and a speech worthy of a high status.

In conclusion: Leading a company has to stand on the human factor, to assure favourable working conditions, offering employees the possibility to remark themselves and to progress in their career based on their achievements.

Taking care about the people needs and maximizing their value are the most important aspects that a manager should have in mind, otherwise he will fail.

The Impostor

On December 18, 2023

How you perceive your self-image determines the value you place on your personal qualities.

During the defense of the bachelor's thesis, related to the language of new technologies, the people in the room suddenly hear an additional question addressed to the student in question, a question from a completely different field, with no connection to the topic discussed. It is a question from the artistic field, just like the next question, both questions being related to a certain painter and a certain current of painting. You may be wondering how the young lady knew how to answer so accurately, as if she had studied art for years at the Academy of Arts in Verona, and now she had defended her thesis in the field of painting.

In fact, the look hidden under the smoked glasses of the great teacher, fiercely directed at the other teachers in the commission, instantly reduces everyone to silence, to a gloomy and oppressive state. His blinding, hypnotizing, calculated look cuts through all other looks with a single blow, in an instant it renders impossible any potential critical voice, any moral observation. All the other members of the commission sit with their heads bowed, obedient, submissive before the master.

Leadership: Do you face a picture of reality where the horizon line separates courage from fear, just as contrast and gradations of hue in an artistic composition mark the difference between the visual image and its interpretation?

Through his smoky glasses, a laser beam flashes, cleaving and hard as a sword of fire, awakening a terrible horror in the eyes of those who have the courage to look at the Sphinx. And even if this guardian of hidden things can't see well with one eye, the electrical activity of his brain being used as an analytical tool in scanning the various units of value, well, the other eye is a veritable spring of force, a tension raised above 100V, being able to induce electrical activity in the neurons of those who try to react to contact with the modulated beam of his intent. When you target the opponent with the laser beam, if you hit them, they lose points or "die".

The teacher approves the answers with a single movement of the head, a sign that the student has a special general culture. Anyone have anything to comment on? The areas touched by the laser beam lose their electrical charges. Just like in the movie Horror Express, whoever dares to look into the devil's red eyes, risks having his eyes turned inside out, turning the uniform color of a deathly white. This authoritarian professor, the titan of vision beyond physical death, the beast with ten horns and seven heads, manages to frighten his colleagues on the licensing board so much that no one has the courage to intervene. No one opposes looking beyond the novelty of the experience.

Leadership: Can you increase your self-worth in the case of a success that is due to someone else's potential to manifest their authority?

The brain can create electrical impulses to transmit signals. Everyone present in the room immediately realized one thing: to any other question in the artistic field, even the most trivial question, the student would not have been able to answer. In other words, the majority immediately intuited that the questions had been "arranged" in advance, in a way similar to the way light stimuli or rhythmic variations of potential can reveal the secrets of the electrical activity of the nervous system of the questioned subject, so that it is revealed his vast knowledge. Without any comments, the student deserves a 10 (with congratulations).

Does anyone have the courage to challenge the great teacher's last word?

Just as in the neurological field, where brain biocurrents and potential oscillations play a crucial role, there are also subtle signals in this context, impulses that revealed the depth of the student's knowledge. As with the brain's potential oscillations, even the simplest questions could provide important clues about the student's accumulated knowledge, as the electrical rhythms of her brain could be recorded through facial expressions that indicated confident anticipation.

It was well seen that the student knew from the very beginning even the order of the questions that would be addressed to her, this spontaneous emotional activity presenting electrical phenomena triggered by the stimulation of internal and external sensitive receptors, proving great precision in expressing the answers.

Leadership: Can you express your inner states in front of an authoritative presence, in a closed and powerful space that you cannot control, so that you do not feel vulnerable?

Everything is under the sign of severity. With the professor, the exams are very difficult, the license must be worked with godly efforts if you want a good grade. Specially designed, written along the lines of a security structure, this fascist system based on the exploitation of stupidity and discrimination, is intended to cause students to add as much goodwill as possible to the pocket of severity, in order to become worthy of the esteem of the one who decides the final grade.

And only in this way, only if the light streams meet positive convergence points, then everything can become easier. In fact, it is a real honor to be under the guidance of the professor, because if you have proven yourself to be "illuminated" by the continuous light of a vision hidden under the curtain of neural polarization, a phenomenon known as the extended electrical potential in the synaptic network , then and only then will you gain deep understanding in the trigger area of success.

Leadership: How does the symmetry between you and your ideals help to create a sense of credibility capable of reinforcing the image of a beginning that lasts indefinitely?

For all of the above to be credible, a truth-triggering event must have occurred. Well, about a week after defending her bachelor's thesis, the eminent student, like many other laureates, takes part in an underground party, in the student dormitories. Cheerful beyond measure, with a lot of physical energy, she allows herself to be caught in the spell of another student, thus forming a special connection, fleeting - but unforgettable, according to the model of "a stormy night spent in two".

These two souls with similar heart structures, presenting a wave of continuous contact, with small repetitive oscillations of a thermal nature, then know their most hidden secrets. Drunk, without any inhibitions, the girl reveals to her new boyfriend how she managed to get a 10 in her bachelor's degree. More precisely, the way the money circulated, through an intermediary, and how it ended up in the professor's piggy bank. Nicknamed "The Chiorul", this obnoxious man with smoky glasses orchestrated everything perfectly. According to her, all she had to do was learn by heart the answers to the questions that were delivered to her in advance, like on a tray.

And, of course, her one-night stand told her other friends. And that's how everything was found out. But nobody said anything...

Who knows what to see, sees! That's how it is with all grade 10 students, former nerds from high school, their only way to stand out is the final average, the grade generating Magna Cum Laude. They would be willing to sell their car, their house, anything just to get a 10. And like any meritorious student, like any nerd, they all get lost early in the fog of time without leaving anything behind.

Leadership: Are the apologetics you make of your various postures presented in a ratio of apparent contrariety to the real picture that your own actions and behaviors reflect?

Let's go back to Mr. Professor, the crow, the one with the smokey glasses. Easy to recognize, if not by his face, at least by the omniscience he tries to show wherever he is. The former nerd born in a border village, where there wasn't even a country road, look what he does when he gets to the city. Like a true Mephistopheles, he implements his plan smeared with the antifreeze of vicissitudes, focused on derivations with high and sharp waves of gratitude: he appears to the world as omniscient. Wherever he is, when he meets someone, he resorts to the same trick every time: he directs the dialogue with the interlocutor towards the field of art, displaying here and there all kinds of information learned by heart from various art books.

Sly as a true criminal, he shows every passer-by that he has a fine mind, a mind inclined to the deepest and subtlest aspects. It's a ruse that works every time, and that propels him higher and higher on the hierarchical ladder. It is also through the parrot talent that he becomes a university professor, and from here he fools the other colleagues with his vast knowledge, obviously a knowledge that actually represents a superficial imitation, the justification of a supposed intelligence, because the nerd has only one quality: he memorizes everything and repeats the word in a word, everything he browsed through other books.

He has no creative capacity at all, he has nothing to do with inventors, discoverers, artists. In this case, in order to break into society, not to be just a no-name boy from the country, the parrot carefully uses his only quality, without anyone suspecting anything. Evrika! The plan goes great, everyone falls into this prankster's trap.

And when you reach a high position, when you start parroting in front of everyone something from all fields, and medicine, and accounting, and art, and politics, etc., then you become a person, stupid people start doing you all kinds of favors , feeling inferior in terms of knowledge. Everywhere else there are bowed heads, others deceived, willing to write books in the teacher's place, to do the work in his place, he only putting his signature on the work of others. He gives the final grade, that's all. Where the money comes, there he also becomes an expert overnight, of course by the same trick specific to the parrot, a trick that always works for fools.

Leadership: Does the way you acquire value reflect the inner state with which your experience of revealing yourself is more limited than your true identity?

But the crow does not know how to see the consequences of his actions. Because there is no truth that does not come to light, and no impostor escapes divine punishment. The place which divine judgment has reserved for you, all-knowing, is as dim as the smoky glasses behind which you kept your dark vision. You only knew how to see the darkness, propagate and disperse it through a prism due to progressive refraction, but you did not let the light penetrate this world. You always wore horse glasses...

What direction did you give to the grade 10 student, and to others whom you illegally propelled to the top of the grade 10 pyramid? It is the direction of fraud, the material direction of deception, with which you also managed to climb the hierarchical steps. Basically, this is the message that your students, especially the "exclusive" graduates, left the faculty with: to succeed, you have to work hard. This is how the false teacher ends his career: you have to bribe the world to get ahead, and you have to pretend to be knowledgeable, even if you have nothing valuable in you.

Too bad, professor, that you never understood the message that famous photographer Bill Jay used to convey:

"The most precious gift that a teacher can give a student is a resource to use, not an authority to obey. The teacher should be a storehouse of alternatives, directions, attitudes. The teacher shows with the finger to the moon. The student must learn to look at the moon and not at the finger."

Your perception as a shaping entity must influence your appreciation of your ability to create value in a fragment of reality that reflects the direction of truth, not the direction of falsehood.

The Impostor is the one who wants to appear to be someone else than he really is, resorting to less honorable means to assert himself, in order to arrogate to himself some non-existent merits.

Teacher, all-knowing! Before you pass on to the dark and eternal, and that will happen very soon, here is the final message from God himself: you have no business among the stars, just as you have no business among the truly enlightened minds of this world . Your place belongs in the dark, among other crooks and upstarts. Born in the unseen shadow, you left the world in the same dark veil, and to this mysterious darkness you will return.

The Imprisonment And Release Of My Soul

On January 25, 2021

You must have the maturity to accept a personal defeat in order to realize that your desire to be superior to the rest of the world only keeps you captive in a cage.

It is a discussion with a friend on the running track, at the end of today's training. And everything I said in those few minutes, which seemed to pass so quickly, reminded me of an emotional film, with an even more emotional ending. The film is entitled Flawless (2007). Of course, this is not about just any discussion, nor about a discussion on the subject of any psychological "specific" of friendship, but about the chance to mature, to let myself be carried away by the wave of the possibility of accepting another point of view on human nature.

And he repeated to me, once again, and again: "Nicu, leave the past behind, and don't compete with anyone. And don't let the past overwhelm you, just for the fact that the present doesn't run away with your pride of not forgetting that fragment of momentum, of great vibration that once determined you to go forward... and never stop."

Same as in the film Flawless (2007), you could see a part of the feeling of the man who cannot forget his past, and cannot get rid of it in any way, even if he wanted to find in himself an escape from exceptional prison of the mind and of the soul, control entities of the human being put to the test.

Similarly, the end of the film is a part of me, because everything in me resonates with that sensitive but unseen part of the soul of a man who has defeated his destiny, but could not forget that little illusion, quicksand, which is called... the present.

Leadership is a consequence of your affinity for the superiority of the spirit, at a time when the fall of the image you have built over time is proclaimed to be more than certain.

And because my friend advised me to leave the past behind, and to try and not prioritize the competitive spirit, I suddenly entered the space of the film, when in the end the heroine unloads all her hidden feelings, many of them long gone under the protection of anonymity.

Somehow, one step away from hiding from the past, the heroine chooses to look as she really was, freely revealing her feelings. And her so emotional words, full of simplicity, with which the film ends, are perhaps the memories of the feeling that my mind can never leave:

"I never intended this to happen, but the new game of life sent me in a different direction. I discovered the world and through it, I discovered myself. And just today... today I gave away the last penny of my fortune. I'm free at last.

Except... except for that jewel that you held in your hand. That I've been saving for a rainy day.

Or perhaps... or perhaps it's the last little piece of vanity that I have left."

Leadership: An exaggerated belief in one's own abilities expresses concern for the image you project on the outside, but can it challenge the perspective of the experience of living with limitations and blockages?

And in that brief moment of reflection, when someone spoke to me like a brother, he being a late traveler knocking at the gate of the human soul, I felt freed from the prison of pride of being different in trying to show that to the whole world. There is nothing more deceptive than the desire to be unique, and I know that this came to me very naturally, both objectively and subjectively.

Just as Papillon, after countless attempts to escape from the Cayenne prison, finally managed to escape from prison and, once in France, made public the conditions and draconian treatment he underwent, so did I after countless attempts to improve myself and to reach the highest level of competence, according to my merits and my very rigorous training, came in one moment to understand that in fact not everyone applies the same rule in interpersonal relationships and that, probably, something else is expected of me. I felt I had to announce my change before the world changed me.

I had to have the maturity to accept a personal defeat in order to realize that my desire to be superior to the rest of the world only kept me captive in a cage, in a state of revolt.

There must be no rivalry or competitive thinking in friendship. Often, the reason for a man's disgrace may be his refusal to accept a greater tolerance of the unanimous normal "shine" accepted by the majority. In leadership, normalcy is a favorable long-term state, while superiority may be a favorable short-term option, but one that cannot guarantee that things will not change for your partners, or that they will stay with you.

In fact, you never know what personality you're talking about when talking to a professional. Because at some point the professional realizes that his privileged status is not exactly what he wants, and he changes his mind. He even runs away from his own shadow, from a past that burdens him and hinders his personal social evolution. Here comes another stage in the becoming of his being in which nostalgia arises and he begins to live from "the old-fashioned perfume of other time", he begins to bear more and more with difficulty the loneliness of the experience of being different from others. And only here does he understand leadership.

Strong leadership takes into account the perspective of the experience of living by correspondence with the being from the emotional support model required by the specific realities of humanity, so it deprioritizes the experience of living through the model of success that a performer aspires to.

The Imprisonment And Release Of My Soul depend on how I manage to combine performance and superiority with the lessons of humanity and life that I have often learned too late.

Leadership is an exercise in developing self-acceptance and self-esteem in the sense of a significant majority, in the sense of a world in which social reward is not an offer of personal value, but a consequence of your affinity for the superiority of the spirit, at a time when the fall of the image you have built over time is proclaimed to be more than certain.

The Indeterminate Character Of The Genius

On May 31, 2014

Allow people to define you based not only on your exceptional performance, but rather based on how you channel your "vibrations" into their lives.

Some people were surprised by his appearance: a large, disproportioned head, or his unusually reedy voice. Others were hypnotized from the first meeting with the director. The cinema critic Leon Moussinac describes his first meeting with Sergei Mihailovici Eisenstein, whose personality "ransacked" him completely: "He dominated you physically and intellectually at the same time. Physically, by the mobility of his face and hands, by the power of the bust on which the massive volume of his head was inserted, by the glow of the energy and intelligence emanated by his whole person."

Eisenstein was well aware of his huge value, of his genius, being the same artist who created the strongest work in the history of cinema and whom Picasso's words would rightly fit: "Impressionists wanted to portray the world as they saw it. It does not appeal to me. I want to portray the world as I perceive it."

Asked on the first impression made on him by Eisenstein, the American film historian Jay Leyda said: "I was afraid. Eisenstein resembled Jupiter, a wrathful god. He was always trying to impress, as if he wanted to test you. Which, of course, upset everyone. But Eisenstein's attitude was only a mask. If you survived it, everything would go well with him, and despite his very complicated character, he was a wonderful man and teacher." *

Leadership: Can you eliminate the drawbacks of being a role model built on the idea that you don't have to be perfect?

Is it possible for a man of extremes, both promising and disappointing, to exist? A man providing synchronizing pulses of Ego's functions with negative valences, which can also be structured and projected on a brighter background?

It is an improved version of the man with high aspirations, as are those who never ask for anything, but know how to get everything, moving whatever happens around them, of the man partly using an automatic driving system, directly influenced by the exceptional features that allow individualizing or establishing his uniqueness.

Such a man understands when something is wrong and does not immediately activate the "emergency brake", but lets other people define him based not only on his exceptional performances, but rather based on how he channels his "vibrations" in their lives.

These vibrations are nothing but a manifestation of the spirit, caused by the load of current beliefs at different times in life, an overcoming of one's own limits by creating a superior intelligence, nurtured by culture, leaving other people speechless.

Leadership: Are you an innovation or a loophole of the final "version" of the same individual who can be entrusted with being a symbol of the challenger spirit?

In my study of the human dimension, fighting the incompatibility suggested by some people between the different versions of the same individual, penetrating into the deep layers of his being, I pursue the constant formation of his ability resources and his originality in promoting certain concepts regarding the construction of science.

And what do I find on an ever larger scale? That such an artist, who lives the day to day life under the successive discoveries of thoughts assailing him, can only be sympathetic with those continuously contributing to his progress, increasing his science.

Leadership means managing to impress people without testing them or them testing you. That, if you can. This is the mastery to arouse interest, to get close to others, creating a consensus, not conditioning, inviting people to know you even when you are harshly judged, even when you are not on top of the mountain, even when you accompany yourself in the changing process.

The innovation of your final version is an effort to relate to the added value that is felt in the overall look that your reputation gets. And to link yourself to a lapse of your final version means to accept your tendency to limit yourself to the essence of your being: that of remaining an artist who has understood life and captured it in his creations, but who does not turn away from making art out of the way others see him.

Liquid water, placed in an environment with a temperature lower than 0 degrees Celsius solidifies, turning into crystalline form. So a clever man who is placed even in a malevolent and hostile environment manages to gain the advantage of being the ideal recommendation for a strong leadership, creating a certain mood and good-humor only through his competence and performance resources – acting as a lever for creating influence, but also for maintaining the power balance between these two poles: uniqueness and group membership.

The impression you give to others should be directly proportional to the value you attribute to yourself in a context of the type: "I live and guide myself after the qualities I am perfectly aware I possess."

The indeterminate character of the genius highlights the side of your inner life that can keep your mind clear and open, safeguarding it as much as possible against the experience of the inability to understand the surrounding reality. Uniqueness helps you distinguish yourself in a world of diversity, causing you to be a role model for those around you, even if their attitude towards you is like "we will see".

The Indicator Set On Slow Or Fast

On March 19, 2011

People will reconsider their attitude towards your leadership, if you reconsider your attitude towards their values.

People will never follow you if you don't have a good relationship with them and if you don't exert a positive influence on them. And the advantage of being on top can turn into a big disadvantage if you don't prevent the eventual adverse reactions that may occur as a result of a general dissatisfaction due to your inefficient actions or decisions.

Lieutenant Waters in the movie „Tears of the sun (2003)" forgot for a while that leadership begins and ends with who's in charge, and the one who disregards people's values will be despised. His mission of safely escorting Dr. Kendricks from the International Red Cross to the Alpha retirement area got complicated when, at her insistence, he accepted to take more Nigerian refugees. The elite troops of General Mustafa Yakubu were following their track, only a few kilometers away, and these refugees were "a burden much too heavy" for him and the other members of the SWAT team.

There was distrust and reluctance between the refugees and Waters from the very beginning, their attitude toward him being closed and hostile. Between their souls and his, it doesn't seem to be a single bridge over the gap.

Leadership: Is the most difficult part of the need to be accepted the "paradoxical commitment" of giving up on yourself to the use of the meaning you give to the experience of being inferior to anyone else?

Everything changed when one of the refugees saved Lieutenant Water's life. Moreover, on the serpentines, Waters realized that the contempt he showed toward them doubled their feeling of despair and bitterness. And precisely for this reason, they didn't truthfully listen to his orders and demands.

So, in order to increase his power of influence, he changed his approach. He adopted a positive attitude to their values – respect, appreciation, solidarity, patience, honor, dignity – which they deeply cherished. What does the attitude of other people indicate to you?

In a brief moment of lucidity, Waters no longer looked at himself as being a "rock" placed above people, but rather as a subject to the cause they served: equality. They were all engaged in the same struggle, because together they created a majority that wants to impose the law of the majority. He tasted the experience of being inferior to refugees only when he realized how much he owes to the fact that he was saved, how little he was in the face of a possible fatal outcome and how much his life depends on each one of them !

Leadership: Is the value of your image given by the need to build an authentic attachment to the answer of seeking your own meaning in the consciousness of a total adversity between Instinct and Reason?

Do not change the whole system, but give it a little life ! Instinct is something animalistic, based on a set of genetic rules predetermined by evolutionary adaptation, that is, the need to survive. Reason, which distinguishes man from animal, is a force that tends towards unity, and is based on the sensitive experience it intervenes to correct the mistakes of the senses.

Waters didn't treat the refugees like some "packages" that messed up his plans and which he could dispense with at any time, but as human beings, as some trusted companions, as equals, friends, engaging to take care of them and do everything possible to safely escort all of them to their destination. In turn, they changed their attitude – they collaborated with him and the other members of the SWAT team and became more active, sociable and involved.

You have to change, as Calipso said to Telemac, if you want your leadership to gain a positive sense.

For that the concrete form, in which will be the leadership carried out in the future, to be easily shaped in order to well worth your defining elements, especially the ability to react to the thoughts and feelings of others in spontaneous situations, you must remedy your ability to react to stimuli such as: internal discomfort, pain, suffering, disappointment - that you feel quite strong in certain circumstances. These are signals that discourages you to execute those behaviors generators of uncertainties and failures.

The position you assume in the midst of adverse events is an attempt to capture the image of an identity that is often emotionally involved in the behavior of a suffering person.

Not the assurance of the confirmation of your position is important in the consolidation process of the leadership, but the courageous communication, fairness, the simply twist of the key to people's hearts - left at disposal of your authority. The requirement that you impose to yourself. The awareness and polishing that supreme inner force, around which gravitates a reason, a sensitivity, a large aperture - focused against all the forms of resistance, gained by your nature in limiting circumstances, harsh, harmful, oppressive. A war cry, a suggestive call to ministry, aimed at finding those parts of you, sustainable and friendly, gone a long time ago.

The horizon of expectations, with which you look the future of your professional career, is like a computer that needs a little refreshment to function at an optimal level. For your professional survival, you do not have to change all the "system" (consisting of those two processes that communicate constantly: motivation and performance) but only to give it some life ! To have installed correctly all "drivers" and updated daily - the consciousness, values, attitude, and behavior.

As a leader, you will also have to escort the ones that you enjoy less to their destination

As a leader, you assume a difficult task. Often, you will also have to escort to destination the ones that you enjoy less, the ones that slow down your rhythm and momentum towards achieving your objectives. You don't have any other option if you're a man with a noble soul, whose feelings towards other people remained pure and strong.

Do you always want to change people as you please? Make them match your pattern? They are as they are, some individualities. They aren't some children, slaves or puppets that you can manipulate as you wish, to your heart's desire, by your own criteria and rules. They are themselves, some individuals with particular convictions, well rooted, which you can change only with tact, skill and calm. You will be able to influence them only if you reconsider your attitude toward their values.

If you don't build a bridge to connect with people around you, they will be reluctant to your points of view, to any agreement and suggestion. And your way will become more difficult.

Your duty as a leader is that of recognizing your own level of "survival" in an area in which people do not dare to judge you, but they make you understand where you are wrong.

The indicator set on Slow or Fast offers you the chance to choose the best way for your professional success. As a leader, you can hurry in order to reach your goals, thus neglecting the values, principles, ideals and beliefs of those who follow you, or you can make an acceptable detour and delay a little the process of achieving your objectives, reconsidering your attitude toward their values.

If you choose "Fast", it means that your intention is to lead people despite their own will, without giving them the opportunity to connect spontaneously to your leadership. They will live in a state of total anxiety and will seem to be pretty worried. They won't be too confident in your abilities to lead them.

If you choose "Slow", you will be able to easier exert your influence on them. You will treat them with consideration, admiration and respect – which will strengthen your relationship with them. You will never forget about their feelings and you will never neglect your role.

Conclusion: The leader has to contribute to the development of an appropriate organizational culture. The rhythm adopted by the leader largely depends on the collective and the existing level of the organizational culture and the people's professionalism and proficiency.

A brisk start on "the short way" might be a failure if the collective doesn't "match" this way of action. That's why a leader must know, depending on the people he leads, what tactics to approach and what rhythm and paths to follow.

A leader must be familiar with "the Human Resources" that he has available.

The Ineffable Vision, or the Revelation of Truth and Supreme Reality

On January 13, 2010

Inner illumination is an echo of universal unity, reflecting the connection between the divine and the self.

- Will this inner illumination, which should make me an akh, necessarily be given to me or does it depend on the will of the god? Neferu asked.

- God's will is your will. For you are a part of the whole, of that whole which is the perfect form of the god, in its visible and invisible aspects. God is what you see around you, what your senses perceive, it is Egypt and other nations, it is the world with everything that lives, it is the sky of fixed stars and wandering stars, but it is also invisible, the space you cannot see with your eyes and which nevertheless exists and separates our world from all those worlds which are, each, stars perceived by our eyes and stars which you cannot see, either because they are too far from us, or because our sight does not manages to capture their light.

And there is what was before creation, before Ta-tenen existed, as well as what will be after, when the visible universe will transform, will disappear in space and time, for space is vaster than the worlds which it contains and time transcends the universe at the moment you see it both in the past - which, for him, still exists - and in the future, which, for him, already exists. You must know that time and space form a whole, that one cannot exist without the other, because without space the world could not spread, and without time, it could not move. Because every movement requires a moment and every moment is a particle of time.

Leadership: Do you discern the vibrant contrast between light and shadow, like a mirroring of life and death, that challenges you to introspect?

- Everything you tell me seems very difficult to understand, said Neferu, sighing, amazed by such words.

- Only through meditation will you be able to begin to understand the deep meaning of my words. For I myself understood only a few things before long practicing meditation on all the elements of thought proposed by my teachers. Then one day, after many austerities, much work, many days and months, and years spent searching for what is within me and outside me, I received the ineffable vision, I saw the light without fire, the light without the sun, eternal light, I came out of myself, left my corporeal shell and took an immortal body of light, then returned to myself, having had the revelation of the truth, of the supreme reality, that which men do not know , generally, only after they have been purified by a series of multiple deaths and repeated lives.

- Could I also receive the ineffable vision?

- It could be, but no one can know the inner ways of the other, not even himself, because only after a tireless search for yourself and your own spirit do you come to know yourself enough to begin to hope that you will be able to receive inner enlightenment. Through successive lives or in one life, through asceticism and the effort of meditation, we can, however, manage to get rid of our enemies within us, to drive away our tormentors.

Leadership: Reflecting on your own revelatory experiences, have you been able to strike a balance between repeated life-inspired feelings and current perception in a visual and imaginative representation of yourself?

Meditation, therefore, is a composition of forces that lead either to fulfillment, or to abolition, or to a kind of blocking in an "other reality" type of existence. The founding and unmaking force of your Self, which I call self-knowledge, is in balance if you manage to evade the daily routine, so that reality is not simply a "middle ground between two abysses", but is the very place of that universal balance, the understanding of your world beyond the understanding of the whole world.

It is about the tendency to put all your vibrations into an equation and constitute them into a unique vision, through a kind of "search for the truth within yourself". So, balancing between the limited and the unlimited, you will be able to experience a deep inner peace, which helps you to know yourself better.

With this vision of the real - balance between clarity and vision - your great becoming will receive acceptance through a kind of awareness of the evolving nature of your ego and its structure. This way you will be able to better understand the connection between what makes you special and what makes you better understand the connection between body and mind. So, it is an ontological balance between two different, yet close impressions, and, as such, your posture is no longer that of a "wanderer", but of a "rediscoverer of inner strength", that is, you have found your balance, motivation and strength to move on.

Leadership: On your path to inner enlightenment, how do you harness patience, dedication, and meditation as essential tools in self-discovery?

The ineffable vision question is profound and shines a spotlight on a journey that is uniquely yours and deeply personal. This exploration of self, of the desire to receive inner enlightenment, is an adventure you undertake not only with your mind, but also with your soul. Are you ready to soar down this path?

Think of relentless self-searching as an expedition into the unknown, where each step brings you closer to your inner truth. It is a process that requires patience, dedication and, above all, a burning desire for self-improvement. It's not an easy journey, but its beauty lies in the challenges you face and how they transform you.

Understanding that no one can truly know the inner ways of another, or even one's own self, without deep introspection is essential. This emphasizes the uniqueness of your spiritual journey. Every life experience, be it successive lives or the journey in this life, adds layers to the complexity of your being. Asceticism and meditation are powerful tools in this quest, enabling you to connect to deeper levels of your consciousness.

Leadership: Have you ever thought that every moment of revelation is actually a reconnection with yourself, in a constant search for understanding reality from a spiritual journey?

Confronting your inner "enemies", your fears and doubts, is an integral part of this process. By defeating them, you open your way to spiritual freedom. But remember, this battle is not one that ends quickly. It is a constant struggle for understanding and acceptance, where each victory brings you closer to enlightenment.

Inner enlightenment is thus a great ideal, a state of grace to which you ceaselessly aspire. It is the ineffable vision you seek, but the path to achieving it is itself a revelation. As you delve into the exploration of your own being, you discover not only the limits but also the endless possibilities of your spirit.

I encourage you to view every moment of introspection as an opportunity for growth. Every thought, every emotion you explore builds and defines you. In this quest, you are never alone. Even though the journey is yours and yours alone, the universe weaves its thread alongside you, subtly guiding you towards the enlightenment you aspire to.

So, dare to continue on this path with an open heart and a curious mind. What you will discover about yourself may be more miraculous than any promised ineffable vision.

The revelation that motivates you to become someone else accepts as its criterion of validity the unbridled possibility of the self to attain spiritual enlightenment.

The ineffable vision, or the revelation of ultimate truth and reality, denotes that stage of understanding and self-acceptance through which you gain the courage to be someone else. Therefore, a deep self-understanding and acceptance of one's reality are essential in the journey towards spiritual enlightenment, providing the courage necessary for personal transformation.

The Infinity Of A Hidden World

On October 23, 2016

Be yourself, enhancing your ability to make visible the effects of an ever-expanding image that frees and at the same time imposes itself through its power of suggestion.

My thinking followed the natural development of the age, putting an end to any interaction with the elements of a prosaic reality, as the creation of a meaningful life. Everything is still written with artist's letter, but in the order of an individual valorizing emancipation, of thought interpreted through the ability to make visible the effects of an ever more complete image, which frees and at the same time imposes itself through its power of suggestion.

I preserve many of the demands of this development, due to an extraordinary intensity of cinema-thinking, through images that are erased whenever I want, by perfecting the frames of origin in a "Future Heroes" scene and dedicated exclusively to a world made after my own liking. The artist is a creator of scenarios brought together in an art of three-dimensional representation of images, in a time of precious words, thus becoming a manipulator of the fictional worlds, for the sake of imaginative thinking.

Of course, there are presences and absences with the extraordinary intensity that only the thought and human action tend to have in their highest expression, memory, language, but also other psychic processes such as affection, will, motivation, attention. The artist's image is closely related to a category of thinking that lies between concrete and abstract, between real and ideal, between sensible and intelligible, so that the image can be given the merit of being absolute, that is, by resembling the experience of the Creator to unleash their fantasy through a full release of constraints and conventions.

Leadership: Can you identify your personal image with that of a Creator who is constantly reinventing himself through excellent visual thinking, assuming that an image must be the contribution of an artistic act to the surprise of a new horizon of expectation?

I write because I know how to turn writing into the expression of the idealism of a creator who simply forgot about the discouraging framework of the life he experiences and rose above all through knowledge. The ability to write through an idealism of knowledge, close to the quality of my life, gives me a certain prestige, a great value before all the other values that the world takes into account, without being forced to turn creation into the expression of megalomania or egocentrism.

But not all are moved before the consequences of an inner and perspective evolution, as it is the inclination of writing to create a positive image of the personal brand. I say this while watching the presentations of Romanian trainers / speakers held at a recent event. I find it surprising that most people do not know what a LEAD is and therefore do not know how to use it, and that they also have something else in common:

Almost everyone is part of the "John Maxwell" team.

And I ask myself: do you have to be part of one team or another to really have something to say? Have you never thought you could be infinitely more valuable than a whole team?

When you will think like this, then you will be truly valuable and you will not sell the image of a stranger ! You will start promoting your image and that of Romania ! You will begin to be a leader !

Be Romanian, not Australian, not American, not French, not Russian, not the representative of another nation. Be better than everyone ! And, first of all, be the fruit of your individual development !

Leadership: Do you consider the prospect of an empowering individual emancipation that elevates the act of creation to the rank of image and then you can orient yourself when you choose the style of interpretation of your own alternative to be innovative?

You can ensure the centered location of the existential areas in a motto "be better than everyone else", only if your writing is proof of a determined attitude and a profound thinking that can be detached today to go through centuries of history full of approaches of life and creation.

The truth, expressed by the old priest Menes, the best connoisseur of the stars in Egypt, and the skillful craftsman of Boleslaw Prus' novel, "The Pharaoh" remains eternal:

"All these are small things. The younger Pharaohs grow old, and the people had not once a seventh day for rest, they also had land. Ah, if only that would've changed ! But how many dynasties and how many priests have wandered for three thousand years into Egypt, how many cities, and how many temples have not been turned to ruins, how many earthly petitions did not come up !

All things have changed except for one: two and two make four, the triangle is half the rectangle, the moon can cover the sunlight, and boiling water can throw a stone into the air.

In this pernicious world, that which endures and remains is only wisdom. Woe to him who, for things that pass like clouds, leaves what is eternal ! His heart will never find its peace, and his consciousness will lean like the breeze in the middle of the storm."

Wisdom, distinguishing itself by the attitude with which you come up with innovative thinking, is the sum of all the small things whose value you elevate to the rank of law that resists eternity.

What you learn from life, processing and developing the logic of harmony, plenitude, imaginative materialization, is just as important as what you learn from others, noting that the relationship between you and them – which confirms the progress of knowledge through taking finalities into account – does not answer the question: "What came first, the chicken or the egg?"

Do you depend on other people or do other people depend on you? For there are two kinds of people: those who make themselves noticed by learning from their own experience (the authentic ones), and those who make themselves noticed by extracting lessons from the experience of others (those who weaken their individuality). Those who illuminate through self-seeking, and those who illuminate because of the fire started by others.

We constantly oscillate between the tendency to be ourselves and the tendency to be like others, no matter how difficult the efforts are to delimit the scope of science. But what is required as an indispensable premise of personal analysis and assessment, in contrast to what others think, without exhausting the experiential approach to the proposed goal, is the ability to make visible the effects of an ever more complete image that frees and at the same time imposes itself through its power of suggestion.

And often this image, which corresponds to a wisdom-based evolution, is the effect of the following phrase: "do not forsake what is eternal for thing which are passing."

Eternity is the valorizing cognitive human force, highlighting the acceptance of the difference between you and the others, what you know from them and what you feel you are prepared to learn by yourself, amid the dominance of the causes that define existence.

Eternity is the positive pole of a space in which life gets a much wider sense when the heart finds its peace. It is a state of consciousness in which man experiences himself as a unique and creative being. It is the result of the fierce struggle to describe and understand the nature of your own creation... beyond the shadow or light of other people.

Eternity is The Infinity Of A World Hidden... and found again. It is the deepening of the moment with existence, it is a form of all the phenomena of the senses. It is a system of reference for any meaningful human approach in the plan of thought formulated differently.

Someone said that the Sun has for billions of years been an indelible celestial body in space. It is different from other stars, not because it is the strongest light, not because it has large dimensions and is in the middle of the solar system, not because it defies the laws of time, not because it is the center of universal knowledge and universal power. But because it is necessary for life.

And if every atom in my body was once part of a star, I would like that star to be the Sun.

The Infinity Of Mr. Hobbs

On February 20, 2013

Drive your own reality and that of others in the desired direction, without functioning as an eternal victim of conscience.

Mr. Hobbs was a simple office cleaner, but he worked in one of the largest global corporations, led by the world's most astute tycoons, who conducted their business in the colossal diamond industry. Fate wasn'ttoo kind to him. His past followed him everywhere. However, his conscience could not deny that, though old, he was looking brave ahead – but with the pride of that harsh and vengeful spirit of the firm and unshakable Mefisto. Did the angel turned into a demon?

A keen eye can easily notice, following the orderly, but disturbing existence of this old man – as part of a scientific analysis carried to the extreme – the multiple convulsions in his internal circuit, points of maximum voltage that estrange evermore from his true nature, values of elements that give rise to a strange friction.

What is his true motivation? What is the nature of these electrons that intermittently collide in his inner forum?

Well-mounted in the stand of his existence, each sensor generates a different current, always indicating another tension, ever more abnormal, evolving as a whole, as a coordinated response of a great variety of emotional disadvantages, inaccurately oscillating between two values: "plus" and "minus" – which can be assigned to a single variable: Revenge !

Leadership: Are you able to develop an attitude of superiority to what happens to you while you are on the road of life by designing a horizon drawn from the boundlessness of a feeling hanging on a thick thread called "deserved reward"?

And how will you do that? It was supposed to be a solo operation, but it turned into a rare duet, a compact unit with more power. Like a poacher on the hunt, Mr. Hobbs wakes up next to a wounded lioness, takes care of her, they both set the same target and proceed with the attack. Their reward, if left with a victory, meant acquiring a wealth with no end.

In other words, his desire for revenge against corporate managers is doubled by Laura Quinn – who is also torn by sorrow, pain and fatigue, and driven by the same impetuous desire. They both want to submit the dragons to this treatment, developing a special technique to prepare the battlefield, stimulating their intellect beyond anything one can imagine.

- Do you want to enter the corporate vault and steal the diamonds? You can't be serious ! How will you manage that?

- Only I know... and dare, Mr. Hobbs replied, as if quoting the ambitious Eugène de Rastignac, from Balzac's work.

- And how do you plan to find out the safe combination?

- That's where you step in, Mrs. Quinn.

Their ambition is reinforced by the test they simultaneously submit their own power and will to. Ultimately, their plan hits its target. Their revenge takes effect from its first application.

But we will never forget the dialogue between Mr. Hobbs and Laura Quinn at the end of the movie "Flawless (2007)". This combination of united forces, whose trajectories, intersecting, challenged their characters:

- Do you think it was worth doing all this for your cause, Mr. Hobbs?

- Oh, yes ! I would even spend a hundred lives in prison for my cause. Maybe one day, you will understand, Mrs. Quinn.

Leadership: Can you set yourself up as a way of facilitating a complex decision-making process, so that you can perfectly reproduce the beginning of a new world from the perspective of what is going to happen?

Are you a hunter who hunts himself? Do you look forward with the pride of a harsh and vengeful spirit? Which are the maximum voltage points that remove you more and more from your true nature? What is your true motivation and what effect does it have on others? What is the nature of those electrons that intermittently collide in your inner forum?

The place of leadership, its ownership and exploitation in the world of tomorrow through your own thinking and your own system of operation implies a preference or a certain inncer appreciation in the context of increasing the tolerance level of harmful actions, frustrations and uncertainties, ambiguity and risk.

The hassle, maybe justified, but extremely tough sometimes, with far-reaching impact in your existence, can degenerate into visible tears only when the dreaded "disease" has grown so much, that it can hardly be cured.

This disease is nothing but the manifestation of a reality that you have never really wanted. That manifestation of will, by which you force yourself to become a dodgy leadership prototype, a device that does not promise much, which seeks only to accelerate tension – increasing your own pulse and completely disabling the pulse of others.

Like two electrons intermittently colliding in your inner forum, these two pulses rather offer clues to your weakness, a limit to your own helplessness, an impoverishment of your own nature – that lead, under the influence of their own laws, to a strong impairment of the ability to perform a positive change in your own consciousness. You become your own stalker, a hunter who hunts himself, a poacher who falls into his own trap.

Leadership: How dark is the infinite that you carry in yourself from the point of view of a seemingly impossible project that has a very strong social message: "Get up and talk about the unspoken"?

Mr. Hobbs managed to save Laura Quinn from a physical and emotional exhaustion, but with a price – carrying her along a bleak affair, a huge risk, a regression in other plans of her personality.

But let's ask ourselves with a certain amount of concern: Did Mr. Hobbs managed to save himself? Or did he just comforted his feeling of revenge? For he has functioned as an eternal victim of consciousness – by always invoking the past, perceiving everything by fulfilling a goal that incessantly devoured his soul.

Behind this question, we can discern the limit of his own character, his new status in society – a conditioned causality. He lives on with the conscience of his moral command – liberating or destructive?

The French writer Victor Hugo noted with sadness: "What a solemn thing is this infinity which every man bears within him, and which he measures with despair against the caprices of his brain and the actions of his life ! "

Leadership is tiring and complex. My belief is that you will be able to embrace this science only if you manage to take responsibility for this "infinity" that you bear within you, which may also reflect its effects on those around you.

Measure your will and deeds, drive your own reality and that of others in the desired direction, without functioning as an eternal victim of this ambiguous and reverse infinity – "conscience", which can cause more harm than good, more anxiety than joy –for you and others.

"Get up and talk about the unspoken" is the message that you can pull from a life of fulfillment by freeing yourself from the pain caused by a world that has shown itself to be more and more oppressive.

The unspoken are the crumbs of soul that are not peppered by ignorance and the eternal "Nothing new under the sun", but those who are glide outwardly empowered with the hopes or pains of others, impressing through the superior entity of a life that has been found to be the ideal way to materialize in a vision without frontiers.

The infinity of Mr. Hobbs symbolizes faith, hope, the emotional flame that can hardly be kept in check by this constant, of becoming or degeneration, called conscience.

The Initiate

On February 08, 2010

Give the guarantee of a high level of performance, by providing solid evidence to prove the quality of your own functioning and long-term evolution.

The young Prince Ramses, willing to affirm himself, asked his father to name him the captain of the Memphis army. The great Ramses the XII-th, knowing from his own experience how difficult and risky it is to lead only one army corps at such a young age, said he will fulfill his wish only if he proves of being capable of exercising such a position. Simply put, the young Ramses was about to be the subject to a really serious test, the aim of which was his initiation in the art of leadership. That was to be his test of fire that absolutely he had to pass, otherwise he would not be able to become captain, and later pharaoh.

With an army of ten thousand soldiers, prepared for battle, endowed with war machines and everything necessary for an expedition, Ramses had to move to the East, near the city Pi-Bailos. At the same time, Nitager, the head of the army guarding the gates of Egypt from the attack of the Asian peoples, had to go against Ramses.

The movement of the troops commanded by Ramses himself, it was made on a strategic route. Although Nitager had set him a trap, he and his army succeeded in getting out of the trouble thanks to his calculated courage and to his unsuspected skill in choosing the strategy, his extraordinary vivacity and energy, his resourceful spirit.

Because he gained momentum against Nitager, because he managed to gather his entire army and align it in battle positions, awaiting the enemy, Ramses was declared the winner. How big his joy was on the day when he was named commander of the Memphis army ! Now, the path to glory stretches in front of him.

Leadership: How skillful do you look in a SPLIT situation between the momentum of honoring the brilliance of a more lasting vision than your deeds and the privilege of translating the lessons of your deeds into an expression of the intention of making the great step toward glory?

Prince Ramses' wish was that his father, the great pharaoh Ramses the XII-th to initiate him in battle craft, in the activities specific to leading a country. Obviously, it was extremely difficult for someone of his age, not having any kind of previous experience, to go on a mission which had minimum chances of success. How could have he accomplished something that only people of great experience could accomplish? Could he pit himself against an experienced commander, such as Nitager? Could he pass this test of fire which only a few people passed?

Well, yes, it was possible. And that because, certainly, his father, the pharaoh Ramses the XII-th had prepared him mentally in good time, he told him to spend as much time as possible among soldiers, he taught him not to be afraid, to be determined at all times. He always gave him precious advice related to the actions he should make in certain situations, constantly warning him of the risks he may expose.

He had instructed him to follow some strict rules so that, in the future, when he would be the leader of his country, he would be able to command with ambition and wisdom. Never would the great pharaoh have sent his sole heir in a mission that risky, if he had not had a previous mental and physical training, and especially if he had no confidence that he can succeed.

Leadership: Do you have the ability to examine your life facts about the use of the hero image so as to fundamentally change the value of what you represent from a conceptual point of view?

The power lies in the hands of the pharaoh, he has the will, he must also have the skills. The great pharaoh Ramses the XII-th initiated his son in due time the secrets of leadership, teaching him to make good use of his innate qualities, in order to be his successor. And only by testing him, he could realize whether he would be ready or not to face the future challenges.

In his turn, Prince Ramses, courageous and confident in himself, motivated by his father's ambitious goals, driven by the will to make himself noticed, eager to face challenges that others find difficult and intimidating and relying on advices received over time, passed the test with great éclat, proving that he would be fitted to command an entire army and to be his father's successor.

Ramses offered the guarantee of a high level of performance, making proof of his own "functioning" and long-term evolution. He represented the core of a concept that can be defined as follows: "Time must be pushed beyond the boundaries of the temporary so that you can deal with the mysterious challenges of fate."

To examine your life's facts about using the image of a hero is to maximize your personal skills by using the test results as a lever to validate the undisputable proofs of an a priori knowledge in an attempt to cross the transition spheres of ascension from the condition of "marginal" to that of an "exception to the rule".

The value you get on the journey of leadership depends on the task you initiate and which you end up with, without being experienced enough in the field but tenacious enough to produce a complementary effect of individualism approaches that compensate for the persistence of an underground of a strategic nature.

Conclusion: At one point, there is a crossroad in a man's life when he must decide where to go and, of course, what field to be initiated in. Once the decision is taken, he must be receptive and interested, for, otherwise, he would fail. Nobody will be able to excel in a field if he is not able, open and does not have the will to excel in that field.

Starting to initiate in a field, and then abandon it, means you are like a straw floating on high waters, going where the wind blows, means that you are satisfied with the crumbles that life and change give you, instead of grabbing the greater share. The choice is yours !

Give the guarantee of a high level of performance, by providing solid evidence to prove the quality of your own functioning and long-term evolution.

The Inner Gaze Transcends Physical Visual Boundaries

On September 09, 2024

Every step you take on your way can turn into a revelation of self, if in your ascent you find a deep dialogue with nature.

In the green labyrinth of the mountains, where time loses its consistency and space becomes more and more ethereal, my sister, Oana Fântânaru, makes her way not only through forests and rocks, but also through the layers of her own consciousness. Mountain running, for her, is not just a sport, but a "Xenthoria Ulmivent", a miraculous fusion between physical effort and spiritual transcendence, where every breath becomes a silent prayer addressed to the unknown gods of nature. She does not perceive running only as an act of simple physical effort; it is, rather, an endless dialogue between her and nature, a secret language of steps that brings her closer to her true essence.

In the mysterious process of running, each step becomes a note in the universal symphony of self-discovery. It's as if the mountain itself is calling her to spiritual ascent, every winding path, every steep slope, a line from an ancestral poem about courage and perseverance. As if every rock, every exposed root is a silent teacher, offering lessons in poise and determination. Of course, in every movement, Oana feels that stirring of the ground under her feet, as if the entire being of the earth is reaching out to receive her, to guide her, to show her the way to a higher knowledge.

And when her speed triples, manifesting in her that unsuspected inner strength, a mysterious smile suddenly blooms on her face, for overcoming barriers is not only a physical achievement, but a sweet break from all mental limitation, a kind of ecstatic transcendence. Quick steps free the soul from constraints. Each step, faster and faster, becomes a form of liberation, a deep breath of the soul that shakes off invisible fears, the shadows of old doubts. Most likely, running, through Oana's eyes, is more than a competition, it is a journey towards oneself, a victory of the spirit over the imperfections she perceives as temporary illusions.

Leadership: Can the will with which you face a difficult course become a visual revelation of personal effort, shaping itself like a living painting in accordance with an artist's vision?

"El ritmo del corazón se sincroniza con el latido de la montaña," the rarefied air of the heights whispers as if Oana finds her way through the vertical labyrinth of nature. As he progresses, the sense of belonging to the natural universe is amplified, just as a painter's sense of inspiration is amplified when he finds the perfect balance between technique and emotion. Psychologically, every moment lived among the woods and rocks becomes a testimony of his inner resistance, that boundless force which, like an unseen spring, pours forth from the depths of his being. This inner breath that guides her is an "invigoration" with sacred valences, a silent call to a higher goal, to that perfection impossible to describe in words, but so tangible in the experience of transcendence through effort.

The first criterion in art is authenticity. The difference between a cheap painting and a very expensive one is primarily authenticity. For example, a Monet painting will be worth much more than a copy. Authentic painting is easily recognized; often analyzes are also done before determining whether or not this point from the long list of criteria passes.

In Oana's case, authenticity is not just a state, but a perpetual process, where each training session is like a piece of art - it cannot be replicated, only experienced. Just as a close analysis of a Monet reveals the originality of every detail, so the subtle transformations in Oana's rhythm and perseverance give rise to a vivid picture of her own evolution, comparable to "The Persistence of Memory", where time melts and reality bends under the weight effort and personal will.

Rapid adaptation of vision to environmental changes reflects mental flexibility. It is essential to understand that, for Oana, training optimization is not only a matter of sports technique, but an "Epedysasis Harrexhium", an eternal call to overcome oneself, that unique chance to continuously reinvent oneself. Of course, each adjustment in his routine is like a brush on the canvas of existence, thus proving that a personal masterpiece can be achieved if each effort is imbued with passion and authenticity.

Leadership: Can you turn every terrain challenge you traverse into an opportunity for inner growth, seeing beyond the physical obstacle to the spiritual lesson that life has to offer?

When Oana's speed triples, it is as if a culmination has been reached, a perfect alignment between personal effort and the cosmic rhythm of the universe. Thus, the boundaries between body, mind and spirit dissolve, leaving room for an expanded consciousness to encompass not just the route, but her entire existence. Because of this, I consider her weekly running workouts to be meditations in motion, a sacred union of strength and mental clarity. A kind of running yoga, where each inhale brings the primordial energy of the hills into her being, each exhale releasing all traces of doubt and fear. In these moments, Oana no longer runs on the mountain, but becomes the mountain itself – steadfast, eternal, full of secrets hidden in every fold of the rock and in every trembling leaf.

In this context, I remember the words of Henry David Thoreau from the novel "Walden": "I went into the woods because I wanted to live deliberately, to face only the essential facts of life and see if I could not learn what it had to teach me ." Like Thoreau in search of the essential, Oana finds in every mountain race an opportunity to distill the essence of her own existence, every drop of sweat becoming a pearl of wisdom.

The expanded field of vision while running is a broadening of perspective on life, in the version of a connection with God. Or rather, in her quest for perfection in running, Oana discovered that the real race is within her, where every victory over her own limits is a victory over the entire universe. The visual perception of speed amplifies the feeling of transcendence, doesn't it, Oana? Each step forward is a deep breath of your spirit, to the point where you feel the release of tension, when you feel that ease of mind that brings you peace.

Leadership: Are you able to transform spiritual victories into exceptional bodily performances, thereby creating a work of art of living art that transcends the immediate?

Running means opening your eyes to new inner horizons. At the last competition, "Trail la Cabană", Oana won a new 1st place in the hardest race, 25 km. Another personal record. And the path to the records was lit not only by personal ambition, but by an invisible inner flame that seems to burn with the intensity of a newborn star. This mystical energy, springing from the depths of his being, is not just fuel for his muscles, but a transformative force that reconfigures his entire existence. After all, spiritual victories are manifested through exceptional bodily performances.

In each race, Oana feels herself connecting with the invisible forces of nature, becoming a channel through which the primordial energy of the earth manifests. And he manifests himself as a painter in action, creating a masterpiece. Every step is an affirmation of life in the rhythm of art, every breath is a communion with the essence of the universe. Only in these moments of grace does time lose its linearity, becoming a perfect circle where past, present and future merge into one eternal moment of pure existence.

If I had to give a meaning to leadership, I would offer the following quote: "Open your soul to the infinite pace and amplitude of running, understanding that each step is a gateway to unknown dimensions of your being."

The inner gaze transcends physical visual limits when the effort of running becomes meditation in motion. I say this because determination overcomes the perception of external obstacles, especially as the course becomes increasingly demanding, as the focused mind transcends apparent physical limitations.

The Inspiring Effluvia Of A Free Mind

On March 12, 2014

Prove to yourself that you are a valuable person by focusing on the way others appreciate you.

I was reading these lines on the internet about a protester from Kiev. Volodymyr Parasiuk, aged 26, gave a powerful speech Friday night before the Euromaidan and the Ukrainians now believe that the words of that young man convinced Viktor Yanukovych to flee the city.

With Vitali Klitschko, the boxing heavyweight world champion looking over his shoulder, the 26-year-old native of Lviv climbed on a stage in Independence Square in Kiev and denounced the agreement reached by foreign ministers of Poland, France and Germany with Viktor Yanukovych, warning them that "they are shaking hands with a murderer."

In a strong and emotional speech, the young man announced that no one would be waiting for the expected elections set for December 2014. Yanukovych should leave town before morning or face the consequences, warned the young man Friday evening. Yanukovych left Kiev shortly thereafter. *

Leadership: Are you your own reference to what it means to get out of an scenario lived with emotion, at the crossroads of options for arranging events that transpire regardless of your will?

The way in which you exercise your qualities, especially your power of influence established by the relationship with the only honest supervisor – the public, reflects that part of you, that negative or positive impulse that you impose upon yourself when you want to obtain the change of others. The power of influence is based on that agreement that dwells upon your personality renovation by the force of presence and the live testimony related to those deeds, facts, circumstances, of which you learned of directly. But you can find yourself excluded from the circle of trust, no matter the majority of votes you have.

Sharing the opinion of other people vis-à-vis the current realities and future prospects, sensing the assumptions on which they build budget ideals in the much larger circle of their possibilities of materialization, with progress of aspirations and sometimes with depths of regret, you do nothing more than help both parties. For them, you determine them to believe that life can be changed, and for you, you manage to have a powerful impact on them.

Thus, you are your own reference to what it means to get out of an scenario lived with great struggle and emotion. A scenario in which you are not the one who chooses the setting of the world, but you can interpret it based on your own horizons of expectation, based on the judgement and conscience you possess and want to transmit.

Leadership: Do you catch yourself in the struggle with making a decision based exclusively on the processing of facts of reality, setting a deadline for what you can do through the human side of the hero who represents you?

Think about what you would do if you would get to argue with people on the "upwards-downwards" approach – you are able to determine the urgent needs of their area of interest, but you are not able to determine the only reason for why you chose to be at their side. But the worst is to not know in which category you fit in.

Are you one of those contributors to change that pay taxes to leadership by exercising certain pressures of affective and moral order over others? Are you maybe one of those people that only craves Likes?

Or are you one of those leaders that focus on the way in which others appreciate them, showing a serious and confident attitude over the reparation of that construction malfunction of a "high traffic road" cause by an ineffective and obtuse leadership?

A prisoner in the struggle to make a decision based exclusively on the processing of the facts of reality is a hero who has learned to overcome the risks and pains, enduring the consequences of reality, finding a soul balm in the face of truth that does not allow it to be silent. And an obtuse leadership only takes into account the stakes of the exposed truths, but not their revelation that can produce the inner revival.

The human side of the hero who represents you may have as an essence the purpose-based thinking when he projects what should be tomorrow in a setting of values that are imposed only on the basis of the truth approached in a consensus of public opinion.

The Inspiring Effluvia Of A Free Mind highlights that ability of the leader to emit an enormous amount of "vibration" of motivational, moral, spiritual and rational order, designed to directly stimulate the active participation of people in a comprehensive process of change.

The Intangible Treasury Of The Finest Senses

On June 20, 2012

Perfect the knowledge of your own ego your own self by contemplating thoughts born of true experiences that only in appearance seem to be the same as yours.

It seemed to be a secret law of my life, terrible by its provisions, but applicable and tacitly accepted by my ego. Each time the road that I was taking led me beyond the long-sought mysteries, old and significant of the soul's alchemy, opening realms, which spontaneously I had never dared to break them.

A whole world, new, hard to understand in terms of the two types of relationships: direct and indirect, and of the two links: temporal and causal, was born. A world more and more alert, fuller by issuing the finest impulses, by generating very high frequency waves by a totalizing transmitter. That was connecting to the network tangled of perceptions, representations, relationships and reactions, which were manifesting almost simultaneously. I could not remove them, not even stop from their speed. I was trapped in high voltage cables of an inexhaustible source of energy. And irresistible.

It was a world that was not meant to be real, like the one of Par Lagerkvist. In which, I had to experience a little of all, to check what would become and where it might lead. It was a kind of workshop, a field of experience, in which new characters constantly wove threads of a new reality. They gain new rights, new features, and new states of mind that characterized the proper mode of a real person. I came to know myself better. More and more intrigues, backstage games, suspense, tangled threads were clarifying, turning into a long feature script, more or less optimistic. Into a "The neverending story".

Stephen King or Marion Zimmer Bradley would have envied me beyond measure, trying to imagine something beyond their knowledge. Like some simple mortals who try to imagine the Universe.

Leadership: Does the opportunity to explore new areas of information processing that you have at your disposal allow you to distinguish aspects that redefine the value of elements of the type "introspective rationality" in building a new reality?

Just as the Wizard of Oz, with a pair of scissors cut a small square hole in the left of the Tin Man's chest, placing inside a tiny silk heart, I attached a "distinguishing mark" for each character to which I assigned unique qualities, transcendental, superior, by offering a complex role in the mosaic of changes, interactions, connections with the past, present and future.

With a single effort of imagination, I awoke all the senses that put in motion the installation called "life". With a single touch of magic wand, I gave a new form to their ego, an extra life, and of energy. A bizarre way to create a world. With one condition: to be vigilant.

I was heading into immeasurable, as a man desiring to enjoy his eyes and soul with the most magnificent panoramic views of a city lost and never seen by thousands of years, comes to do almost anything.

Introspective rationality results from exposing one's own experiences to different experiences of encompassing within acts of creation many special things from several angles. In other words, what you are trying to discover about yourself must be a projection of the imagination that can change the reality you are going to experience.

With the boldness of the most skilled mountain climber, I turned on the great ascension towards a higher dimension - the alchemy of the soul, the purest form of matter transformation from which is constituted the human being, the factory of the most exquisite persuasive preparations, the intangible treasury of the finest senses, the highest peak of the mastery to be yourself.

I wanted to acquire a more detailed knowledge; more nuanced of the human nature, to get a possession of the most hidden resources, by the discernment, even temporarily, of the mechanisms which determine the human individuality. Nevertheless, without letting myself at their will, without plunging too deep into their darkness. I did not want to lose myself so much in them, as to be transformed by them.

However, leadership implies transformation. And the alchemy of the soul, the hardest to get bastion, the most coveted, through which wants to be turned all of the human ego, was the only means by which could be achieved this rapid transformation. Even, it was hardly applicable.

Leadership: Can you cast a look upon your life from a great height so that you decipher the meaning of an evolution determined by the intensity with which you correlate the means of expression of an image that is meant to be framed in an "Open Space" type area?

Leadership, the real engine of performance, not that "commercial activity" of implementing a temporary change just to quickly ensure a certain high position, prioritize the existence of an objective reality regarding the human ego. For everything he invent, all that gives him some expressiveness, a certain authority, is projected and reflected in the representations it makes about life, reported to a palpable reality. However, in a greater or lesser extent also in the ego of those which are led.

What I want to say, in simpler words, is that leadership cultivates a certain kind of values , an entire horizon of perspectives, perceptions, representations, relationships and reactions, allowing your own development. The art of self-discovery implies to understand that the opposition between what is profound and what is not, between what you are and what you want to be. And this is discovered, is learned, and is used only with the consent of your own self.

In the act of knowledge, in this kind of backbone that continually supports your leadership, whose extremities are soundly fixed to the personality that defines you, the self most reliable fulfills the reality for which you were programmed to manage and coordinate.

Leadership becomes "cheap" when the self performs an unnecessary function, like a digital camera clogged by many setting, which do not have a purpose. For the self develops its own individuality, acquiring a certain form, on the extent of your personal striving, towards perfection.

Open Space is a distinct process of information processing and use that focuses on expanding perceptions of reality transposed into a work of art called "the soul of the world", from which a new being emerges.

The untouchable treasury of the finest senses is the inner heritage of each of us, which we acquired, earned and increased our whole life, and which can provide a special aura to our leadership.

A performing leadership depends not only of the leader, but also of other people. It depends on the inner heritage of everyone. Discover and rediscover the man and his own self, and at some point you might say: "Ecce Homo".

And so you can easily sort people into three categories: those that help you and develop together with you, the indifferent and inadaptable ones, and those who do not want or cannot change themselves and pull you down.

The Intense Echo Beyond Death

On October 27, 2013

Turn On the engine equipped with an autonomous filter of intuition, in order to achieve that powerful thinking that goes beyond reason.

In the face of a corpse everything becomes ridiculous. Especially if the rotational axis of the thoughts passes through the center of gravity of an opposing force, that has something to say. But one that can be perceived only by a mind in which a new property manifests itself: thinking beyond reason.

Clarice Starling surprisingly observes – a result of an attention stemming from a priori experience – that something can still be found in the corpse's mouth. And this something asks to be uncovered, searched to the last crevice of the being sheltering the mighty fortress of truth enclosed by thick walls. Does she suspect anything, or is it just her imagination?

Thus, she is trapped in a narrow area of control, in which the contact points with reality are just tangential, intersecting only on the evolved territory of a profound mind. This is what is killing Clarice. And, at the same time, gives her life. To start a blind search for a support surface to match some puzzle pieces.

In an instant, Clarice changes the rules of the hide and seek game she was involved in during the investigation. Enticed, she wanders through an underground labyrinth, a huge and endless one, beyond the realm of death, with the unwavering determination of a chemist who makes his experiments in a rigorous manner.

Leadership: Can you highlight the image of a totality of homogeneous elements that form the meaning of a correlation between what you know, what is seen and the novelty discovered as a consequence of life situations that require certain knowledge and skills?

You could say this lifeless body, found in a state of putrefaction, generates a force of immeasurable energy that is contained in the segment of time that can open the gates of the soul. Or rather, those gates of perception that lead to the depths of the subconscious. It seems to emit invisible radiation that is absorbed by Clarice's hunter of echoes instinct.

This body, rigid and inert, offers some clues that need to be pursued and investigated, new secrets, new details and aspects of how the crime was committed. As if being provided with special transmitters whose waves are intercepted by the finest senses. At an instinctive level, Clarice puts it all together.

Two forces interact, attracting each other like magnets – a force coming from the depths and a force of feeling that picks up the diffused signal from the intermediary discharge circuit of the life giving energy. At a subconscious level, between Clarice and the body without a heartbeat a communication beyond death takes place, an invisible bond that modifies the state of some of the elements of her way of thinking.

Leadership: Can you capitalize on the experience you have gained in years of professional activity in a "I demand Justice" context, whose causality echoes at a fixed point where an order can begin?

Of all the cops in the room, only she, Clarice, has developed such a sense of observation. It seems that she is the only one placed near the emissions stemming from the inert body, small particles of energy that propagate undetectably in the form of rays in all directions. Only she perceives the low frequency pulses designed to penetrate only a warm heart with a strong will.

This freak event does not seem too crazy. For, indeed, the coroner's photo does not capture the frames in a lively way. That which is untangled, the thread of the whole ordeal, only the inner voice can fix.

The deafening roar of the spirit greatly frightens Clarice's heart: "I demand justice ! " An echo whose processing pushes the mind's power to extremes, making it possible to detect those elements and strong clues, necessary to catch the criminal. A single fixed point of Clarice's professional evolution, from where an order of superior logic can begin, can give reality (experienced through coercion) a new meaning: that any novelty in terms of facts and life situations may leave room for a compensation of strength and personal assertion.

Leadership: Do you understand that the undertaking of what you are experiencing through professional considerations may have the consistency of a psychological phenomenon called "a defining moment of life"?

Clarice experiences a defining moment of life that is tumultuous, deployed in her consciousness as a kind of echo beyond death, which opens another perspective on the events that she considers of major importance to the case. She suspects that the deceased was a close friend of Buffalo Bill's murderer, and not just that, but that he was part of a larger experiment that is still in full swing.

Leadership enters the field of primordial Human Resources – patience, understanding and acumen, to help him internalize beliefs like "I am capable". And to acquire skills which ultimately guarantee excellence in making decisions aiming to put together tangible and credible truths, in order to set up a new vision.

And this focus on the essences and not on the contraries, this vision springing from a microcosm of thoughts and feelings that turns the interest and attention towards a higher level of knowledge and understanding, depends on the dividing line between what man believes to be "normal" and "abnormal". Between what happens in one respect and something that cannot happen.

Leadership can be imposed as a prospective solution for the rehabilitation of the infrastructure of thought and action, not as an option that buries the truth or limits the potential in achieving professional perfection.

Depending on the way in which the leader responds to the observations determined by the omission of some facts that negatively influenced the course of events, reviewed under a lot of aspects, he will be able to apply new thinking to the design and functionality of leadership. Customized and modified to meet the desired end: the power to overcome oneself.

Leadership: Can the truths of life that you extract from a known fact to establish an unknown fact be formulated when it is too late to matter?

In order to recognize an indisputable truth, you must have a fine lever, a fact that has happened and has every chance of repeating itself.

In Clarice's case, the truth that eluded her every time is able to bring important information, but that can no longer change the past, it cannot resurrect the dead. She realizes this, and conscience repeats it as a Chinese gong, that what matters is not just the capture of the murderer, but the prayer for the dead (victims ill-treated with bestiality) that would relieve her of any sadness and give her the strength to release herself from the memories of their image.

A force coming from the depths and a force of feeling – are the two key points of the guidance infrastructure of the leader, built more under a convention of fundamental objectives of its research and the unpredictable effects that they have on the assessment of the situation itself.

In order to dismantle that limited thinking that stems from observations and premises that everyone agrees with, not having a background formed by individual sensations and complex and extremely refined perceptions, he must direct his attention sequentially towards an aspect that is ignored or neglected. And then to correct it.

Search well, future leader ! Search between the two rivers that cross their streams between truth and doubt. Go on the search of deep satisfaction that can calm your curiosity; that can ease your unbearable weight of obligations undertaken with great courage.

Turn on the engine equipped with the filter of the finest intuition and engage yourself in the insane match between the points of view too little grounded. Do not settle for the reality that the pillar of support of research indicates. Change the rules for the hide and seek game you are involved in during the course of your own evolutionary journey.

Leadership is a defining moment of your life, corresponding to phases of development where emotional or behavioral stimuli are dependent on strong connections with those you could not help.

The Intense Echo Beyond Death highlights the necessity of researching the elements seemingly insignificant for a limited thinking. And to address them in a particular way, obtaining clues that others cannot find.

A counsel for you, future leader: research and dwell upon, but do so without losing the essence of things.

The Interdependency Principle

On May 29, 2010

When a person betrays the leader's trust, he also notches his confidence in his ability to lead.

In 2008, the laboratory of a great hospital decided to get certification. Because the technical manager has already been appointed, the hospital management had to assign a reliable person to be the QMR (Quality Management Responsible). A tough choice, because such a position requires professionalism, perseverance and verticality. From the small collective of specialists with higher studies in the laboratory, one person, Bogdan M., volunteered for this position which requires time and competence. The technical manager, as well as the hospital management, accepted.

Although in the previous years there were some differences of opinion between the technical management and Bogdan M., they still started drafting the general procedures. With the aid of a consultant specialized in this field, until the end of 2008, more than half of the procedures were drafted.

But in 2009, because of the financial restrictions in the entire hospital, set by higher forums, the consultancy for the credit was stopped. Not having any other choice, the technical management of the laboratory decided to implement the already drafted general procedures and which were possible with large financial investment from the hospital.

Things are usually judged by their consequences. Just when the laboratory was confronted with the greatest problem, the technical manager saw Bogdan M.'s opposition, who would, under any circumstance, not want to get involved in the certification process. Immediately after having realized that the tasks at hand have multiplied and became harder, he quit his position.

If he had stopped there, he would not have made that much of a harm. But he didn't stop there and incited the personnel against the technical manager, he destabilized the fragile balance in the laboratory, even getting to make difficulties for the technical manager., the consequence being the inability to continue the certification process, as well as the creation of a negative opinion among the laboratory collective in regard to the certification and this QMR position, which was refused by everybody.

Leadership: Are you constrained by the need of the continuity of commitments assumed to place yourself significantly below the standard of your own expression: "What was a gain I counted as a loss of measure"?

Confident people reveal themselves in uncertain conditions. What could the cause of this spiritual oddity determining the man with an important position to get free of any obligations and refuse to take the responsibilities he has when the situation becomes critical and, furthermore, rebel against the very helping hand, with no regrets?

Probably the lack of experience, professionalism, inability to find solutions to tough problems in critical moments, added to falsity and hypocrisy. When a man promises you honesty, but he rewards you dishonestly, when he promises loyalty, but rewards you with adversity by creating difficulties, inciting great hatred among everybody against you, you have no choice: you either quit your position, or get rid of him.

The idea of complementarity, solidarity and the feeling of unity totally lacks the people who are not pleased with a secondary role or who don't have the strength to take responsibility for their own decisions or actions in the case of an eventual turn of events. Such a man, no matter how much respect he would get, he will disappoint you with no remorse exactly when you most need him. In this case, as well, the weight that must be carried, heavy like the entire world, you will have to lift it up and carry it all the way all by yourself.

The measure of your value is lost when you want to demonstrate your value progressively in a context of confrontation with an opposition that challenges your true Self. That self that rationally encompasses only when you start consuming yourself in order to accomplish your mission.

Leadership is grounded as a reaction to the transition to a new maturity stage when the authentic in what you want to represent does not express an attitude of denial to what goes beyond your limits.

The autonomy given by the personal example does not match the definitions given to the pride in case of a change of situation. It hits a barrier called lack of experience that stops you from communicating naturally with others, a barrier you fortify with your views of who is right and who is wrong at the point where you are guilty of everything.

When there is malevolence, grudge, carelessness, hypertrophied vanity, success cannot be obtained. If, for one reason or another, a member of your team starts to make difficulties for you with an incredible fierceness, with the utmost rancor... small stitches, but many and with no stopping... you cannot but feel the chill of disaster through your entire body, you feel being pulled down, that life leaves you and, as a result, you lose your energy and confidence in your own strength.

You wish they couldn't influence you, you wish you made him stop, but if he continues and doesn't stop until he sees you forceless, what can you do? Well, in this case, you have but two choices: you either resign or continue doing by yourself everything, which is very difficult.

Before understanding leadership, you have to go through the most difficult part of the accused's experience: to assume a guilt for which you first punish yourself, subconsciously and morally.

As a leader, you must prove unprecedented tenacity in following your goal. But without trustworthy people, you will never be able to get too far. You must trust in them, deep inside your being, rely on their words and on their support at need. But, at the same time, you must prepare yourself spiritually for new battles, Because not always things will be so well as you imagine, and the real human nature doesn't let itself discovered that easy. Some people may cause stagnation and not progress.

P.S. A leader's success totally depends on the quality of the people he leads.

The Internalization Of A Creative Experience

On September 25, 2020

You must always keep in mind a certain intrinsic linearity of the visual before exploring the spirituality of your own nature in a space of creation.

The creation is the result of a work from which you have to gain moods of immortalized places and elements, or it is like a long sleeve that you always pull up to the elbow to get a different look. Creation is an hourglass in which you put sand and someone must always turn it, but in time, so as not to lose his symbolic body. Of course, in order to come to understand all this you have to know how to look in the right direction, and this is like seeing a rare bird flying in the sky, it flies and everything seems created by an architect, as if someone were urged to float between heaven and earth.

Yes, creation and God bring together all the qualities of a being whose sensitizing dimension is always active, defined by purity, candor and light, and the criticisms in this direction are sometimes sharp, sometimes conscientious. We can't make a hierarchy about it; we should be either harsh or clairvoyant. What we prefer to know about creation is as a development of the seasons of the soul. Physical movement is an elementary expression of life, it results in an inner dynamism as a capturing of healthy living.

Creation is silent before it becomes famous, sometimes it is silent because no one notices its value. All silences have something in common, they are a kind of revolt of images that, although we do not want to, always appear in our minds... some silences annul, others suggest, and others make us live a poetic life.

Yes, silence is an unwritten book, but pawned, and the creation also awaits its poetry, just as the poet seeks his most sublime words to describe the world in which he retired. We notice that in all the painted paintings there is a pronounced, sensitive, tender exuberance, full of mystery and metaphors, like a poem, sometimes it strangles the fine tastes, sometimes it produces frenzy. Here, too, there is a softening of life, as a purification of the lines of force of the poetic language that gains in elegance through a finesse of the taste for artistic writing, from which BEAUTY results. Of course, the creator is not a puppet from which words flow, it is rather like a window through which today you see something and tomorrow nothing.

Leadership: Does your creative experience give you the certainty that the place that contains your degree of spirituality determines the organization of the perception regarding the reflection of your personality in other personalities?

From creation you can go further, to perfection, the latter being like a value note sent in white: it depends on who values you, how decisive and effective it is. But, more often, the creation can manifest itself as a color that catches your eye only if it is executed technically and if it is a beautiful and modern interpretation of future trends in art. And the perfection that is reached is just a lively description of the length and consistency of the color, sometimes it is the real state of the beloved artist, other times it is hard to believe, all related to situations at different times.

Remember the famous English painter William Blake. He manifested himself as a dreamer and visionary as a child: he once saw a tree full of angels; later, in the cathedral of Westminster, the ancient kings of England appeared to him, and until his old age he was surrounded by creatures from the world of imagination, in a mystical illusion. He was not deprived of the chance to learn from his own pictorial experience, and he learned that everything that can be seen in the creative space is a reflection of his personality in other personalities, which in art can crystallize as a kind of finding the correspondences between Self and Super-Ego, or between Matter and Spirit.

In my opinion, there is no doubt that God would not exist without art and creation, I admit this aspect as a fairly solid basis. I have often felt that someone or something has taken me from the sun and secured me a place in the shade, thus being put in the guise of an artist working according to the so-called intuition – he knows how suddenly and unexpectedly a form invented by him begins to displease him, as Kandinsky said.

Yes, we live in God's arms if we have Him in us and it is not difficult to accept empathy, kindness, faith, acceptance, unwritten laws – even in shadowy conditions, they all empower us as human beings if we feel the artistic in nature, and God's warm soul in the sun's rays.

In terms of spirituality, my personality as a writer can become the reflection of another personality when my self is developed or aspires to develop at the level of an artist who feeds on the euphoria of creation and manages to turn his creation into the expression of a divine will.

Being an artist yourself is not about boldness or courage. Do you know how different people can behave in different life situations? Nothing in art is harsh with anyone, people live, succeed in life, only death and nonsense do not change. Art is always taken to another level, while creation is revealed as a coherent speech of God with people. Therefore, man is a jewel of precious stone if it reaches the right hands, if it is finished with the right tools.

It is no less true that any creation is always explained by lines and colors, by imagination and originality. What's the point of telling me that you see yourself as an artist and that, somehow, you lack art? It's your problem how you see yourself in front of the easel. Maybe you're just living, and life sometimes seems like an unopened letter.

The Internalization Of A Creative Experience is a consequence of man's ability to use a part of his senses, feelings, thoughts, to contribute to universal harmony and to reach that exaltation of the idea of human perfection. Art means creation, man means interiority, and any creation is manifested through the interiority we are dealing with in the context of the correspondence between Self and Super-Ego, or between Matter and Spirit.

From all this I wanted to highlight the BEAUTIFUL, but not any beauty, rather that beauty of the fictional, of the feeling that I am part of another existence, much more lavish and more provocative than a normal man can imagine.

The Internalization Of A Spiritual Experience

On October 07, 2020

An artist in the use of symbolic representations needs an afterlife to be able to explore and understand his distinct dreams in almost divine terms.

If someone had told me, in a dream of divine inspiration, that one day I would embrace the highest knowledge, santa conoscenza d'altri tempi, even at the moment of possessing a secret that gives meaning to my life, maybe I would have thought of myself as a saint. And if the same someone had transposed himself into a talking rose, symbolizing the attribute in which the Creator is revealed, then perhaps my perpetual becoming would have been written like the 1001 Nights: with that continuity of sand grains that reorganizes constantly the dune architecture of an oriental story.

Now I am sure that this was the hand of chance, to which it is enough to refer in writing or painting, with pen or brush, as if I were trying to see the effects of the Flower of Life drawn in comparison with the printed symbol of Vitruvian Man. Everything was revealed in a dream to the one whose light would pass undivided, through UNITY, in the mystical narrative of the adventure of a soul on its way to the completion of an overall picture of phenomenal reality. And this soul is sensitive to the dominant and innovative tendencies of art, because it has obtained all the appreciation of the Creator even before entering this world.

Science is the result of the meeting between the artistic object and the artist, under the mantle of sanctifying a painting that has become emblematic.

I readily admit this. Like any dreamer who has been struck by a passion for art, I believe that I carry in me the spirit of another dreamer who encourages a passion for science. No wonder the origin of the words written by me with an enchanted pen is found in one of the points of the theme "El Por Siempre Ahora" that the artist displays in proportions, volumes and color, to outline a suggestive portrait of the saints from the discipline of sensitivity and imagination by reason.

Leadership: What does your creation express from the height of a gaze that indulges in the requirement to reveal certain sides of reality in the spirit of a "symbiotic" perspective?

If the artist's brush does not link these points with a light color, then the writer's words will have spiritual emptiness and provide negative meanings, and the writer's vision will be lost in vain. Therefore, the pen and the brush are complementary to a theme of revitalizing art with new themes of expression, but only if they have a common origin: "The unseen hand that controls chance."

Why am I so sure that this is the true understanding of my sense of being in the middle of the artistic avant-garde of the present moment? Because whoever looks carefully at my writing, as only the brush can comprehend its coefficient of value, its dynamic aspect and its authentic character, will be able to capture the measure of an exceptional creation stretched over centuries as a perpetual becoming of the artistic phenomenon. The easel is proud of my art, just as I am proud of God's Grace to penetrate His action into an entire Universe.

In the case of an adjustable, comprehensive easel, stretched with the measure of classical painting, so necessary to render an art of dream life, in a cosmografia del minor mondo, I consider that any brush that encompasses it from one end to the other starts from the tip of an enchanted pen, full of mysterious whispers translated into verbal mysteries, which writes in another dimension.

Yes, the dream prophesied to me the victory of the sciences, In nomine Patris et Filii, Spiritus Sancti, obtained first by the force of the pure word, deeply meaningful, strongly spoken, placed in the space of beauty in the form of a vision of nature and man of a great beauty and plastic nobility. No wonder my creation expresses that relative state of concordance between experiencing and living a union of the soul with God through polyvalent artistic grace.

Leadership: Does the knowledge that favors the evolution of your art manifest itself visibly in the sense that, by living a direct experience of the mystery of God, man recognizes himself as the image of a distinct reality?

The reason for why my pen rejects certain parts of literature and approves others of the art of painting, is to clarify and draw attention to the fact that any brush, touching the easel with divine mastery, is found in the form of Axis Mundi, mediating contact with the Heavens and with eternal life. Especially the brush, governing and strongly influencing the artistic field, can permeate in the memory of time a new conception and thinking, just as the pen succeeds in literature.

In the case of writing, my passion leads me to Mesa Selimovic's writing, built in honor of a story experience, in such a way that I feel lost in the thoughts of the young dervish Ahmed Nurudin, in a moment of wandering:

"I threw myself blindly, with delight and passion, into combating the mysticism of Ibn-Areba, realizing, perhaps for the first time, that the heavens and mysteries of the universe, the mysteries of death and being are the most suitable realm in which you can refuge from earthly worries. If they did not exist, they would have to be invented as a shelter. Or, in the verses of Ibn-Areba it is said that only the elect, only the few, are given to know the divine wisdom."

And what do I have left, reading these? It remains for me to know what I can comprehend with the brush on the easel, conversing more with the brush, as well as with the easel, on the same subject: extracting words and expressions from the painting technique I have in the work. Given the combined action of several agents, including the "fast pace of execution", it is necessary to visibly expand the understanding of the meaning of symbols using as a decoding tool a pen whose property is to purify ideas, strengthen, capture and introduce the energy of the Absolute in the aura of a perfect artist.

The brush also opens in front of the soul of the pen, capturing in color, discreetly, that moment of feeling that I would like to keep forever, bringing to attention the technique of geometrizing a divine face. I know that I can't be caught in any image by anyone you might want to look for in the world, but that's the way it is with a great writing artist: it only gives his pen a chance to build a real image, from thoughts, words, silences, and their paradoxical way of later joining the Father in the divine act of producing other Sons.

A man who recognizes himself as the image of a distinct reality is an artist who associates the elements of visual expression (point, line, color, shape, plane) with living a direct experience of the mystery of God, from which he learned the virtue of uniting "an existence with an essence".

The Internalization Of A Spiritual Experience focuses on the aspect of uniqueness represented by the connection formed between a cognitive, elementary activity, which creates symbols, and the intensity of the soul connection between two worlds: a world of writing and a world of infinite possibilities and ways of artistic expression.

Interpretation Of Dreams

On December 01, 2013

Whoever believes in dreams had better watch reality first and then dream again.

Anhat came to him early in the morning to lead him to the Great Soothsayer. Asked if he had had a peaceful or restless sleep, if the god had inspired him, Cheops told him honestly what he had dreamed. In this way, he was forced to confess his love for this girl. Perhaps he could or should have concealed his secret passion from Anhaf, but since he had been appointed his spiritual guide, the one who was to accompany him on the way to the knowledge of the god, to guide him through the labyrinth, Cheops he did not imagine that he could hide from her the reality of his thoughts, starting the collaboration with lies or simple negligence. In the House of Life he had been instilled with the feeling that even the omission of a truth was an offense to Maat, considered cheating.

- Cheops, master, Imhotep's son then said to him, if you dreamed of this girl, it means that this is what the god wanted. Surely it was a sign from him. But in order to know if such a love is something good or something bad, you must also see what her behavior was in your dream. Did he seem to reciprocate your love? How did he treat you?

Leadership: Do you think that a vague experience in which the outline of reality fades in front of an intangible phenomenon reflects your unfulfilled desire to see the future more clearly through an unexpected revelation?

- Things are very vague to me now. But I remember that I wanted several times to kiss her, to hold her in my arms, but I couldn't, every time she was hiding or, rather, she was just a cloud, an intangible thing, after which I saw her again far away , although I thought she was stuck to me.

- I am not good at interpreting dreams, but we will be able to present your dream to the Great Soothsayer, as well as to the priest who interprets the god's dreams. I see that Hathor the Golden One has put love for this girl in your heart; however, the fact that, in your dream, he hid himself, that you only managed to catch a cloud in your arms, this announces a worrying sign. However, I feel that if you decide to make her the second mistress of your possessions, no one will be able to stop you.

- Only one person could do it: my father. He is the king.

Leadership: Are you trying to decipher how moral criteria become visual outlines of truths, even if they appear in an ambiguous and diffuse way?

A visionary tries to base essential knowledge on moral criteria and self-evident truths, even if it seems rather ambiguous. Vague things are the hardest to decipher. However, the obvious truths are due to cultural relativism and the psychology of the masses of people, gullible most of the time in the face of any "evidence". In fact, every sign in our life must be interpreted sincerely to discover a truth related to the divine will, but at the same time, we must be aware of the pitfalls of our subjective interpretation.

And the examples can continue in the same sense, a fact that illustrates, contrary to any opinions, the existence of a fundamental requirement, of a general principle of rationality, which transcends the various known barriers and generates the opening of the path to knowledge. Acknowledging a deep feeling can be a necessary step in aligning with the cosmic order, but at the same time it can be a trap of the mystical order, because true knowledge is based on discernment and reason.

Leadership: Can your aspiration to reveal a principled rationality shape a new imaginative representation of reality despite the barriers imposed by cultural relativism and the visual perception of the often impressionable masses?

Transparency in the relationship with spirit guides is crucial for personal evolution. Nowadays, the soothsayer is no longer the man who interprets dreams, but the visionary who knows how to see beyond the limits, a mentor who guides his team towards new horizons, managing to put many ideas into practice because he never thinks about failure.

Therefore, the decision to "clone" some dreams, just to transform reality, seems to be an irrational act because it is carried out arbitrarily, without assuming any important merit. In this case, the principle of rationality that gives dreams only a mediocre importance, even if it does not guarantee the moral success of your actions, can still indicate those situations in which you can no longer act with full knowledge of the cause.

The immediate conclusion in this case is that you cannot decide to make a change unless you know what you are doing. Whoever believes in dreams had better watch reality first and then dream again.

Leadership can represent a vision of truth if it maintains a delicate balance between clear expression and visibility hidden in the shadows of relativism.

The interpretation of dreams refers to the interpretation and understanding of their meaning in the context of your life, related to a phenomenon of knowledge that has the following saying: "Reality is the power by which knowledge is constituted."

The Intervenient's Handcraft Mark

On May 01, 2013

Try to anticipate the reactions that depend on people's sensitivity, so that you can intervene in the expansion of their evolution.

No feeling, no emotion, no thought rustles so strongly in the retort of Laura Quinn's existence in order to reduce her resentments and frustrations. For the first time, the typhoon of change tries to rip her from the state of indecision where she had been laying for a while. The relation in which her functionality state is comprised can be written as: contempt + negative stimuli = adverse reaction.

The truth that saddens man is the suffering he cannot accept as an utter absurd fatality. The news Mr. Hobbs delivers, that she could get fired, throw a sharper look in the shadows that hide the truth, revealing that imbalance, the black flag of her own emptiness. The decomposing speed reaction of inanimate matter, acting over the activation energy of the intrinsic conductor is accelerated. In a moment, the wall that shapes her personality starts shaking.

Laura receives with obvious inconvenience the news that the leaders of the company are planning to fire her. There's something caving in inside her, like a foreign body had gotten hold of her, the white cells being incapable to fight with the viral aggression. Indecision aggravates her mental state. Her heart acknowledges despair. The self control she's trying so hard to preserve, like a sterile drape on a deep open wound can't be kept under control any longer. The burden of an artificially maintained dignity slips from her shoulders. The gavel in her heart nervously intensifies its beat. The gong, which announces the coming of a crisis, sounds scarier still.

A chemical system maintains its constant volume until a burn reaction is produced. Laura can't hide her hate, amplified by the troubling news she received. Tormented, the small tyrant inside her, who has a hold over everything, can't contain himself. He erupts with a maximum effect, on one hand paralyzing, on the other hand irritating and disturbing. "How do you know all this about me? How could you?"

Leadership: Does the whole measure of your value focus on building an original image of yourself, expressed through the consciousness of a spiritual tumult containing a high spiritual thought?

At this point we don't recognize Laura as a perfect entity anymore, but more like a being made out of flesh, blood and nerves, created for pain and revenge. All protest, distrust and awareness forms awaken inside of her, and the energy of her entire being vertiginously consumes. Her A+B characteristic constants, self-love and self-respect seem to lose themselves.

"I only want to help you. I am the only one you can trust. And you are the only one I can rely on. Our future is at stake." says Mr. Hobbs – the person who braids the hairs of the present and future, the person who understands the most significant particularities of her being, the expansion laws of her evolution, with the same self-assurance of a chemist who sets the laws of time expansion for chemical reactions.

Her restless thinking, but at the same time subjected to a high spiritual force, has to do with a sort of escape from a sad and deserted life, continuing to warn her: "Be much more than you are now, be more open to alternatives and reveal yourself as a defense act against any suffering."

A high spiritual consciousness is the cover of a determined and unwavering personality that manages to make certain things possible by self-updating the mentality to the possibilities of the future.

Leadership: Can you experience everything from the amazement of the victory of a thinking focused on the analysis of destiny, in which the Ego reveals itself as an attempt to balance the relationship between what is offered to you and what you can take yourself?

Daring to act over her with a different reaction force of the same size and direction, but with opposite meaning, Mr. Hobbs raises a great psychical and emotional edifice, incomparable with any other construction in her existential structure. For Laura to interact with the functional group that's still free within herself, untouched by the beam of absolute restlessness, he's trying to drastically reduce the psychical suspension conditioned by the conversion of her being from the true to the false value.

In the middle there's the deepest, inner voice that whispers Laura, showing her there is a middle way. Now more than ever, she needs to escape the immutable state that torments her, before her soul precipitates in the darkest pits of the unreachable. To totally transform the excessive X-reactant that during her angriness reaction tends to deplete her resources. To adapt to new antigenic stimuli and through the antibodies it produces to defend herself from her own decisions and negative thoughts. Don't do anything rash.

Step forward, Laura ! Step without any hesitation on the road towards happiness and complete joy ! The victory of her thinking of destiny has as a landmark the contestation of any regret for the deeds to come, the absence of any excuses, of any scruples. But at the same time, when Mr. Hobbs offers a helping hand to change her course of destiny, she accepts any risk, being aware that acting alone, or without stepping on the flames of a sure-footed idea, no one can guarantee it a certain stability necessary for the performance of sustaining herself financially.

Leadership: Can you turn the purpose of your personal development into the guarantee of a spiritual provision that contains a spiritual thought, expectation and hope, in accordance with the relationship between consequences and punishment?

Changing a man depends mostly on the leadership the intervenient applies. By adding some foreign elements and retouches, he can gently modify the characteristics of the alloys man's made of, decreasing his resistance only by a few. Like professional speaker John Fuhrman confessed: "a successful leadership comes from the availability to make something incomplete or incoherent in the beginning, to suffer the consequences, then to adjust and restart – until everything works out well."

So, the intervenient has to see man not as a self-standing, moody and dominant being, neither as an inventory object given into use for his acquisition price, but as a being formed by a multitude of qualities that need to be brought to light.

He can clear his own doubts regarding his capacities to produce change; he can prove the vulnerability of his hopes in relation to the formative role of practiced leadership, when it is proven that, actually, people don't reject its incursion into their lives.

Laura Quinn needed Mr. Hobbs to build another life for herself, another future. Her spiritual provision contained a spiritual thought, expectation and hope, in accordance with the relationship between consequences and punishment: "The effort of man to measure the strength of his character consists in overcoming the moment when regret leaves a heavy footprint on his life."

The real test of man's will to change is the life he lives between doubt and regret, with the reasoning that the only absolute of his evolution is the motive of an act he can only gain from.

The intervenient's handcraft mark has premium expectations because it's harder to bankrupt it. Represent the emblem of the most cunning leader, being a value that can't be "copied" or "stolen" by competitors, an additional characteristic that helps him understand the most significant particularities of a person and the development laws of his evolution.

In order for you to intervene in the development of someone's evolution, try to anticipate the reactions dependant on their stability. Strive to totally transform the excessive X reactant, which during its negative reactions tends to deplete all their resources. Try to act over people with a different force of reaction equal in size and direction but with an opposite meaning, so that you lift a great psychical and emotional edifice, incomparable with any other construction of their existential structure.

The Intimacy Of The Soul That Transpires In The Cinematographic Scene

On July 19, 2010

Artistic leadership in cinematography involves the ability to navigate the dual forces of good and evil, transforming these internal struggles into a complex and profound visual narrative capable of resonating with audiences.

"Trying to transpose myself during the many rehearsals and filming of Ivan's embarrassing emotions, I could not shake off the feeling of physical discomfort, which made me indisposed to the highest degree."

But, going further, we note another statement of the director Sergei Eisenstein, which once again reveals to us a soulful intimacy that transpires, which is expressed through this scene. The perception of "good" and "bad" was of great importance in his childhood and led later, in obviously much more complex, more convoluted forms, to terrible internal struggles. And now, here: "these two readings proceed on an antiphon, on two voices... As a text, they seem to continue each other, but with all the external similarity between tone and tempo, between the manner of reading and rhythm, the dramatic orientation of the two readings is diametrically opposed. It is no coincidence that one of them is spoken by the fiercest enemy ... and the other by the most devoted friend."

This inner struggle of the two readings represents, as it were, the inner struggle "for the soul", and one of them, one of the readings, urges the tsar's soul to despair, gloom and death, and the other, to action and life. And, related to this, there is also in "Ivan the Terrible", as in Eisenstein's other films, the permanent theme of revenge, which always returns with the same obsessive regularity, crossing his creation from the films "Strike" and "Potemkin ", through "Que viva Mexico", to "Ivan the Terrible".

A visionary leader in cinematography knows how to orchestrate conflicting "voices" in the narrative, creating a dramatic tension that reflects deep inner conflicts.

One of the fundamental concepts in cinematography, which is important to reflect on, is the understanding of the inner struggle of heroes, that is, characters. This involves the study of emotions and their perceptions of right and wrong, which can be influenced by life experiences, to which the film only gives us brief indications, small fragments. Thus, filmmakers often use detailed psychological analysis and philosophical concepts to explore different aspects of personality and assess their interactions, similar to how Eisenstein explores the complexity of emotions in his films such as Ivan the Terrible.

Variability in tone and tempo of emotional responses is crucial to ensure effective characterisation. Because of this, Eisenstein manipulated the tone and tempo of scenes very well to create dramatic effect. In the editing process, parallel techniques are often used to compare different scenarios and to facilitate the development of a plane reflecting the reality on which the characters' lives are built. This approach allows a deep understanding of the inner struggle of the characters, also reflected in Eisenstein's creation, such as the case of Ivan, where the strongest emotions are presented with an obsessive regularity, but also in films such as "Strike" and "Potemkin", until to "Que viva Mexico".

The unique directorial style is manifested by the ability to express soul intimacies in cinematic scenes, transforming personal experiences into universal art.

The formation of emotions in the creative process is a complex phenomenon that involves psychological and artistic interactions in various conditions of transposition and perception. Sensations can crystallize through the precipitation of ideas from the subconscious or the transformation of other artistic impressions. The internal structure of the creation is determined by the arrangement of themes and motifs, which influence the dramatic and aesthetic properties of the work.

The study of the soulful intimacy of the creator provides crucial information about his personal history and the processes that shaped his artistic vision. Critics use various techniques, including analysis of recurring themes and interpretation of symbols, to examine the composition and structure of the work. In this context, the internal struggle between good and evil, like the chemical interactions in the formation of minerals, creates dramatic tensions that shape the narrative.

The thematic obsession, such as that of revenge in Eisenstein's work, can be seen as a recurring crystalline structure throughout his work, reflecting the inner pressures and 'geological' conditions of his life experience. This thematic regularity, akin to repetitive mineralogical formations, provides a key to understanding the depth and complexity of the creator's artistic vision.

The guiding thread that runs through the artist's entire creation, which simultaneously urges action and life, must emphasize the deep connection between personal emotions and the artistic message.

The soulful intimacy that transpires in the cinematic scene relates to the inner struggles of the protagonist, as these conflicts are essential to understanding the character's motivations, on the principle that the inner drama is the authentic source of the outer actions. I say this in the sense that the revelation of deep emotions creates a strong connection with the viewers, from which the emotional impact of the work on the audience is derived.

The Intimate Mechanism Of Creation

On December 31, 2015

Take on that approach of the value that takes dominance in a process of discovery, without exhausting the premises of a major investment in what remains eternal.

In his journals, Eisenstein also gives us a key to enter the mechanism of his thinking, the intimacy in which his works are born. We note how varied, how mobile this intimate mechanism of creation is. How many apparent contradictions, different hypotheses he knew not and will know not about ! How many revealing details are lost from a lack of documents. How many others, seemingly harmless, like a walk-through New York or a visit to Sing Sing, can open new windows to this universe we follow.

Eisenstein knows it and writes about it in connection with the methods of a biography of creation: *"Anecdotal details, surprises or apparent accidents must not detract from the basic recognized principles of an artistic work. Such natural details of creative biographies give a feeling of life to the described process of creation. There cannot be, certainly not, an abstract schematic, here, in the case of a process of creation pulsing with blood." ****

Leadership: With what guiding agent does the functioning key of your mechanism of thinking revolve in contact with, so that the creation you experience can reach the revelation of a double, never tried feeling?

The functioning key of the mechanism of a sophisticated thinking, ensuring the transformations that take place under the impulse of making an exceptional work, a new introduction in the field of science, revolves in contact with the guiding agent: the feeling of an inner life, at the crossroads between who you were and who you will be.

The key does not open at just any time, but in time, with toil and genius, gaining its significance only within the framework of a triple relationship, whose elements are: the awareness of being part of a larger coverage, the power to go further in an unknown direction, and the ability to use yourself to answer the calling of an artist.

So, we are dealing with the revelation of a double feeling, one never before experienced, one of astonishment and satisfaction, or of pride and wonder, when your work gains the value of a work of art, not a burdensome and repetitive task. A feeling about attaining a sense of identity in the passage of time, a kind of unity, a form of existence of a diversity that results from the consideration of several things as one.

The feeling of life that initiates the creative process can be embodied in a basic principle of artistic work only if it becomes so intense that it is perceived as a gain of the imaginative faculties, as an opportunity to develop the means of expression and skills. of aesthetic communication, as a model of dialogue of the elements of plastic language coherent and well harmonized in an original concept.

The feelings of life that characterize an artist, through whose work he gives his own beats of the heart, are: simplicity, delicacy, the inclination towards humility, compassion, imaginative force. They must not lose their hold on a revealing experience capable of causing personal change, as Stephen King's novels or Alfred Hitchcock's films often offer.

A high coverage is given by that approach of the value that takes dominance in a process of discovery, under the influence of a vivid impression of real, the sensation of stepping, as if by a miracle, beyond the screen, without exhausting the premises of a major investment in what remains eternal. And for the reproduction of a subject of research to be successful, the positive image of what you try to suggest must focus on the "retina" of the existence of a deterministic world.

In turn, this world, bound to the intimate mechanism of creation, can be the expression of apparent contradictions, different hypotheses concerning evolution. And what can open new windows towards the mystic unity of this world are anecdotal details, surprises or apparent accidents. These can give a feeling of life to the described process of creation.

The discovery of the artistic path, from the character to the event, must ensure a maximum of human experience (from the collective to the most intimate social aspects), in order to provide an adequacy of the artistic means to the visual specificity of the addressed subject.

The Intimate Mechanism Of Creation represents the interaction between the background effects of discovering a new world and introducing it within the field of science, in contact with the guiding agent: the feeling of an inner life. This feeling is at the basis of artistic work.

The Invisible Fire From A Soul Possessed By Greatness

On March 23, 2014

Leave a free path for the affirmation of your value and uniqueness, intervening on the capacity of expanding consciousness that gives transparency to internal and external movements.

The Last Legion of the French army was nothing more than a handful of men, deprived of ammunition, and was commanded by the unknown officer named Cambronne. An English General calls out: "Brave Frenchmen, surrender ! " Cambronne seeks a word, as one would seek a sword. He feels within him a foam and that foam is the word. Then, supported by an eruptive inner force, responds to the Englishmen: "Merde ! "

Thus, among all these giants exists a titan: Cambronne. To give this answer to catastrophe, to say this to destiny, to say this word and then die. What could be more glorious ! Because wishing death means to truly die. And it is not this man's fault that he, although shot, survived.

The man who won the battle of Waterloo is not the vanquished Napoleon, it is not Wellington who gave in at four o'clock and was desperate at five, it is not Blucher who didn't even fight. The man who won the battle of Waterloo is Pierre Cambronne.

In that fatal minute, the spirit of great days penetrated this unknown man. To strike with such a word the thunder that kills you is to win. To sum up a victory in one supreme, difficult to utter word, to lose ground and keep history, to have on your side those who laugh after the slaughter, is incommensurable. It is an insult to thunder. It is of a greatness worthy of Aeschylus. This is what it means to be a winner.

Leadership: What indicators do you use in analyzing that impact variable on the account of the uniqueness of the one that leads you to the highest degree of soul value, to keep in mind the whole history of the world as a "Work of Freedom"?

Your own system of values and statuses, starting from the components of consciousness that complete the box of the performance of being indispensable in the middle of things, updating the accumulated or faded capacities in direct relation with the existential environment, often stabilizes to the formula of "defender within".

For leadership to revive in a sparkling form, you need to make room for the development of the state you're in, favorable to collective consciousness, with the risk of becoming a victim of circumstances, a minister of programmed death, a remnant of an end. Or you can be the master of your own destiny, a great historical figure, only if you have greatness on your side - the highest degree of soul value.

When you stoically endure fatality, respecting the self condition sine qua non "Keep moving forward", you do not think of the one thousand consequences you could have, not for the glorious deeds that will be criticized and judged objectively by history itself, the grand court of mankind, but for your principal qualities of leadership which stand in your power of being completely authentic.

To make yourself be remembered by the entire history of the world as a "Work of Freedom" means to take on your spiritual duty of confessing your faith in an ideal after the fatal fall into disgrace or disuse.

Leadership is not an incident, a farce you play on yourself in the middle of great events, but rather the summary of a representation of status of complete acceptance of your being around fury, fears and limitations. It is greatness born out of the thunder of the heart which, striking the great transformer of consciousness, produces a certain form of energy that gives value to your own being.

What history calls us to evoke those facts, words, events that turned men into history of a nation, sparking the interest of a large circle of followers of leadership for the thorough and systematic study of the major variables through which the immediate or enlarged environment influences the evolution of personality, is not aimed at chance, pure accident, but at individual merits.

It is the aftermath of the fight, of heroism, passion, power and dynamic actions, directed towards the future that exists within the very man standing before it, setting a direction that fulfills the legitimate hopes and ambitions of an entire people.

The indicators used in the analysis of that impact variable from the account of the leader's uniqueness, applied as standards in the practice of science supported by conscience, are: the feeling of personal identity and the measure in which it is perceived by others.

Leadership is a condition of validation of the promise of freedom in the authentic act of offering your life in the name of an inner truth that is revealed only at a certain moment, when you know you have arrived where you need to be and feel compelled to fulfill your destiny.

The Invisible Fire From A Soul Possessed By Greatness highlights that mobilizing force, dependent on the material from which the unknown man is fabricated from, that transforms him into a true leader.

Be prepared for unplanned events. Leave free way for the affirmation of your value and uniqueness, intervening on the capacity of expanding consciousness that gives transparency to internal and external movements.

The Invisible, Which The Common Mind Cannot Perceive

On November 01, 2010

You can change the way you perceive the world and reality only if you understand that everything that surrounds you, including matter that seems inert, is animated by divinity.

- If I understood your thinking correctly, you want to make me understand that not only the gods are emanations of the primordial god, being manifestations in different forms of the creator of the worlds, but the entire universe, everything that surrounds us, the inert matter itself, all are divine, are the particles of divinity?

- Exactly. But he learns that nothing is inert, not even matter, for it is only an appearance. These elements which surround us and are the constituent parts of the visible world - the earth, the water, the air, the fixed and movable stars, the moon and the sun, whose nature seems to us to be the same as that of fire, all these elements are animated by an inner life , of a movement that we cannot perceive, but which is real. As for the gods who appear to our eyes in human or animal forms or, rather, whom we represent in these special forms, they are only some representative symbols of an ultimate reality of things, a reality that remains invisible to our eyes, hiding- both our physical perceptions and our minds.

Leadership: Can you imagine what it would be like to live a life with the awareness that beyond material reality there is an invisible and eternal divine background, so that you extend your reality into your own consciousness?

In this are the ultimate realities that symbolize the name of Amon, the hidden one, the Invisible One, which the common spirit cannot perceive. why this "nave" placed at the end of this hall, mystical representation of the world, is empty.

- Do you mean that it is empty because the god, the Hidden One, cannot manifest itself to our eyes?

- He is the invisible essence of things, while Thoth, under his two aspects, which you can discover on your right and on your left, symbolizes the sensible manifestation of the infinite and eternal god.

- How can god be infinite and eternal since you made me understand that time and space are just illusions, to which our experience as living and mortal beings lends a false reality? We, as living beings, have only a precarious existence in a world which, through its various and converging movements, nocturnal, diurnal and annual, forms a kind of threads that constitute the fabric of time. Because that's what I understood from your explanations.

Leadership: Can you grasp the essence of those realities that escape common understanding, such as the infinite and the eternal, thus providing insight into the world beyond the limits of human perception?

- You understood well and your conclusions are justified. This is the reason why when they use the terms infinite and eternal, as attributes of god, you cannot appreciate their true measure, you must take them, as some esoteric terms, whose real meaning escapes our understanding. They are not things that are transmitted from master to disciple, but mysterious realities, which can never be sensed except by the spirit, by that inner illumination that makes us ahu, those incorporeal, timeless and luminous beings into which we transform after that I have passed the gates of death, the last limits of all initiation.

But about this I must be silent, for you have not received the indispensable knowledge that will enable you to cross this mysterious threshold. For now, the knowledge acquired in my company and which you will be able to deepen by reading the second book of Thoth, which I will entrust to you now, is enough for you. You will stay with her for another month in this temple, two months if you wish, and if you feel the need, even longer, to meditate and deepen the teachings you received in Heliopolis and here.

You will be able to perceive yourself as "sensible manifestation" only by exploring the ways in which the divine is reflected in the material world. Only a messenger of faith can facilitate such profound knowledge and provide a window into the hidden dimensions of existence, transcending the limits of human understanding.

The invisible, which the common mind cannot perceive, highlights the ultimate reality of existence that transcends our limited perceptions, urging us to a continuous exploration of life's mysteries. It is important to explore the ways in which the divine is reflected in the material world, even if a deep understanding of the divine requires the recognition that its essence is not limited to what can be directly perceived.

The Irreplaceable Forwarder Of Honors

On October 07, 2010

Your value is given by the extent to which you raise others to a high level.

The famous French sculptor, Antoine Bourdelle, proved to be an exceptional teacher. Everybody admired his sculptures, listened to his advice, received lessons from him, following all his indications with admiration and respect.

Bourdelle, who was full of artistic ideas, urged young people to concentration and reflective study. He often said to them before they proceeded to work:

- Before acting manually, contemplate the model; create in your mind through analysis the built image that you will sculpt or paint with your hands.

Leadership: Can you form in your mind, by analyzing a deterministic model of cause and effect, the image from which you can forge a reality of a relationship between perception and representation?

To make yourself agreeable, you should let those around you learn what only you know, giving whole-heartedly your talent, generously donating of your resources for their success – a help really arisen both from your heart and your reason. They must find a reliable man in you, faithful to the cult of gratitude and friendship, eager to turn his knowledge into their benefit, and not at all greedy in sharing his fame with them. Are you an active participant in their formation?

Is there a sincere desire to improve others in you? Are you happy to be able to contribute? In order to be an example for others, you should firstly give full value to your vigorous talent to fit into their world, their work, contributing to the total transformation of their perceptions about what art, respectively leadership is. Take a look within yourself. Where do you stand, in relation to them? Will you find certain "anomalies" in the way others look at you?

In any case, art is the easiest way to build a strong image. Art conveys a complex message, presenting itself as a symbol of finesse and consistency. Before you are useful to people, learn to be useful to art, because only art suddenly conquers the world. Just as football is played on goals, leadership focuses on collaboration, in the true spirit of fair-play and "is played" on that field where people can win with you through a consistent and intelligent effort, and each common, well-coordinated, balanced and universally applicable approach means another step towards success.

To form in your mind, through the analysis of a deterministic cause-effect model, the image from which you can make a reality of the relationship between perception and representation, means to attribute a suggestive characterization based on a work belonging to art.

The ability to relate with others is like a building where different impressions are built and which can collapse if they don't impress by utility, accessibility and performance. Just as disciples enrich from day to day their souls with new impressions about the art of their mentor (if he reveals with great enthusiasm from the secrets of the painting that he practices, as well as from his experience), so the people you surround yourself with can count on you only if they come to believe first in the leadership that you practice, only if each of them gets to say: "One day, I will be like him."

The famous American writer C. Maxwell has emphasized very well this truth: "Trust is the only important factor in building personal and professional relationships. It unites followers to leaders."

Do you intend to make accessible to others at least some of the secrets of your art? Or do you destroy the climate of trust, hiding from people information that would help them to develop and become as good as you are? Do you shrink into yourself? Or do you offer to others the key to transformation, to absolute performance found within you, within the wealth of your knowledge and the profound originality of thought? The science of leadership can't function unless you actively develop the trust of others in you.

Your value is given by the extent to which you raise others to a high level. But the value can also be given by the extent to which you express your conception of art, showing your mastery in giving birth to an amazing creation.

Leadership is the easy way to build a suggestive comparison with the help and justification of a creation that fits the theme: "You must constantly remind yourself of yourself in a picture".

The Irreplaceable Forwarder Of Honors can be you, if you anticipate the needs of improvement of others and if you contribute to promoting and maintaining them to an optimal level of development. If they expand their knowledge to an advanced level and visibly improve their skills, then you will get open-stage congratulations and honors.

Conclusion: Each individual has built during his lifetime a scale of values, in accordance with his education, culture and professionalism. These scales are not identical. One who considers himself the top of his scale may correspond to only half of other person's scale and even at the bottom of a leader's scale, and in relation to the "standard scale", everyone to be below its peak.

The purpose in leadership is to get as high as possible on the standard scale, based on improving human relations, from the identification of training needs to strengthening relations of collaboration – for all to improve and ascend higher in comparison with the standard.

The Isolation Of The Researcher In The Leadership Marathon

Ensure your science a basic place in aiding leadership, so that it could be included in the ample thinking reconstruction context of other people.

I couldn't run from my obligation to find new answering options to some questions that apparently had no answer. I was scanning the crowd of known or unknown variables, making it possible to find answers in a gently divided shape, by means of a systematic approach. This brought for me more than anything else a certain peace, a special feeling, that wonderful sensation, Eureka, when you discover something new, exclusive, with a major impact.

The interpretation I gave to the unknowns that gravitated around a single point of view was extremely profound, like an incomprehensible mystery in the guise of a metaphor that encapsulated an incontestable truth. I had to be always careful about the apparition of significance games that admitted an in depth deciphering, combining and grouping them in a certain creation, in a multiple language, full of subtleties that had to be reshaped, interpreted, and then transmitted in a conventional style.

A transformation of the original in a new creation, placed in a different context. I didn't want to miss the occasion to enrich the structure of language with new symbols, added to the initial reaction mix, filtered by small concentrations at the level of abstract concepts.

The most stimulating experience you are experiencing with science is based on the positive nuance of a world understood by the subtlety of its interpretations.

Leadership, the attempt to exteriorize what was truly in the midst of a knowledge that is essentially accomplished by creation, was to be the source of a cause-and-effect relationship between the use of words as anchors for learning experience and the use of benchmarks of comparison and classification of different interpretations of mathematical notions for discovering properties or rules of multiplicity of the meanings of my writings.

In the first general answer pattern, pointing out the closeness between two estranged meanings, an instable intermediate combination between the X catalyst and one of the reagents was formed. Through the reaction of the intermediary combination with the other reagent the reaction product was formed and the catalyst was regenerating. And in certain conditions, this catalyst created a new layer of deep meanings that we lose sight of many times.

Leadership: When your Creation acquires the possibility of becoming the Creator, do you risk becoming a distinct being separate from Him?

Just as a story makes sense based on the personal interpretation of its basic elements, so is the knowledge we obtain following inductive methods given special connotation when we take into consideration the ambiguities and contradictions that we can't explain.

My whole creation focused on the answers I could get following the launch of the question: "How close am I to the kingdom of God?" Momentarily, I understood that I was closer to things than I was to God, to building than to the Builder, to knowledge than to wisdom (which is more a form of manifestation of God on an emotional, behavioral, intellectual level).

With the help of science I set the boundaries between real and surreal, in a space without coordinates. Basically I was rethinking the world and setting it in a system specially designed, so that to maximally optimize the construction process of some high knowledge ideals. The meanings degenerated in a chorus of arbitrary symbols that estranged laymen from the truth that dwelled inside language, conceived and transmitted as a philosophy.

I was still far from God, for even though I had gained much knowledge and much desire for creativity, I still could not communicate with Him, with the universe, I could not turn matter into vital energy (like that physicist who managed to turn the sun's rays into electrical energy). Behind creation there is a whole philosophy, as behind the knowledge there must be the attempt of the intellect to lay the foundation of the world.

As far as I'm concerned, there is a certain "shame" connected to the developed language, which impedes me from building and multiplying meanings in new contexts. Because I was afraid that these could trigger envy among experts and controversies among mystics. To be generally accepted, the composition of language had to be uniform, and to connect in a whole, guaranteeing the shaping up of a of a more complex and well-understood perspective about the unknown reality.

Leadership: Does your control over creative elements lead to the accumulation of experiences that give you a certain degree of wisdom in relation to what makes you feel that you are living from the height of a self-proclaimed all-knower?

I seemed to be taken over by an overwhelming feeling. Because in order to demonstrate the arguments and proper theories, extracting the resemblances and differences from all points of view, regarding everything connected to understanding the "ambiguous", it needed the meanings with the same importance, but apparently in contradiction with the known reality to embody in turn a vision of language present in my creation.

Famous writer Umberto Eco begins his novel "Foucault's Pendulum" with some words extracted from "De oculta philosophia", which seem to test the authority of science and techniques based on the support of the highest knowledge:

"Only for you, sons of doctrine and teaching, I wrote this work. Peruse this book carefully, concentrate on that intention that I have sprinkled and slipped into several places. What I left to remain hidden in a place I showed in another, so that it could be understood by your wisdom."

I, myself, occupied a central place in my creation, and my vision had to exteriorize itself through an adequate language, fully understood. My wisdom could be defined in agreement with the strengthening of the belief that everything I manage to assimilate through the processes of knowledge can lead to a high degree of acceptance and tolerance of the need to be pragmatic about the cost of failure, to be honest with myself the moment when creation no longer submits to the creator and takes possession of it.

Science is the material of thought, it is the way you can understand God who made heaven and earth (with all the laws that support it), it is ammunition to fight against any threat to his ideals. Science is the fruit of a creation hidden from curious eyes, but it occasionally enters the soul of people who are prepared to understand its significance and miracle.

Leadership is the work that is so costly which you use to interpret a world that is distinguished by a rare scientific discovery and unites with God through the learning from the philosophy of the experience you give to other people.

The isolation of the researcher in the leadership marathon appears when there is a discrepancy between the advanced thinking of a leader and the capacity to understand crowds that either have a scarce education level, or the language communication is scarce.

In both situations, failure will appear on the horizon and the leader will be isolated in his own "ivory tower" where nobody dares to enter.

The Journey Beyond You

On March 15, 2009

Learn to have control over the future, not putting into question your sense of orientation.

He no longer expected help from nowhere, knew that nobody could not extend a hand to him, that he had no relatives or friends or strangers, as if he was condemned to be alone. Between him and the other ones was an empty litter. It did not sound like reconciliation with fate; it was just accepting the situation as it was.

It was following to pave the way for a new life; he could not be filled with a thrill over this important step. He felt that had a little choice. The perspective overwhelmed and thrilled him. He had never been so isolated from others until then, and had never been confronted with unknown things. However, he should discover on his own all aspects of his future.

There was no landmark, nothing to help him find the way to his great dream: the one to fly in space. He was living in an unknown present, and full of pitfalls, but in a way that aroused emotion, not in one to make him feel threatened in any way. However, his instinct, on which he relied so much, cautioned him to be prudent.

Leadership: Do the disadvantages that disarm you when you try to enter a success story give you the opportunity to express your soul in a unique and spectacular way, to do things that you thought were unattainable?

If you watched the movie „Gattaca (1997)" perhaps you remember about Vincent Freeman whose travel, slow and sinuous, to fulfill dreams helped him find himself. Despite his disability, he realized that he was much better than all the other aspiring for space flight. At the end of the movie, Vincent confessed with great faith: "I was as good as any and better than most."

Someone said: "Before becoming a great man, you must first become a man." That is, before becoming a man of value, learn to find you, to find the best in you, especially your ability to take risks and responsibilities. Trust in yourself comes from the total trust in what you think you are that is fueled by beliefs root-bound in the subconscious.

To express your soul in a unique and spectacular way means not to question what is fundamental to you: the way you feel in the presence of a vision that Divine Providence has inspired in you.

In the depths of the mind of Vincent, there was the idea that he must succeed, even if he was gaining momentum in an unknown direction. He had not a clear picture of what he will find in his journey. However, somehow he managed to find what he wanted. His success was due to his skill to overcome difficulties, and to make things to spin at his will. He challenged the ability to act together and in harmony with all his resources to create a future for him. He created opportunities by himself of that he had absolute need to succeed. He learned to have control over the future, not putting into question his sense of orientation.

If you want to head to your highest point of perfection as a leader, you must first put to the test your ability to control your own destiny with absolute confidence in the future. This is the ultimate test that the great leaders of all time, from Hannibal to Napoleon Bonaparte and to Bill Gates, have had in the past. This journey that has the effect of recognizing your own abilities, it is the foundation on which is based your future. It represents a big step toward maturity. How can you lead others, if you do not know, which is the best way that you should follow by yourself?

Vision is what comes to you in the form of chance, in relation to an image of the perfection that you build in relation to Providence.

Journey Beyond You designates the passage to the highest level of self-improvement. It is the only way by which you can recognize the value of your own individuality, and your own ability to promote yourself, in time, in the midst of "elite" Remember what I said in the last article: You may fell by yourself, or you may ascend by yourself" What do you choose?

If you are familiar with Nikon Coolpix P7000 camera, then you should know that you can set Auto-ISO to a maximum value, only by adjusting manually the white balance by using the color temperature.

Similarly, it is with your ability to control future. You have to set the guidance system to your chosen destination, adjusting your balance of confidence and ambition through your personal beliefs and values that determines your performance. Moreover, just as someone stated on a blog on the Internet, it is important to realize and accept that to achieve far-reaching plans it takes determination, patience and concentration of creative potential in the respective direction.

Conclusion: Journey beyond you it is actually the way to self-improvement of every human, especially a leader. The desire and the consistently operation towards continuous improvement and achieving the proposed goals, represents a modality of detaining control over your future. You must have permanent confidence in your forces, to persevere, to fight for your future, and especially do not ever give up. This thing will allow you to occupy a leading position in the scale of values.

The Key Moment Of The Director

On January 09, 2017

Be consistent in assessing the control you exercise over art, determining within the consciousness of others a set of ideas due to which your work can be led to emotional finality.

"The Strike" was born out of his theatrical experiences and still wore their mark. This first cinematographic work reflects, as in a mirror – by inverting – the production of the "Gas Masks". But the film gets tangled in the wreckage of an excessive theatricality which was foreign to Eisenstein. However, from the specific concerns of the theatrical staging from "The Gulf", "Listen, Moscow ! ", "Gas Masks" was born a new notion: the mise-en-cadre.

"The Strike" marks the beginning of Eisensteinian montage. At its core, at this stage, it is thought that combining two images gives rise to an idea, unique, the whole being created thusly being superior to the sum of the two constituent elements. Montage consists for Eisenstein, in the creation, through the relationship of two images, of a nervous shock (provided, of course, with the dramatic sense of the action), in order to determine within the consciousness of the viewer an idea, and then, a set of ideas due to which the work can be led to the emotional or dialectic finality.

Eisenstein discovers a whole new mathematics and physics of generating emotion. Starting this impressive work of research of his own creation, which he will continue until the end of his life, Eisenstein discovers the intimate laws of the artwork. From now on, aesthetic thinking will go parallel with creation, becoming, in constant alternation, both its explicitness and often its engine. *

Leadership: Do you shine through everything you have that is unique, surprising and innovative before reaching a revelation that has as its first determinant the aesthetic thinking placed in parallel with the creation of a new image on the reality analyzed by the artist's ideal?

When you seek to generate new emotions through the means of research work of your own creation, on which you can count on in the process of acquiring new information and knowledge, you inevitably reach a surprising finding, an unexpected conclusion. Emotions, viewed through the prism of research work, are those that undoubtedly support the intimate laws of creation, being superior by the intensity with which it fuels man's momentum towards great goals.

This proves, in the context of strengthening the role of a guide in seeking new forms and means of directorial expression, your main consistency in daring to try new things in the triangle of moments stolen by the lens, which you experience through an uninterrupted continuity of the narrative thread. The research work of creation, in parallel with aesthetic thinking, must give rise to an image that represents you as the main landmark of a new type of opening to an immediate reality that seems to have been specially formed to ensure a fulminating result in matter of reception of the theatrical performance, so as to ensure an unwavering conviction about the uplifting role of art.

Montage, at the same time, is a consequence of developing notions, concepts, ideas derived from using those findings that have an experimental character and do not respect the traditional construction procedures. Which implies a certain degree of reporting to the act of rendering a scene in particular or repeatedly.

And the director who is consistent in assessing "the control he exercises over art", honors leadership in that he determines within the consciousness of viewers an idea and then a set of ideas due to which the work can be led to emotional finality.

That wellspring of "superior whole", performed by expanding a notion that can become the precise foreshadowing of a key moment, is in fact an effect of the continuous inclusion of experiencing a work of art, an image of an event in the plane of reality, in the context of personal experience – in deciding what you want to convey.

The true work of art is the result of shaping an emotional finality, born from a surprising finding, from an unexpected conclusion. And to experience the work of art means to endure the state of preparing and waiting for inspiration, it means to shine through everything that is unique, surprising and innovative about you before reaching a revelation.

Emotional finality, as a pale spark become a huge fire, is the success of creating a unique image, customized, with direct effects to the understood possible attributed to the notion of "inner listening and transformation". It is the uppermost point of a development that reinforces the version of that model of spiritual experience obtained through the consistency of the manifestation of imagination and creativity.

The Key Moment of The Director is associated with expanding notions stemming from increasing consistency in daring to try out new things in the construction of montage, which culminates through an unexpected conclusion. This conclusion is the guiding force of inspiration towards designing a new vision.

The Key Testimony Of A Mysterious Art

On June 17, 2018

A convex mirror placed in the center of artistic composition can make all traces of clutter disappear behind a beautiful facade.

I have learned a lot of skills in a myriad of fields, but only while there is a mystery to unravel in a real process of exploring the space of another world. Like an artist of dreams and fiction, I imagined that I was just playing with an intuitive puzzle, an indicator of the solidity of building a labyrinth that matched the realities of soul, culminating in a charming wandering through the areas of painting.

This equated with the assumption of the condition of the one who devoted all his attention, skill and existence to creating a universe in continuous expansion.

It was as if I had to discover a concept derived from molecular genetics as a result of a chance that tries to succeed with that "something" waiting to come out at the right time. The life-changing challenges we attribute to symbolic value in an exceptional translation of a work identified by researcher Michael Finkenthal with the secret destiny of humanity, presenting an opaque, esoteric character despite a "nebulous" logic in argumentation that incites reflection.

To establish yourself as a science of leadership, it is necessary to step beyond the certainties of the tangible world, learning to masterfully manipulate the complex puzzle of reality.

A man who fails to lay the foundations of a science can never be himself as a science. I still wonder if in organizing the missing parts of this puzzle we have to look for the genetic differences between every aspect of creation and the Creator, opening up new perspectives in evolutionism. Hazard is, from this point of view, a determining factor in convincing me of the value of a reality that does not belong to this world.

Slowly, I close the door behind me and step on the steep path of a strange feeling: I exist only in the image of a charmed mirror, obtained by using and manipulating a conceptual universe exclusively dominated by instinct.

Now I wonder, with the endless desire of creation of the painter who uses chromatic modulation in his works, if I have not rushed to generalize the few certainties that I had, starting from the hard to capture mystery that dwells in the fires of an image, of apparent fidelity.

Leadership: Do you try to give your form of expression accents of the "effect of a game of suspense" without arguing the specific viewpoints of the aestheticians that give the lecture the authenticity of a great discovery?

The concentrated fluid of pure, true science, in which I believe with all my being, flows through an orifice given in a higher time than another in another imaginary universe than the one represented by a white, chromatic background of a median portion with a gray background, like a shadow that is only collected from the stars.

Always an enigmatic being, a writer full of force, an artist crowned with spectacularism, fits his knowledge in a labyrinth verified and tried by a real, external space attached to the symbolic space of a work with hermeneutical depth, in the atmosphere of a contest of circumstances which raises many questions about an existence that awaits its resorption within the cosmic.

Even in passing, we have reached the point of maximum illumination in which the artist uses the shadow, the dark play of the white-gray-black colors in manifold forms of cosmic matter, illustrating the contrast between recurrence and difference as a means of viewing the sacred throughout its entire work.

Successful leadership is a unique creation that combines the vision of your own evolution with the instinctive desire to discover the verisimilitude of the truths hidden in your inner universe.

A convex mirror placed in the center of artistic composition, in terms of running a retrospective of life to learn from the past, well placed in a microcosm of objects, attitudes and relationships, stated or implied, makes any sign of disorder disappear behind a beautiful facade.

You cannot give your form of expression accents of "the effect of a game of suspense" without arguing the specific views of the aestheticians that give the lecture the authenticity of a great discovery.

Loaded with symbolic meanings coming from a superior intelligence but sensible in every moment of thoughtful and profound reading, forcing me to "continue burning", appearing to be a challenge embraced only by the chosen spirits, the painting I outline here and now seems to be the victim of a misleading vision, the sacred manifesting itself through an attitude hostile to superhuman principles.

Thus, we violated the rule of proportionality between forces and deformations of logical constructions such as explanation, analogy, and deduction. However, the representation of the substance-subject concept seems real.

Leadership: The authenticity of your work contains an expression of the "contest of circumstances" type which is very meaningful and explanatory for the idea: "I define myself as a space of mystery and as a place of dream revelation".

A mind stemming from universal memory, known as the author of "Les Misérables", said that the only paths that open to despair in the dark are tempting. Here is questioned a whole investigation concerning the pictorial representation of the sacred.

At the same time, the artist in me starts studying color from understanding the mechanism of visual perception as a fundamental moment of human existence and expression, having as experimental character that labyrinth of the imaginary in which man is lost among so many mirror games, offering an enchanted, picturesque universe, space of emotional effusions, but also of mystery.

I know that I am at the disposal of an argument that seeks to rationally justify feelings remaining active in an area of the real that is not accepted as a design hypothesis. And an artistic leader engaged in exploring the subtlest side of the significance of darkness knows how to draw up a whole list of challenges in a dialogue that does not have an "a priori" established plan, but which is structured as it advances in discussion.

The expression of an artistic-literary culture and spiritual affiliation to something more magnificent than the sea, the sky or the mountain is the hand that pushes the cradle of a history that turns into a votive picture, facilitating the living in the universe of a story about a genius idea. The most versatile detail of the anatomy of a painting resides precisely in the power of reflection of a combination of two or more secondary colors, from which a primary originates: the conviction of an interesting experience.

True science is based on remembrance, starting from the realm of the story that deserves to be understood and rediscovered, inducing the sensation of entering a space of mystery that offers cherishing and immortality, to the purity of a work of art that is not judged by its logic or argumentation but by the resonance it produces in the consciousness of others.

The Key Testimony Of A Mysterious Art is the very form of expression, energizing and liberating, which you define and use as a variant of concept to develop a new vision that makes you not only an art-inspired artist, but also a leader of the science of personal development.

The Key That Opens All Doors

On January 11, 2010

Transmit to people what you have in mind and soul, without reducing the content of truth on which is based the authentic leadership.

The beautiful words that are uttered by someone are like pleasant sounds in the ears of people. They have an unbelievably great value, and often succeed to influence their mind and decisions.

On an improvised stage, the candidate for presidency is fast approaching the microphone in order to keep the last speech. He is fretting his mind, weighs one thought in all manners: how could he revive people's confidence as quickly as possible, of the future voters. In order to impose his authority, for his idealistic message to be understood and taken into account, it is imperative to reach the most sensitive chord of the human soul. A final meeting with them is certainly an opportunity for inspiration. For only in decisive moments, when he had to bring into play all the resources of his being, he becomes more creative and original. Only now, in the last moment, when everyone are all attention on his words, he gets that unique inspiration that warms his heart and motivates him to make a completely and totally exceptional speech.

The truth, sometimes painful, is like a boomerang, and may turn against the one who knows it. Aware of this thing, the candidate for presidency cannot afford to say false things or too "commercial" but things as reliable as accurate and as practicable as possible. Even so naturally without diminishing his personality, and his chances of being elected. His message, in order to electrify the crowd, must be the one of the fulfilled facts.

Leadership: Do you justify your decisions or choices by virtue of a reason that gains its attribute of dominance by validating the "Call to faith"?

Only one thing can save the candidate for presidency from defeat: to provoke in time a trigger on people's thinking. To show them what are the great features that are hidden in him: absolute determination, iron will, undaunted courage, but above all faith. And, suddenly all his forces are gathering in a real vital energy: "I am a God-fearing man."

This statement made in an artistic way, with the voice drowned in tears, with a look into the sky and one in the ground, reaches the hearts of most people, deeply implanted in their souls, being sensitized, moved in a very special manner.

Such a statement, which always has rating, does not force the candidate on anything, and opens to him all doors. Hence, this exculpates him from all sin, he is absolved of any guilt, prompting people to believe that nothing bad is in his soul, that everything he does is for their benefit, and - most important – for the glory of God . Without a doubt, in the minds of most people, the one who lives in fear of God must be necessarily honest, hardworking, ambitious, generous, honest and innocent. It is God, who will guide his steps and will lead him, and so he - the new leader - will achieve the impossible.

Any way of seducing people is, at turning points, lawful and justified. With that lightning genius who bursts into the middle of a danger of death, the leader builds his plan. A plan that should not fail. A plan, by which he would try winning the trust and goodwill of all. And, fortunately, is not so hard to build. Because people trust more in the words of one who claims to live in fear of God, than what is actually hidden and unknown to anyone. That's right, people can be easily won if the driver is enough skilled and calls for faith.

Leadership: What you are transmitting fundaments a „game mind" that rises a whole mountain of prejudice about your characteristics?

The tight connection, existent between the level of experience and the structure of the Rating privileges assembly – for whose accomplishment you can use ideas streaming from your quintessence, from the forms of conscience that your own decision system maintains and strengthens through communication – it appears in its clearest and most poignant way where attention is at its highest, where there is a search for the authenticity effect.

The leadership level grows according to the tendency to mask this authenticity effect in the benefit of personal image, sending people certain information – that is later on transformed into mood.

In a deep analysis of the authenticity's progression, which places information in emotions and feelings, a few of its fundamental "parts" are well highlighted, illustrating, in the demonstration of an orientation towards leadership, that exact side of morality from the personal value registries – through which the capacities to redefine the perception standards of sent information are distinguished. These fundamental parts represent unexplored areas of you, which intertwine and consolidate each other under the impact of a rich thinking that tends to prove its long-acclaimed superiority.

No matter how the things looked in other circumstances, the leader-followers interdependency itself, by means of the sent information, paradoxically highlights a certain intelligence of the emotions out of which some taste reflections, impulses, values, motivations. These are benchmarks for learning from the leader's experience and for valorizing a thinking or vision that fundaments the adept's convictions in time.

Failure or success in leadership appears as being generated by differences between the information you diffuse and the attitude of those who absorb information.

Someone gave an advice on the web: „Think that everything you send, as information, fundaments a „game mind" that rises or collapses a whole mountain of prejudice about your characteristics."

Through speech you activate the "cookies", those suspicions or confirmations fragments – used by individuals to store information about you, managing them in the context of their own consciences, lives and personal interests.

Leadership: In what half of the field you are found out?

Every skilful leader has learned to pretend himself. To be cunning like a fox. To play theater. And to tell again and again what people like to hear, whether it is true or not, whether he believes in what he says or not. The trust is built over time, but can be gained quickly if the leader is creating a good reputation, always invoking the name of God, and appealing to values such as truth, fairness, and honor. Only in this way he can do sensitize people, and can win them by his side.

Just as a football player cannot be penalized for offside when he is found in his own half of the field, so you cannot be penalized by the people if your leadership is found in the area of truth, which they realize and accept it.

On the other hand, if you are caught offside, even if you scored a goal and raised the crowd of joy, all your chances to raise in the leading position will be canceled, and you will be punished with a red card that will remove you permanently from the game called leadership.

Transmit to people what you have in mind and soul, without reducing the content of truth on which is based the authentic leadership.

The key that opens all doors is actually the way, by which a future leader comes to determine people to elect and support him. It is not a key that fits to all the categories of people, but must be constantly "adjusted" according to the educational level and even of the prejudices of the concerned categories.

The King And His Creation

Turn leadership into the most valuable creation, letting yourself led by the alternating moods through which you can showcase the hidden parts of your understanding of life.

I myself would fall prey to inner fires, and yet I was afraid to fight against them, seized by a kind of fleeting madness, like wanderers through infinity, in the unpredictability of the evolutionary process of an existential sense search. The alternation of moods based on which I managed to highlight the hidden parts of my understanding of life and transpose them in a garden full of burning flowers was strange, to pulse the surprise like a mild breeze where the straight current of integral truths would get interrupted.

Literature became a path towards a beyond that called with necessity the deep meaning of my nature, contributing to the transposition of the truths concealed in a high-level language, often metaphorically, in a science that proved to be more and more as a genuine instrument of maturation.

The oven in which the smoldering fragile bones of science and the scented wood of the course of life burned in, the combustion of all remnants of thoughts free after the harvesting of new imaginary evidence, later distillated in beliefs, even if at times an explosion would burst and before me a new grand attraction rose, made my power crystallize, in text, into a diamond. I was the king of a kingdom made up of infinite treasures.

The creation of a thinking that relates to the universe of life, referring to the understanding of a detached and receptive state of mind, aims at choosing a story decoration that provokes an "Amazing ! " feeling.

But literature has a thousand bent swords, and just as many deaths and resurrections. Even if you could glimpse the abyss at the horizon, a lack of inspiration, and I was battered by the feeling of giving up, a voice screamed within me whose hissings gave a certain force, revealing to me a glimpse of world history:

Henry III of Navarre, pursued by archer assassins, said with fear in his heart: "You believe that I will ever be king again, me, a fugitive?

Florentine Rene, artisan of perfumes, replied: "Behold, sire, showing the king a visible star, shining, behind a dark cloud – it is not I who says this, but her."

Leadership: Can you demonstrate the great meaning of your achievements in the sphere of knowledge, by expanding your hidden dimension to the side of a sense of absolute power and control of reality?

When you know how to orderly use everything that is scattered in disarray, when the inner cry seems to get answered by all the elements of meaning through which subjectivity is realized, in the case of the creative process a certain approximation to superiority through the broadening of the content of the "interest" notion can be seen.

You become more interested in what represents you as an artist, as a measure of those processes of creation that launch the theme, so realistic, so complex and yet so sensible, which the majority do not master: LIFE.

And through the steadfast perseverance in committing the work conceived after the model of life experience, through which thinking draws its lifeblood, reflecting it in the expressive force of the talent of being, within possible measure that chemistry, that fusion between calling and turmoil that fuels your transformation into a "king" is created.

You become the king of creation when you resist all "deaths" and "resurrections" caused by the lesson of life from which you not only learn how to find the main ideas, but also from which you realize how much more you still have to learn.

Leadership, with the possibilities of applying its laws as fairly as possible in the development of science and man, means to instill your personal creation with an entirely original vision and make it unique placing into it your own knowledge of life.

Therefore, to demonstrate the great meaning of your achievements in the sphere of knowledge, by expanding your hidden dimension, must not result inly in a story that surpasses life, but rather in an overview that lets you better understand its dimensions. Life is a star at which can hardly look away from, and you are its creator.

Experiencing a feeling of absolute power and control of reality can be manifested through an awareness of the relationship between what you represent in the creative plan to change the meaning of life and what you are prepared to learn about yourself in an artistic act, subtle, such as the arrangement of words in a world of writing.

The King And His Creation highlights the degree of acceptance of a style of thinking and reflection on what you've gained through the trials of life, transposed into your own version of being that honors the sense of openness to the highest stage of creation. But, as someone on a web page said, any artistic act starts from experiences, because creation is a way of a being to confront limits, destiny.

The King In Check

On May 12, 2016

Consider the possibility of moving in any direction a single square, but one that will have meaning in a lesson of self-assessment and self-appreciation.

What immense power of suggestion lay dormant, ever since, inside my brain, in that conductor of energy put in contact with all that defined me on the basis of an understanding of cooperation between certainty and expectation? What kind of unchaining of the mind could introduce essentiality, the idea of total cohabitation of two entities so similar and yet so different, between me and the projection of an absolute superiority?

What property of the matter of transfiguration, through the form and change of a constant potential of reference, could be measured by association with a field of knowledge that varied periodically in time? In what multitude of values of real variable could develop a new clarity, a new projection of the future, towards my benefit, without influencing the final outcome of a few years of life full of intuitive, not just real experiences?

The power to talk to myself, always curious, in an excellent exercitium mentale, without the mediation of any vision with a constant potential of determination, always finding myself as being that of before, some incognus before knowing, was the result of an absurd game against me. It was the confirmation of the availability of accommodating myself in the face of great or small challenges that my ability of placing myself in the unlimited space of the psyche involved.

Leadership: Are you affected by the reception of a reality with clear metaphysical features in which you can find possible points of congruence with an obsession that leads you to reflection in composing a game that infinitely explores its possibilities of expression?

And this complexity of immersion within myself, of which was capable of surpassing only a master of chess, like Kasparov, like Karpov, it offered me the chance to meet myself in a memorable match with a homo obscurissimus. Thus, it was justified my placing along an imitation of the dimension of reality, in the virtue that everywhere operated a sort of causal chaining that diluted my essence in a composition of new forces, making it easier to understand.

I was manifesting the same mindset of Dr. B from Stefan Zweig's work, violently jerked from the accepted normal, having nothing other than this absurd game, called chess. Something inside of me wanted to prove its justice and I only had to combat the other one within me.

The only game to infinitely explores its possibilities of expression, through a forced interpretation of the real winning situation, had as a main stake the double attack: first I would find a good reason to reproach a certain guilt, then I would look for an excuse because the best way to evaluate my true value escaped me.

It was a sort of bewildering obsession that not only attacked my brain, not only the psyche necessary for the perfection of a winning status, in a phase of confusion preceded by lucidity, seemed to be rather an effort of the spirit in the likes of an experience at the limit of the paranormal, but rather maintained me within the narrow limits of an invariable square.

Ah, Check ! Sorry, but there was no such thing, I was defended by a bishop.

Leadership: Are you at the point where it begins and ends that unique action of putting all contrasts into motion, whose sole representative is the stalemate?

Leadership, in the phase of oversupply of revealing information, over which only individual beings focus their attention, those who experience the cold thrill of the unbearable "Who The Hell Am I?", has as a first coverage area that power of incursion in a game with a double profile: a profile that use a "King" piece, and a profile that use a "Bishop" piece. Two contrasts that attract and repel each other at the same time.

The King symbolizes the battle of man with existence, his positive version, wanting to conquer his inner cries of passions far away from the world, dominated by the exponential tendency of escaping from the real, but at the same time, attached to a continuous and sufficient challenge to battle against himself.

The Bishop, proving to be often the only obvious solution, is man's slip into dementia. It is the mental condition that the inacceptable deviations of personal experiences create in every moment of life, pushing him to not think clearly. At the same time, the Bishop can represent the determinant of that state of vigil that allows you to focus on the reference points of your own being that are not developed enough to ensure a moral and emotional balance, optimum and safe.

Leadership in terms of "pawn against the king" has the meaning of an initiatory path to that self-knowledge revealed by the consciousness of the choice of eliminating the ego that demands its right to be the best, and only to preserve the state of inner peace, whether you are experiencing success or failure.

A stalemate is also considered when the King is not in check, but any move he'd make would put him in check. The man who intends to dominate his character and win ground in the process of self-discovery, which he will be forced to face anyway, to connect to a new area of manifestation, will always try to find that defining constant that cancels the ability of the Bishop to check.

The meaning of a discovery close to that height of wisdom that conditions an improving of the state of mind, tirelessly requests that "something" of yours in a meta-world, on the black and white squares of creative anticipations, from where that unique action of setting in motion all contrasts begins or ends, whose sole representative is reconciliation, stalemate, as a term of a deeper meaning.

To keep leadership's own state of mind that calls to an attitude of superiority, means to make peace with who you could've been when you thought and acted as if you were someone else.

The mathematical and strategic brain of the great game, the most powerful catalyst of the psychic power sphere, is responsible, in this regard, for the spectacle of a key combination of moves, being the subject of accepting the validation of a logic of the type "move in any direction only one square, but one that will have meaning in a lesson of assessment and self-appreciation."

The King In Check occurs when you try to combat your alter-ego in an excellent exercitium mentale, without the mediation of any vision with a constant potential for determination, finding yourself to be the same as before, some incognus before knowing. It is the result of an absurd game against your own being. It is the confirmation of the availability of accommodating yourself in the face of great or small challenges implied by the ability of placing yourself in the unlimited space of the psyche.

The Knower Of Mysteries And The Master Of Labyrinths

On November 14, 2013

Try to look from a different perspective at the mission of your inner discoverer, so you can rise to a new understanding of the relation between leadership and science.

Unleashed thoughts filled my lucid mind and my conscious became a branch of complex experiences. Everything faded before my eyes, the living testimony of a deep disorientation, which triggered powerful and scary hallucinations, deforming the reality's image. Because an unsupervised part of myself, a new character of my mind rose unhindered so high in the spheres of transfiguration and illumination that I could have encompass all of this Earth's existent laws.

I fulfilled my transformation in a liberty space, through a crossing beyond powerlessness. By adopting a new distinct and particular way of "being", which reached beyond unfamiliar contexts. As if all these demons in my head, trapped in a vision beyond intellect, made real through vivid pictures of an unavoidable future, would have been tied by an invisible force that paralyzed my will to understand what was going on.

Exiting the labyrinth is made with Ariadne's thread, symbolizing a keen mind and artistic spirit, even if you feel abandoned by the world, struck or wronged by a reality beyond your understanding.

In a certain way, I became the prisoner of my own illusions, who knows why this is good or what is wrong, any cognitive or perceptive error representing a communication problem between the desire to transgress the conventional and the narrative skills of a contrasting fragment from life lived in the depth of a writer who isolates himself in anonymity.

Unmistakably, this secret of the unpredictable always surrounded me, perturbing my mind, suspending it in a fortified reality. Its inclusion in the labyrinth of contraries, embracing the unknown, recreating the thought that had the magic of exploring the unconscious and setting free the fixed rules, put me in difficulty. Because I started to discover the phenomena I had carelessly overlooked. Undoubtedly, the adventure I had set on, that of knowing and exploring the subtle energy of approximations, blinded my eyes – unused to the contrasting elements that distracted my attention.

Leadership: Do you strengthen your understanding of yourself within a knowledge that develops by constructing the concept of "a narrator who elucidates mysteries in the horizon of seeking an intelligible world"?

Between what I had expected from a great experience and what that experience really meant, there was a reverse connection, a huge breakwater that cut the road whose end I could not see.

Two entities were found in a one-to-one optional relation at both ends of the wire that tied me to a new aspect of my science. More precisely, an identifiable entity only in the field of fantasy. And an entity whose distinct and independent existence, including, its suggestive expression, was beyond any constraint or contestation of the present. Oh, God, what was I given to endure?

The car of my mind was moving towards a private, unconventional space. Like the normans that, lost in the fog, lead their phantom ships to the endless nights in the hyperborean worlds, always navigating towards the sunset, discovering islands and unknown lands. And in this private space, giving voice to the unanimous feeling of communion with the future through the possible, all elements gathered together and focused on what truly mattered.

Probably the phenomenon, amazingly new, haunted me only because I had wanted to reach the essence of esoteric knowledge. Thus, to accede at the status of a phenomenal man. And the thirst to mentally place me in an inaccessible future, in a space of subtle matter that only scientists could animate, projecting me in infinity, was the sign of a satisfaction after the huge development efforts were acknowledged.

But if it's true what someone said, that from a weak disability comes the need to transfigure and the emergence of a phantasmal imaginary, then I was the product of a delayed reaction of the disorientation triggered by the hidden shape of an internal tension, generated by the desperate attempt to push myself to a superior evolutionary level.

Leadership: Can you separate the constitutive elements of the relation between the two entities that generate the whole of your evolution, without deepening into a narrative frame in which the main thread of the action is replaced by all the wires of a complex intrigue?

Considering that leadership can be identified with the activity to assure a new way of personal storytelling, with the relevance criteria application to the production of "accessories" necessary for the imminent quality leap towards the reception of the new horizons of thinking, we may be able to undress any reason that isn't lit by the sparkle of the perfection of a scenario that conditions the understanding of life. Moreover, by the satisfaction triggered after recognizing the huge self-development efforts.

Deepening yourself into a narrative framework where the main thread of action is replaced by all the wires of a complex intrigue it means to reveal from a whole set of interpretative elements that the only option of rendering a concrete reality that allows readers to better focus on the phenomenon "A life that finds its focus".

But what lingers in the sense of such ingenuity movement, in the sense of back-and-forth tendencies, relativized, towards a block of knowledge that isn't so close to the Triumph Arc of excellence in scientific research?

Well, promoting the growth of the usage percentage in unfamiliar contexts, to some visions beyond intellect, made real through vivid pictures of an unavoidable future. This is the essential part in the process of reaching a satisfying reality, efficiently ensuring a kind of progress.

Leadership: Do you follow the main thread of an action that is woven around the hero of a script that allows itself to be recognized as someone else's question: "Is that subject not too abstract and too banal?"

Any absolute accomplishment encompasses in itself the total amount of combining possibilities of real and imaginary elements, exploited in order to support own hypotheses and research activities. By applying only the mechanism of the option to have a broad professional horizon, building the ramifications of a tree of the future, an image used especially when you try to reproduce in reality an new thought pattern, you will be able to dominate any scientific hardships that fundamentally come from the two essential major premises: "can" and "can't".

Two entities generate "the whole" of your evolution. One of the processing of complex information, the other perfectly finishes the knowledge surface that continuously reduces your limitations.

If you separate the constitutive elements of the relationship between them, so if you put science under the mark of particularity and ambiguity, then you'll never succeed to reach beyond yourself and convince yourself that going forward is the right direction. Do you always want to experience new challenges and put in the equation of research the same trivialities?

The main thread of an action that is woven around the hero of a writing of great originality twists around the science of creating a reality transformed into an unexpected intrigue that lures you to go through to the end.

The action is determined by the storyline of the story as a source of inspiration for the reformist understanding of a distinct mentality.

The Knower Of Mysteries And The Master Of Labyrinths are two faces of the narrator who has the courage to soar to experiences establishing an intrigue involving a series of adventures and emotional moments, weaving all those valuable and unknown elements that turn he himself into a story.

Try to look from a different angle at this mission of the researcher in you. Let yourself dominated by the ability to accede to a new understanding of things, of the relation between leadership and science.

Only someone who navigates in the private space of subtle matter could be able to create the indirect foundation of an infrastructure that allows the exploitation of particularity and conserves the individual independence and existence of those created for leadership's development.

The Knowing Being Whose Reflex Is Becoming

On October 10, 2013

Scan the whole structure of your orientation forces in order to discover the guidelines that could have a positive influence over your professional level.

Death doesn't have much waiting left. Invisible, this suspended body regulates all its liability functions entrusted by nature and waits for a sign to take action. It announces its presence silently as it receives the necessary space to unleash unpredictable and compromising forces that accelerate their supreme will vectors in the direction assigned by destiny.

But even death starts to doubt, a lack of continuity in its projects, in the leading act, a premature failure of the operating system when the human mind retakes its focus and remains constant in its results, in the vicinity of a spiritual and spontaneous surface.

Leadership: Do you project your goals on the basis of authentic reality, based on the individual experience of previous knowledge, by your own understanding and by the interpretation of your own being that someone else proposes?

Hannibal Lecter gives no conclusive clue about catching the murderer, just bits and pieces of flashbacks and questions with ambiguous answers, impracticable mental and emotional roads.

Accordingly, Clarice Starling must use her mind, scan her whole structure of orientation forces and grant them certain acceleration towards a fixed target. With one try, she has to bring her active elements to a perfect stage, controlled by intuition, sensibility and conscience. Unprecedently, to achieve a change of substances and energy in her action environment.

The FBI draws a map of the committed crimes. In the surroundings, somewhere there, all alone, Buffalo Bill is hiding. Clarice, hurry up ! Poor Catherine's life depends only on the agility of your mind. Time is running out !

Just as an archaeologist grants certain finesse to the movement of his hands and body in order to dig out a priceless object, Clarice schedules her mental decoder and diligently looks for the appropriate channel at the number of the region where she could find some obvious answers, tracking at first the application pattern of a systemic algorithm. Her mind creates new judgment reflexes; it assumes other valences, which encompass reality.

Clarice has a difficult and ambitious task ahead: to invent a general orientation scheme, thanks to which, she might discover the guidelines that could influence the destiny of poor Catherine, kidnapped and sequestered by Buffalo Bill. But in order to reach her aims, Clarice has to introduce a unique reasoning in the evolution of her orientation construction.

Basically, she is on a mission to discover, behind becoming a professional, a being who knows the human psyche, whose reflex is this exact becoming.

Leadership: Does the prospect of what drives you towards achieving results pushes you to be completely different, against your will to simply recognize a certain reality?

Clarice overlooks a single aspect in this complex search for clues: she does not realize that someone else has actually programmed her whole mentality, that in fact she is forced by Hannibal to become someone else, a psychological product with much deeper qualities.

Practically, she engages in a difficult approach against her will to simply recognize a certain reality: that in fact she is a guinea pig who cannot make decisions by herself, but always waits to be given support in the search for information, a certain frame of reference (intellectual, emotional) to help her follow the right path of clues and discoveries.

Based on what criteria do we prefer an „industrial" way of thinking, that generates poor and subjective perspectives, instead of a way to approach a knowledge well-grounded in the rough material of a judgment that awakens and maintains interest for research activities developed for the benefit of becoming, requiring the same practical considerations?

Leaders' advancement towards a superior professional level, due to the large scale production of judgments, calculations and logical mechanisms is very pretentious. We reach a situation where we achieve different estimations, assumptions and scenarios about the nature of research, meant to satisfy a one and only hypothesis. Thus, a certain ascending evolution of leadership is registered, although small in comparison with true evolution.

In this case, it turns out insufficient to discover complex and multiple guidelines that could majorly influence the existence of a man subject to a negative foreign influence, having within its boundaries a continuous rush of clues and suspicions.

Leadership: When confronted with a life test, do you allow yourself to get carried away by the tendency to position yourself, generally, at a level far below your own pretense of being "privileged" in a particular science?

Two ways of thinking are defining for developing leadership. Rational and analytic thinking, corresponding to the evaluation of research results, which lead to reaching a moral and social target. And the thinking that grants certain acceleration to its own leadership potential, but corresponds less to a productive becoming towards something higher, towards an excellent self-knowledge. Between the two, the first usually wins.

The option to generate value, behind becoming professional, is achieved according to somewhat strict criteria, according to certain stability models in the practice of leadership, according to certain rational rules and certain arguments. Having as objective a deeper knowledge of human nature and its transformation, even after the interpreting type of the orientation scheme is achieved based on the judgment reflexes that must separate the leader from a stoned analysis and knowledge system.

Leadership implies a consequent monitoring of consequences that hypotheses and conclusions, and obvious or uncertain answers have at a professional level. By sustainably covering a profound way of introspection and awareness, but also thanks to a coordinated intuitive vision, sensibility, robust scenarios and unique reasoning that influences research, you have to bring your active elements to a perfect stage, in order to trigger the becoming process.

This becoming is reflected in your results. And it depends on how much of the human psyche you know.

Leadership is the experience you get through autosuggestion, or a personality transfer that is not available to everyone, noting that you must not turn into an experiment for someone else.

The Knowing Being Whose Reflex Is Becoming points out the road a leader has to cover in order to achieve the expected performances. This road, that is expected to have an ascending trend, is inimitable and it's build in time. It can have a course full of obstacles and detours. Or it can be straight, depending on the leader's previous knowledge, abilities and experience. It isn't built according to arithmetic formulae, but it always involves elements belonging to the unique and personal development fund.

The Labyrinth Of Darkness

On December 01, 2011

Bring your contribution to the development of the people's character, by stimulating the exteriorization of their inner being.

Do you remember that emotional scene from the movie "Meet Joe Black (1998)"? Susan takes Joe to her father's library. She tells him, pointing with her hand to an older clock:

- When I was little, my mother used to say that you could set your heart by this clock.

- Could you? He asks.

Joe smiled at her with sympathy. He had the impression that understands what was in her soul, but literally, he did not suspect not half as much. He felt that his emotions are increasing. Around a few seconds, he examined her in silence. He had not ever been until then so isolated from what he knows, had not ever confronted with such an impact of unknown feelings. In his mind dwelt an impenetrable darkness.

At her turn, Susan did not have any reference point, nothing that would help her distinguish reality from illusion, which would help her perceive the feelings of the Joe's soul. It was strange, enigmatic, scary, but in a way that aroused emotion, not in one that would make her feel threatened in some way. The effect of darkness on her sense of "orientation" became of secondary importance.

She does not need to understand everything about his essence. The sole impact of this fundamental step - closeness to him, the desire to give herself to him, despite the fact that she could not penetrate the unknown of him – it was enough to arouse his interest. She looked at him with that hope, joy, faith, spiritual contentment that only a pure heart knows it.

Susan seemed to read Joe's thoughts: "I don't know life; I don't know that feeling that gives you amazing thrills, which is called love." However, she seemed to say: "Don't worry about this. One day you'll understand. "

Leadership: Your destiny is predetermined by the expression of the soul's gratitude which must be given the greatest freedom of interpretation?

If we say that leadership involves some modeling of interpersonal relationship experience, then we allude to a multiplication of direct and subjective means of transmission of appreciation, recognition, approach, attachment, satisfaction and confidence. These small power systems with positive energy, but also with a certain amount of appeal, which cancels any possibility of compromising credibility, can be diversely multiplied.

We can think, for instance, not only about the personal value transfer impulses, generated by life and spirituality pattern, but also about initiating spiritual experiences where destiny is predetermined by the contentment of mind. A considerable baggage of such experiences becomes available to individual choice of a new state of life, lived in joy and gratitude.

He who wants to contribute to a sustainable leadership does not take refuge in a closed universe, where there is no possibility to engage in interpersonal relationships, based on loyalty and understanding, but something more than that. He becomes a combination of attitudes and states of expressing human need and solidarity, feeling and intelligence giving him power to convey, understand and assimilate emotions – all dosed accurately, depending on life experience, after a random scenario.

Before you give yourself a freedom to interpret your soul's satisfaction, at least comfortable, you have to find a direct connection between what happens to you and the causes that caused the events that marked you.

Or we can think, for example, about the modeled stimulation of human factor, probing in vast deposits, still unexplored by those directly participating in the identity formation and development process, which takes place in a permanent dynamic throughout life.

Leaders are very close to this kind of experiences. They always move towards this horizon of understanding and spiritual fulfillment, full of interest and momentum to combat any form of "opposition". They do not change direction and move towards a direction where people without emotional baggage abandon, wanting to end up with an entire attempt to form a convenient reality, supported by finesse, sincerity and affection.

Leadership: Do you run away from something you do not know in the hope of freeing yourself from the old monsters who have consecrated you to a vocation which is achieved by pushing the self beyond the accepted limits of consciousness?

Those who run away from something they do not know will never be able to rise to the standards of motivation and spiritual contentment imposed by a momentary state that passes with great haste.

The soul of a human is made from small pieces of feelings, of thoughts, desires, emotions and values. And your duty as a leader with a great power of understanding is to unite all these fragments in order to reveal the pure pattern of everyone. Nevertheless, for this you must seek the principle after which you can connect these fragments. This is at your fingertips.

Just as vitamin D it is produced in the body through the action of sunlight on the skin, so you will be able to increase the effect of resonance of your leadership according to your ability of connecting states of mind, by plugging them to that switch that lights up in people the light of change and becoming, of revitalizing their lives.

You could instill more easily the people's confidence people in you, if you put emphasis on their spiritual content, if you help them discern what they really are. For this you need to capture the best aspects that would excite their interest, to look deep within their being, especially from the angle of your contribution to their "recovery".

The motivation of an unpredictable transformation is what surprises you in a short moment of doubt and lures you to tread on roads you do not understand, but that fundamentally change you because you experience them through the way you share them.

On what you lay emphasis in leadership? Are you running away of something you do not know in people? Do you lack that desire of penetrating their entire spiritual labyrinth in search of their true identity? Can you set your heart by the clock of their emotions and, implicitly by their entire way of being? Is there a very important aspect of your relationship with people that you overlook?

The labyrinth of darkness is your chance to connect to other people, to integrate yourself into their world.

The true human nature is like a dark labyrinth, shaded by many feelings and emotions – you must penetrate into it, to banish all doubts, then to choose and direct the positive feelings toward a source of light. The more you know about his essence, the more you understand his true spiritual content, the faster you will find the best path.

Conclusion: In leadership, you are working with people and for people. They are different in education, culture, character and behavior, at the same time they are different by the ways of externalizing their feelings.

In order to make them your allies, you need to know including the hidden ones "inside an impenetrable shell." Starting from their careful observation and up to knowing their true nature, you have to get over a dark labyrinth. However, armed with patience, perseverance, appropriate means of communication you will get to know their feelings and ideals, you will succeed in mobilizing them in order to achieve the common goal, which is light at the end of the labyrinth.

The Last Confession Of An Assassin

On February 21, 2012

Optimize your emotional personality, by focusing the antennas of your soul towards the inner depths of the other people.

The past was mingled with the future and there was nothing else besides that last moment that the greedy time could not snatch it without leaving a trace - the moment when God gives you from his plenitude of good will one last chance to confess your thoughts and hidden feelings.

The bullet went through Leon, but did not kill him immediately. Stansfield, the corrupt cop, cold-blooded approaches his victim, finally pinned on the ground. The two killers were face to face.

Suddenly, the memories returned alive in the mind of Leon and he saw again the image of Mathilde - more beautiful, more charming from all his memories. For the first time in his life of an assassin, there was something bigger and more ambitious than the crime. It was the sensation of the clean conscience. Love, its thrilling story, opened the secret depths of his being - because once, a judgment of God forced him to fall in love.

Leadership: Is the hard part of the denouement predicted to you by destiny the "paradoxical courage" of giving up on yourself in the use of the meaning you give to life?

The essence of the last words. Stansfield has bowed over the exhausted and the full of blood body of his victim. Then Leon, with his last powers, removed the safety pin from one of the grenades attached to his vest and put it in the hand of his rival. Then he told him in one breath, with all the humility from his heart: "This is for Mathilda ! "

He said these last words as if he wanted to reveal the content of his soul, to wash his sins, as if he wanted to absolve himself of all the crimes committed, by his awful guilt before dissipating from this world.

As if the soul of Mathilda had thrilled into his consciousness and, filled with a pure love to this little being, who had made a place in his life, pushed by the most pious thoughts, by the warmest feelings, to avenge the death of her parents murdered by Stansfield, by making in this way a service for her. This was his only good deed in a lifetime - to kill another criminal out of consideration for his dear being. Through a genuine act of conscience, Evil defeats Evil. BOOM !

Leadership: Did your reality become an unwanted experience, to which only the opposite manifestation of your personality can resist?

If you want to add meaning to your life, first add meaning to the world revealed to you by your attachment to someone or something. For approaching the principles of the art of leadership, you must always remain yourself – deep in the way of thinking, honorable deep down in your soul, which is to love intensely your being, with and all the attributes and qualities of an image of a "The Other" too little taken into account.

The opposite manifestation of your personality, through the forced creation of a parallel reality, is achieved through the permanent pressure exerted on you by the obligation of placing yourself first in someone else's life, or vice versa, to place someone else first in your life.

If are not glimpsing nowhere in your being those beneficial emotions, which aggregated to give value to your existence, guiding you towards a better way, if you are not animated by the ideal of self-knowledge, then your leadership will lose expressiveness and reliability. In another train of thoughts, you will become blind and insensitive to what is going on within you and around you.

Just as the kidney eliminates substances, which are no longer useful to the human body, thus participating in the detoxification process, so and you, in order to ensure the spiritual foundation of your being, you must obey your leadership to a process of "detoxification" - that is to eliminate those personality traits that harm your Ego.

To thrive when you get to the steep slope of a height does not offer the amplitude of vision, first seek to surpass yourself by returning to those feelings that draw attention to the inability of recovering the memories of a past that stubbornly ceases to pass.

Leadership: Can you manifest your personality in an environment devoid of an echo, without forgetting about everything that is inside of you?

An environment devoid of an echo is a space in which you feel both at home and alienated, without anyone fueling it with life passion in the patience of the present moment. It is a closed space where emotions exist, yet are never brought to light. It symbolizes forgetting yourself in the hands of the will of a Providence that gives meaning to life only when you make out of love the point of reference of the center called "deviation from the ordinary".

Do you remember the poem "Manfred" by George Gordon Byron? The spirits are offering Manfred certain advantages, but the Byronic hero remains at the only thing that he wants, forgetting: "This is all I ask, not to forget all that is in me."

Precisely what did Leon, the hero of the movie "Leon - The Professional (1994)" – has not forgotten all that was best in him in the last moment of his life. Mathilda has contributed to the return of his human feelings, by inducing him the capacity to express those feelings, which had the force of ordering his inner world.

How do you fortify the personality of those around you? Do you manage to make from a person a better human being, by enriching and completing his intense feelings, and humanizing the essence of his nature? Do you have the capacity to express feelings that can induce to others the same or similar feelings?

Do you manage to imprint in people's consciousness, by the means of your leadership, those three pulses of human becoming: the spiritual ideal, the ideal of reason and the ideal of knowledge?

Be everything you can be, no matter the context you find yourself in and in which change takes place, following your strongest feelings.

The last confession of an assassin highlights the element that explains and makes us understand the soul of the one close to us, putting us forward, in a concrete way, the sensitivity and the emotional state that dominates his thoughts and actions, that is his spiritual existence, of which these thoughts and emotions are dependent.

Are you the owner of that extraordinary power of penetration of the individual human ego?

This force is mainly the result of a special consideration for those who do not know their true Ego, for any vibrant feeling and for how this feeling it is externalized.

Accept the equality. Look at the people without prejudices, without hatred, but with the passion of a skillful leader concerned mainly with the human nature, cognitive or behavioral. Optimize your emotional personality, by focusing the antennas of your soul towards the inner depths of the other people.

Conclusion: It is said that the heart knows ways that the mind does not suspects. Understanding people, knowing their innermost secrets of the soul, you can direct them, by speculating those hidden qualities, of which even they are not aware, in favor of achieving the excellence.

The Last Hundred Meters

On January 12, 2009

Prevent the erosion process of your potential, by creating a positive impact on your actions.

Being the best, to reach the top position is not exactly the easiest thing to do. At the stamina test, the athletes who are always on the first places on the podium are those who are truly determined to win. I mean those who act with more intensity, with more desire and giving everything especially in the last moment, at the end of the race. Just like at the stamina test, high level performers increase the speed exactly on the last hundred meters on their way to excellence.

Before reaching the summit of success, top performers had to confront a lot of obstacles and went through a lot of attempts which have not resulted so well. But for them this was the stamina test, the big training which leads them to success.

Leadership: Can you add value to the role you undertake, constantly claiming that you are someone other than you really are?

Our personal and professional value flows from the depth of our own being. By this, I mean the extent that gain our trust, faith and will when we exercise our competencies. We can prevent the erosion process of our potential (which ensures that differentiating note that we need in order to function effectively) by creating a positive impact on our actions.

The analysis of the map of our being comes to help us, allowing us to find out the weakening of our own powers of resistance and persistence (which give force and brilliance to our potential) and to eliminate those extreme situations, in which we cannot highlight our qualities. Such a map is called the "map of depth" because it fragments every element of personality, eliminating those factors that influence the character in a negative way and impede your most efficient functioning.

Therefore, for a more accurate assessment of those parameters that do not lead to the optimizing of your functioning, it is needed for you to resort to the analysis of a special map, in which are rendered the differences between attitude, character, talent and intelligence. Do you know how to orient yourself on this map? Do you know where to direct your attention and energy so that your performance to grow and to achieve your goals?

To constantly claim to be someone else means to assume an identity that is not sufficient for itself but is rather defined by the relationships with the trophies of the victory gained by identifying a direction of action placed in the middle of the "unexpected".

Just as the flu is caused by a virus, not by low temperatures, so the decrease of your potential it is due to the erosion of your value creation leverage, not necessarily of your poor professional capacity and performance. This lever has an "arch" that pushes you forward, which helps you do some jumps in your own development - only if you define your attitude towards life, towards those qualities that you really need, towards their effectiveness in practice and the compatibility with their own skills.

Count Zeppelin has remained in the history of conquering the air, not so much by the famous discovery – the flying airship – but by imposing a creed that echoes around eternity:

"Defeated is only the one who thinks he is ! "

Failure exists only for those who give up in the last hundred meters. Like the gypsy at shore, they drown even when they are very close to the goal they have established. As a consequence, everything they did, everything they have been through was in vain. Everything was hard work without meaningless. And I'm not referring to the lazy people and lacking in ambition, but those who work hard and capable of much more, who really had the desire to affirm, but who didn't have the needed "strenght" to reach final, to achieve the intended goals.

The role a leader assumes is like the good star of the discoverers that emerges when you experience the whole unity of life in the very unity of the mission God Himself has set for you.

Winners are noticed on the last hundred meters. Winners go on even when they think no power. Nothing brings them down; nothing makes their rhythm slow no matter how hard the situation would be at a time. They are so stubborn and firm in their decision, to win, to succeed in any circumstances that they are willing to do many efforts. Therefore, in their case, success has nothing to do with destiny, but with a determination to be winners. And winners know that the result of their last efforts is noticed at the end of the course, on the last hundred meters.

Prevent the erosion process of your potential, by creating a positive impact on your actions.

The Last Memory From The Land Of Sight With Eyes Of Immortality

On April 22, 2020

The great work of creation is the result of nature's need to be dominated by the superiority of the spirit of observation and by the living sensitivity of the artist enchanted by the beauty that does not drain along with life.

Two images collided in my head, full of charm, full of color, full of emotion, as if they were part of the creation of a painter who could not expose his canvases painted in time with great care and much soul, thus losing the chance to be understood in all the splendor of his genius.

The first image, of a leaf that chases, chases and chases again to that relentless call of a possible time only in a fairytale landscape, included in a dream full of magic. The second image is the artistic description of a May rose, freshly blossomed, prepared for a unique adventure in a landscape of rare beauty, where time seems to have stood still.

If I had not been the prisoner of my mind that belongs to a dream about the great representations of art, because the dream is also an embodiment of my mind filled with the symbolic charge that only nature can understand, I would certainly have directed my mind more and looking at a life beyond the spell of a divine comfort. Because nature, with all its elements, sublime by creating the taste of beauty and grandeur, gave power to my eyes to look at what no one can see, guess or discover, turning reality into a dream full of sublime images.

And behold, the leaf of the dream comes out of my mind slowly, with much compassion, with much impetus, and is seen through the small meanings of the associations between faith and science, between creation and creator. It doesn't take long for my eyes to reconcile with a view detached from Simona Popescu's Exuviile, capturing a raging green that stretches in uneven characters further: "Nothing is nobler than the single gaze that connects two hearts with one look."

Leadership: Does your creation have that unique quality of observation and that power of the eye to penetrate the depths of a reality that provides visual content based on the idea of aspiration to the heights of a spiritual world?

And here the leaf reminds me of myself, of my face, admired in the splendor of the trajectory of a truly visionary artist, in another state of nature. I think that in the depths of its soul it cared for me a lot, because it revolved around me like around infinity, hoping to enjoy the delight of my eyes in the space of a superior transparency of memory, so as to produce a doubling of the being in a new unit. It also felt that it was being pushed by an unseen force to acquaint me with a special way of discovering art in the life of the Creator.

My horizon becomes the transparency of a superior infinity charged with the charm of the memory of my being, in a dream caught by the eyes that never tire of looking at the great metamorphosis of Creation, in which I myself am the ferment, the emblematic generator of an infinite semiosis of metaphors that value elements of the visual alphabet.

My eyes understand the words of the leaf through visual language, so that the painter can capture a special psychological moment in the life of the model, right on the line of an exacerbation of artistic coordination. I want so much to be part of its shape and color that I feel that something of the divinity of nature, of its greatness, is synchronized with the beating of my heart.

Therefore, the idea of aspiration to the heights of a spiritual world comes from the synchronization of the act of creation with that particularity of nature to be in permanent dialogue with its own image through an enlightened understanding, a mystical experience.

Leadership: Can you enrich visually perceived content with imagined content enhanced by the hidden, intrinsic utterance of the means of expression?

I understood why the leaf lets me touch it without disturbing it, as if bowing its head to the joy of being part of my universe, accepting my touch without overlapping with the reality of a creator who restrains chaos, leaving me to extract the images myself artistic from what is seen in its depth. Because it also experiences an immense joy, that of not being forgotten, lost in the sight of an art of an indescribable splendor and sensitivity, which only the artist can discover in a story full of colors and charm.

The chromatic chords, the contrast between light and shadow, the personification of a concrete impression, the memory of reaching an external form of nature, the form of receiving beauty in a setting full of fantasy and flavor, make their presence felt through the moods that, when gathered together, give rise to spiritual energy meant to maintain a sensitive personality. Am I the symbol of a being of nature that no one understands and perceives as an archetype of human sensibility?

I was the leaf that fell on the shoulder of Emperor Maxentius before he drowned in the Tiber in the battle of Milvian Bridge. This makes me believe that I belong to a descendant of kings, the magic of my touch, tender and invigorating, being his last memory from the Land of Sight with Eyes of Immortality. Time, nature, the wind, led me in the path of the gaze that never forgets the beauty of a world lost in a bizarre and confusing mixture of history, ideas, languages and dialects.

And only you, the One who writes in the universal voice, have the right to place me somewhere in a Dalí landscape, with liquefied clocks in the foreground. And if I am the endless Creator of the Universe, the only one able to speak to nature, to turn into a leaf so that it can be the main witness to all the important moments of history, and to which no one has answered with the right look, then to me it is time to say these words, which I hope will not be in vain:

A gaze that endures and passes the test of time is the manifestation of the power of the eye to see in every being a ray of light, and in every element of nature a being full of glory and greatness.

The Last Memory In The Land Of Sight With Eyes Of Immortality was when I met a leaf, or rather, when the leaf appeared in my field of vision to be immortalized as a world under the spell of an endless story.

I look up with a dream of mysterious longing for a loved one and look into the colorful eyes that embrace the greatness of nature. You're right, nature answers me, your eyes are so dear to me that I will never miss them.

The Last Ray Of Light In The Dark Hell

On March 06, 2011

Come back to yourself, so that you can relate to what others feel about you.

She suddenly realized that she was facing the biggest test of her life and she didn't really know how to cope with it. The people's law, the masked ones from the SWAT troops, grabbed her on the corridor that led to her apartment, where "her foster-parent", Leon, the professional killer, was in. One of the men put his hand to her mouth and asked her in a tone that inspired only fear.

- Is he alone ? Does he expect you ? Is there a code or a way of knocking at the door for him to know it's you?

Mathilda quickly understood what other misfortunes she should await. "Leon will die if I don't help him somehow", she told to herself. This thought threw her into a boundless despair; she oscillated for a second. It was impossible for her not to give heed to the voice that frightened her soul. Therefore, calling for help all her power, all the courage of her heart, showed the man a (fake) code that she allegedly use for Leon to recognize her.

Leadership: Can you accomplish your modeling traits with the contribution of all those items that you complete in the culmination of your existence?

She didn't remain insensitive to his influences. Through her loving gesture of that turning point, Mathilda gave proof of her valuable traits that she had, like humanism, mercy, compassion and loyalty. Without a doubt, she was for Leon that kind of friend that you're sure you'll always find, inspired by the desire to be useful and help you at any time.

If you watched the movie "Leon – The professional", you know that only Mathilda managed to enlighten Leon's soul, being close to him in all difficult moments. And that's because he had the power to make her like him and believe in him; he had the power to bring forth in her the desire to understand him, accept him in her life and conceive affection for him.

To be perfect in your being is to attract in your life the admiration of compromised people that gives you a different alternative to living. And the highlight of your existence is when moral consciousness and sensitivity develops fully, allowing you to assume full responsibility for your actions and for the way you make your willingness to revive the shadowy world that inoculated to you by the fear of being rejected by others known.

Leadership: Do you exercise authority over men by a continuous validation of inner value that they possess in a high degree of strength of enduring a hard life?

The man with leadership qualities has the ability to expand the evolving conception of the possibilities of building a virtuous lifestyle, based on a form of self-transmission to individuals relating to him, he isn't a bore bringing anything good. And by this, I think a function to represent a new perspective, which attracts new experiences and attitudes, triggered in stages, avoiding any inconvenience of constructing a new direction, is fulfilled also by leadership if the leader's authority is not undermined.

In this regard, of a new beginning, a new approach wanting to be superior, combining respect for life efficiency with sincerity and affection, it could be argued that leadership serves widening man's moral, emotional and behavioral "repertoire" – as a factor of becoming.

The leader makes possible the intersection of several alternative forms of future actions, aiming a greater thoroughness of what his authority means and how it is exercised over people, by a continuous validation of their inner value.

Therefore, leadership probably serves the adaptive function in times of accelerated transformation, such as for instance that of impact with a difficult mentality, within whose limits a new vision cannot fit.

It is what I call "a transfer function" of the model of representing world and life, differently dealing the new conception of the relationship between the appearance and disappearance of a new conscience, felt like a blessing, a time invariant.

Leaders with a huge amount of warmth manage to produce these key factors of human experience, providing significant evidence of support with which they can generate a new light on people's lives. In this regard, we can say that leaders are part of the society's "guidance system". No wonder they work diligently in this respect, because they are often perceived as sources of light shining amid the world darkness.

Leadership: Do you put emphasis on "who you really are" in a continuous chain link that binds you to an "I" that is perhaps the hardest thing to define?

The criterion by which leadership can be considered good or not is given by the extent to which it expresses in a new and personal form your feelings for others. Regardless of your final goal, you should always emphasize your real self. Come back to yourself so that you can relate to what others feel for you.

Just as the image of a painter is formed by the reaction of his senses towards the model - so the people's perception about you is formed by the reaction of their perceptions towards the plus of humanity you manifest towards them. If you want the reaction of those around you to be a positive one, don't ever overlook the human element in everyday life and the importance of your inner voice, which helps you express your affection for others and cries for you to do the good think, expected by all.

The ability to build and maintain healthy relationships is determinant for the way people will relate to you in difficult moments.

Even if Leon seemed like a man who failed to get along with anyone, his heart widely opened for Mathilda, just as the flower opens its petals in the sun. You can determine the appearance of mutual trust if you interact with people and only if you physically fulfill them.

And especially if your Ego places you where it has the greatest chance of being noticed, enchanting a situation where attitude and emotional state relate to the identification of a pattern of behavior and a vision of the world whose existential values and paradigmatic reality can be recognized as being emblematic, defining and representative.

The last ray of light in the dark hell is the voice in your head you must give heed to in difficult moments. This voice tells you : « Be kind and help ». It's that inner voice that emphasizes all the best in you and illuminates your soul and your life.

Do you obey this voice? Or you find it very hard to believe in it?

The most skillful leaders make much of people's ability to express their emotions and feelings in the most beautiful ways, during the darkest hours.

The Last Refuge Of A Nonconformist Mind

On October 20, 2021

The existence of an artist can be captured only by comparison with the imposing silence that gives final decisions, but can be understood by entering a hectic world.

I really liked this movie when I was a kid, Once Upon A Time In The West (1968).The final scene is a memorable one, and is played "very slowly, very slowly." It's not about two fearless gunmen testing the edge of their lives with a single bullet, from a proximity that doesn't seem to know distance.These are not old accounts that had to be "settled" now or never.One being haunted by the pain of the distant past, the other being haunted (imperceptibly) by his own equal.

But it is about that moment of monumental silence, when each seeks the gaze of the other, in a single second the whole past unfolds, and suddenly the inevitable happens: man is no longer the maker of his own destiny, but becomes the prisoner of his own failure, from which he can only be freed by death. This moment is haunted by a flawless calm.

Man's character is often manifested by a longing that is put to the test during life, a deep longing that comes not only from his heart, but resounds like a battle cry on the horizon of various and unexpected events. This, until the decisive moment when that peace of mind, undisturbed by thoughts, reminds him of what he has become.

Have you become a new Self, the trophy of a decisive battle, the trophy of an "intransigence" beyond good and evil, or, perhaps, the last refuge of a nonconformist mind?

Leadership: Can you achieve your causal integration in a competition for apparent supremacy, by optimizing the relationship between cause and effect, between the beginning and the fulfillment of an act of control?

As a humble and modest soldier, but devoted to a noble cause, the gunman is not afraid of the first drop of blood that serves his devotion mentally and physically, and in the depths of his interest in firearms is not the slightest bitterness, maybe just a little emotional pain associated with loss, disappointment, grief, injustice.

But the other gunman isn't inferior either. Far from condemning the ambition that we can appreciate in any fearless man, he seems to have the double advantage of discretion: he has the quality of keeping a secret, of being reserved in attitude, words and deeds. Through an intimidating Urtysnepajdú, the crazy vibration of a world in agony, he refuses to become the helpless victim of a meaningless world, which he resists with irony and mockery, displaying a sly smile on his face.

But is it not in the essential interest of the cause itself that its most ardent servants have a greater share in a vulnerability meant to lose the horizon of opportunities than other activities? Or would it be better not to sacrifice your freedom, but also yourself, under the pretext of selflessness that makes you put any dreams in parentheses?

- The merit of discretion ! that's all. The only thing you know well, as a gunman, but you can't divulge, even if only the face could tell the truth, is that kind of pressure, the need to fit into a certain pattern of strong people, active and energetic, who know they can do anything, and also know that nothing is accidental on this earth. Yes, it is a kind of intimidating pressure that you have to use in your favor, and it is not just about looking impassively, but also doing a lot of harm if necessary. It's not just about "making things look good", it's also about the reward you receive after the end result.

The artist of an agitated world discovers himself through the discretion he manifests in an urgent situation in which the possibility of producing something captivating is maintained.

He is an artist because he promotes a state of mind that reflects the essence of the human soul, present everywhere and in everything: that of escaping from reality in order to venture with heroes in unknown worlds. In fact, this is what makes an artist: he starts from elements of reality to outline an imaginary universe, shaped by his vision.

The Last Refuge Of A Nonconformist Mind is the story of an artist who boldly redesigned his life, building his character from the various moods that his models try to take from the plane of objective reality. He calls himself an artist because his work corresponds to reality, but at the same time it offers an evocative image of a lost world.

The Last Status Of A Convict

On April 08, 2012

Maximize your potential of relating to the people around you, without breaking the continuous line of your own greatness.

Through the '90s the "Lionheart" made a great impact among the lovers of action movies. In short, Lyon Gaultier deserts from the Foreign Legion and reaches the United States of America. He finds his brother between life and death and his wife without the money needed to heal her husband and to take care of her child. For helping her, he gets involved in illegal fighting, at the urging and under the guidance of Joshua, with which he binds a close friendship.

Towards the end of the movie, Lyon is having as his ultimate adversary, Attila, a tremendous fighter with an impressive stature, who had never been defeated. Lyon, despite all efforts, could not cope with him. Being posted twice to the floor, he looked finally defeated.

All seemed lost, especially since Joshua dispelled any of his hope, by saying to him:

- Lyon, does not worth ! Stay the hell off ! That dude's gonna kill you ! I made a business, we will share everything as I promised ... Lyon, listen to me, I bet everything on Attila !

And these imposing words, painful, this shocking news - perceived by Lyon more as an offense somehow against his performances - coming from the one who owed his whole trust, loyalty and obedience, have had the opposite effect, by stimulating his internal energy and his physical resources.

A scream came from the bottom of the heart "NOOOO" has triggered in Lyon that anger, the reaction of refusing any restraints. Accumulating in a single moment a hatred, a huge thirst to win, as would be absorbed all the energy and all possible Human Resources, Lyon has raised for the third time from the floor and applies the coup de grace to Attila, followed by other several decisive blows. The great titanium was defeated.

Access to the most painful realities is conditioned by how you perceive defeat on the scale of your own limits, and depending on how you define your victory in a vaguely defined self-image.

If you cannot get close to a complete defeat, you will not be able to figure out its value. Because defeat preaches the proud exchange of one belief with another, giving birth to a completely autonomous mind and feeling, not only removed from God, but even excluding Him.

It may happen that in assessing your own leadership model to orient yourself after some values , ideals or principles that may not meet properly your status or of the other people, and thus to omit the "signaling points" which indicates your position towards them.

These signaling points are nothing but a succession of feelings, reactions, decisions, thoughts, experiences - interrelated, which optimizes your process of transformation in its entirety, being more a deterministic process - that conditions your access to the inner realities of other people.

Leadership: Do you demonstrate the opposite of a good by the result of a selfish bet?

The convict waits for his sentence. After the fight against Attila, the two friends Lyon (the winner), and Joshua (who bet against him), meet face to face. And only in this moment of supreme honesty and hard test for both - of inner reconciliation for Joshua, of forgiveness and understanding for Lyon - can the best be seen the proper depth of leadership, like a constant of development and transformation of the human character.

Joshua's face lost his touch expression and become sad, as if a higher authority would be found him guilty and convicted of high treason. Leaving his eyes with that slowness characteristic to people who hide their dark thoughts, overwhelmed by a speechless remorse, burned like the same guilt that Judah had to himself after he betrayed Christ, plucking up his heart, he said to Lyon, who was watching him with excitement:

- Indeed you have a big heart, Lionheart. Do not lose it, because you will never regain it.

And these last words were pronounced so softly, so shy, that Lyon seemed moved. In the moment when Joshua, overwhelmed with shame, wanted to move away, Lyon, in tears, laid his hand on his shoulder and hugged him as the best friend, absolving him of any guilt. What charges can he really bring? Because Joshua proceeded without faith, but in the spirit of friendship after all; for if he had really lost, his only gain would come from the wrong bet.

Leadership: Do you test the potential of transforming the duty of reviewing attitudes towards others through a statement of guilt, indifference or regret?

The convict was not denied, but forgiven and still accepted as the best friend. Here is the true essence of the man who embraces the leadership, calling for reconciliation, even when the others disappoint him by the lack of loyalty and commitment, who manages to expose their emotional side.

Victor Hugo and Honoré de Balzac, said at one point: "You must go down deeper when it comes to the depth of a wound."

We must understand that people are great only because of their inner value, and not due to the position they may occupy by chance. It is the evidence of true greatness of succeeding to connect to the emotional resources of those who despised your faith and to remedy any inconsistency between your feelings and theirs. The failure or the success in leadership does not depend on extrinsic causes, but to what it is in our being by itself.

Maximize your potential of relating to people around you, without breaking the continuous line of your own greatness.

Being tolerant means looking at things from the psychological perspective of the potential of transforming a conflict situation into a gratitude to the truths of a higher reality that is revealed to you. For example, the fact that you can prove the opposite of a good by the result of an egoistic bet.

The last status of a convicted reveals the position which holds an individual in your leadership and the way he manages to make peace with himself when he reveals the true face and his true values.

In guiding people, you must orient yourself by the way they act, but also by the decisive factors who have contributed to their transformation. Just as a writer transmits his feelings in words, so do you, transmit what you really are by calling for leadership, to the depth of your own feelings - and more precisely to the dose of greatness that points out your evolution.

The leadership can be promoted and optimized only by that category of individuals, who are willing to accept compromises in delicate situations. Namely, by those who stop any kind of pride and resentment, by grouping their forces, experiences, and values around some well-defined principles and approaches, so that they could fit in the dimension of a high-quality leadership.

The Last Word In The Hour Of Death

On April 05, 2010

Open your own way to performance and success, not removing yourself from the values that your leadership potential builds upon.

February 8, 1587, Fotheringhay Castle. Mary Stuart walks slowly, peacefully, armed with the three weapons of faith: a golden crucifix which she carries around her neck, the gemmy rosary at her girdle and an ivory cross which she holds firmly in her hand, into the large hall where the execution will take place. Her own execution. She will be submitted to a sore trial in this very day. Nothing can save her now; nothing can get her back on the throne. She is no longer hallowed, loved, or admired, she no longer has friends; she can no longer hang not even to a thread of hope.

God bears witness that she is completely innocent. However, she cannot object under any circumstance, she cannot change the judges' conviction, she cannot call anybody to her help, and she cannot do anything else. Who could approve her when everybody is against her, when everybody hates her guts, and would be happy not to see her queen anymore? Who could love her after losing two kingdoms, after stepping the black path of murder, burying two spouses, and after, because of a merciless lover of no principles, count Bothwell, the only man she ever loved and who she enthusiastically followed to the bitter end, bloody battles were fought and so many people died? Furthermore, who could do her justice where there is none, but just a boundless desire for power and control?

However, until the last moment, she cherished her royal majesty. In front of the scaffold, before dropping to her knees, before the priest finished his preach, Mary Stuart kissed the crucifix, made the sign of the cross and said her last words: "Into thy hands, O, Lord, I commend my spirit, as I stand here, on this cross, and spare my sins. Amen." Then, she kneeled down; the axe fell down with all its weight and force and, with it, perished the breath of the one who was queen since 6 days old. Finally, Mary Stuart no longer matters, she is forgotten...

Leadership: Is the tense role that you assume actually a variant of role conflict that appears at the level of the same status?

All leaders think on a large scale, fly high and approach their goals with great courage and tenacity. With the vision they have and which, for that matter, breath into everyone around them, they plan step by step, with a pretty large sense of responsibility, the course specific for the actions they will carry on. Even so, fortunately or not, and history abundantly proves it, as well, only those who are aggressive, competitive, controlled by a formidable ambition and animated by the desire of always being on the top of the pyramid of power will be able to dominate the political scene of a country until the last moment.

Only the wishes unyielding in difficult circumstances, with strong leading tendencies, governed by the desire of supremacy, will manage to fight against any plot or betrayal, and, valorously and continually fighting, will manage to win any battle and keep their position on the top of the pyramid.

A too noble, but weak heart. Mary Stuart had the power, being honored with the title of queen right from the first days of her life, but she lacked the essential qualities of a strong leader: courage, carefulness, resolution and an iron will – that develops over time, but she undoubtedly lacked that unmeasured urge specific to tenacious, arduous and unyielding leaders, who know to impose their will and interests, and who act without having to think too much. Moreover, she departed herself from the values and builds potential value of a good leader: integrity, solidarity, justice, morality and sense of duty.

The role conflict occurs when you assume a position which can only be accepted with the price of leaving it. You start to feel alienated by the world in which you developed, you feel overwhelmed by the huge responsibility of everything that happens to you, a situation culminating in the humble hiding within yourself caused by the shame of judgement and what others say.

Charm, beauty and elegance have brought the queen only a brief moment of glory, she knew how to draw people's attention with her gracefully and womanly appearances, but she did not know how to control "the ball on her own court", though, for a long time, she had truly devoted and wise councilors. Moreover, countless times, from many parts, she received clear signals and she was given precious advice, all in her support, for so she could direct her steps into the right direction. However, her mistake was that she always tried to build her future figuring that, being the queen, she was entitled to everything and she would be safe for any kind of trouble. And this, slowly led her to the scaffold, to perdition. Whoever bets everything on one number has more chances to lose than to win.

Leadership: Do you choose to be a leader or a puppet from the angle of a power that conceals its true nature in the long run?

The most effective leader is the one intelligent enough to surround himself with valuable people, a team of professionals he can always rely on, especially in difficult moments, that would provide important information and support optimal, so keep it away from any would be harmful in any way the image or career, so there are not "get caught" or worse, never to be trampled.

A leader who thinks he can succeed to achieve his goals with nothing more than puppets around him makes a bitter mistake. A puppet is only fitted for other people's use, she never dares, not give proof that the creative impulse, which can prompt it to act from its own initiative. It needs to subordinate, to serve, being manipulated at the same time. It can be on the winner's side, but never, under any circumstance, can be a winner by itself.

The power that conceals its true nature in the long run is a lost battle against yourself, creating thought patterns based on remorse, nostalgia, despair, doubts about the ethics of committed deeds, making it harder for you to perform as you please.

Although Mary Stuart was a queen, she was a terrific puppet in the hands of the cunning count of Bothwell, her concubine, who had greater interests than she could have ever imagined. In fact, all the problems of the queen arose because of this Don Juan, this never-failing seducer, having the formidable ability to discover human weaknesses; that, invaded by a single desire, motivate by a single purpose – that of seizing the power - pushed her to commit the greatest crimes.

Furthermore, Mary Stuart, dominated by that special feeling which only the people chained by one love; a never failing love, which urges to be fulfilled, completely devoted herself to him, she gave in to him with all her being, serving him with a vivid loyalty, with devotion and passion, until the last moment.

Before addressing leadership, try to relate to the level of experience that you, as of yet, do not possess – the experience of being a queen for a day, the last day of your life.

Can you endure the experience of being engulfed by something stronger than you? How do you treat the inability of being engulfed by the limits of sensibility?

Even so, love without reason takes people into the wrong direction. Just like any other tragic love story, both, husband and wife (as yes, they got married), had a terrible end: first, him, then, her, by their sins, as a punishment to all the murders and crimes they committed.

Both the puppeteer and the puppet finally shared the same grim destiny: a quick, but horrifying death, and only one thing warmed their souls in that last moment, one thought, a last word: "Amen".

The Last Word In The Hour of Death is actually a warning you need to consider when you place yourself on the seat of the kingdom: judgment is without mercy for the one who loses his character.

The Laureate Of The Medal Of Honor

On October 20, 2010

Highlight the strong consistency of your character, adopting the natural attitude of the "Man" that meets the standards of excellence imposed by others.

The movie "Uncommon Valor (1983)" tells the story of a group of Vietnam veterans who come together to save a former fellow who was taken prisoner, and he was also the son of retired colonel, Cal Thodes, who supported the entire operation. Before starting the mission, they are installed in a base where training begins. Daily trainings, which were very hard and complex, were supervised by Kevin Scott, former officer of the American Navy, who knew the latest training techniques and was a really passionate and a connoisseur of weapons.

Day after day, the will, determination and hope of the small group were weakened. Kevin Scott was asking way too much of them. The situation became very tense, and he had no idea that, sooner or later, his men's energy would vanish.

Leadership: Is the "denial" with which you try to fill the gap between what you are already capable of doing and what you are not yet ready to do alone tolerated?

What happens when you do not create a sense of unity within the team?

At one point, while carrying some heavy logs, one of them, Major Johnson, gave up. It wasn't supposed to happen like that. Not this way. Not when they were only a few days until the start of the operation. His desolation was expressed in his whole attitude. He could not face more training. His intense look, directed at Kevin, was filled with a terrible hatred.

To set a good example to others, Kevin grabbed the log and tried to take it further. But then, the unexpected happened. The most imposing and massive of his fellows, Sailor, also filled with a boundless hatred, eager to shed all his bitterness, suddenly rushed upon Kevin and beat him to a mummy.

Sailor did not feel any pain, no regret or shame, no feeling of guilt for the lesson he taught Kevin. An inner voice seemed to say, while watching his "leader" fell to the ground: "I feel nothing for him, in some way or another, except I want nothing to do with him anymore".

The denial implied by a management function can be explained by the refusal to admit something that is inconsistent with your views, maximizing the amount of errors that result from rewarding the lack of discipline or by inappropriately conditioning the rules that must be observed.

Leadership: Can you express your personality to the extent that your actions and decisions coincide with the exploitation of the line of action on a compromised debt?

Change or you will be changed. Nothing inspires more confidence and security to people than a leader who knows how to change his attitude.

After that violent conflict, after that sever lesson received with intense cold, Kevin changed his entire concept of leadership. He became a different person, a man who understood twice:

he understood from people's attitude and behavior their intentions, thoughts and opinions, their limits and principles and how much he can push it. He understood which are the resources and the most effective ways to motivate people and how to maintain a balance between his own interest and that of them.

People see your involvement in ordinary activities as being very important. As a leader, you are their safe pipeline to an inexhaustible, fresh and lively resource of energy. Use all your resources, find an effective way to get people do what you want, but without forcing them to push their limits.

What limits? I would say that depends on every individual. If you're that kind of leader who, very self-reliant, always says to himself, without guessing people's mood: "I'll make them seriously work and make them creak in their shoes", and if you'll take reckless, drastic decisions, then your motivation will be pretty weak. A cold, resulting from doubt and an inability combined with fear will gradually begin to penetrate in the core of people's feelings, and eventually, you will be left with a perfect indifference.

A compromised debt is a recognition that you do not fully deserve, mainly due to the wrong effects to get an agreement of understanding through a lack of control over the way you treat people. Their actions have no impact on what is happening to them, for which they feel helpless, depressed and apathetic – or, worse, they begin to enact deeds of hatred and revenge.

Leadership: Sometimes, you are obliged to behave not as you are, but as others force you to?

If you have a fierce nature, ready to catch fire at any moment, whose behavior is lacking any sense, you will never be able to feel people's emotion, which is expressed through their language and behavior and exhibit: understanding, respect, cooperation, tolerance, solidarity.

If you're that kind of man, you're obliged to behave not as you are, not as you think is best, but as others force you to. As such, it is necessary for you to adopt the natural attitude of a leader who greatly respects his subordinates, to do everything with much kindness and not to behave with them like they were the meanest people, but to keep untouched your sense of honor, always show people respect and love, but without abandoning your task.

One is for people to obey orders and another is for them to follow your example. Don't forget that the leader is like a diamond in the mines from people's heart.

Leadership: Can you bring people to the threshold of getting closer to what singles you, without modifying their pattern of thinking?

Your power to change will induce change in others' behavior and mentality, beneficial for both sides for an effective leadership and a fruitful collaboration. If you adopt a rigid attitude, if you develop some performances that exceed the team's ability, you will arouse hate, weakness and feelings of worthlessness and even revenge.

When you feel these feelings arousing, when you understand that the team's ability is overwhelmed by the demands imposed on them, you have to immediately "change your tune", otherwise you will only lose. The most effective way to motivate people to follow you is to change your attitude towards them.

Do not forget a single moment that you are a man among other men. A person who guides people in a certain direction, but who, in his turn is guided by them. Therefore, you must be a man of quality, not a nobody. You are "validated" as a leader according to pluses or minuses provided by others, only if you manage to achieve the standards of excellence imposed by them.

To bring people to the threshold of getting closer to what singles you, without modifying their pattern of thinking, requires you to continually reconsider, to constantly reveal your attitudes of any kind, inner or outer, to evaluate your limits, perceptions, values and find out who you really are through the experience of not being able to make a decision by yourself without their consent.

You will never be able to mark your presence in people's lives, without walking the roads walked by them.

The Medal of Honor is a symbol of people's respect to you. It's a symbol of their appreciation, which has practical consequences in your future activities. It is, perhaps, the highest proof of their gratitude for your efficiency, for your qualities as a leader – a leader who has the power to change his thoughts and attitude whenever he goes astray.

The laureate of the Medal of Honor can be even you.

The Law Between The Extremes Of Self

On November 11, 2024

The degree to which you manage to navigate between the contrasts of the self and express an authentic vision, combining freedom of expression with the discipline of form, defines the essence of the path taken.

Running on mountain ridges is a journey between limits, each conquered peak inevitably calling for descent. For my sister, Oana Fântânaru, mountain running is a vivid metaphor for the duality of existence, as each extreme finds its balance in its opposite. In the rhythm of her steps, each ascent paves the way for a descent, as if each victory demanded its own humiliation.

But, at the same time, this journey is a construction of an intimate space, a kind of "proximity of the possible", which marks the edge of personal limits, but also a space of pure artistic expression, which marks the transcendence of physical limits. Each climb represents an attempt to "Afiryhs Etfqiuaj", a concept that symbolizes the deep fusion between ascent, introspection and artistic expression, where Oana feels one with the mountain slope, her spirit finding its echo in the eternal rhythm of the art of transforming effort into grace.

The artistic act, for a runner, is an expression of strength to transcend physical limits, by merging effort with grace. Running thus becomes a measure of its strength and vulnerability, and the ascent, this art in motion, is a drawing that raises, with each step, a line on the mountain canvas. When Oana reaches the top of the mountain, only then is the continuous sculpture of the spirit revealed, shaping her in the rhythm of her own evolution, redefining her limits. In this context, the rise of Oana becomes the symbol of a position obtained with difficulty, which can be lost in a moment of inattention.

Leadership: Are the characteristics of your artistic experience causally determined, or finalist, in the sense that the goal pursued must take the form of a vision that provides direction and coherence to the entire path traveled?

Oana said at one point: "I feel that I live between two extremes, in a permanent tension, like a creation of a painter who juggles light and shadow, forming a fragile balance. For this reason the state of presence of my being in space artistic, representing the balance between strength and fragility, makes me believe that art and running are inseparable. And if I feel a tremendous call to the heights, it is because of the vision that encompasses my spirit in a form of attachment to the purity of nature, with the specification that each step becomes an expression of this deep connection."

I noticed something else. Because there is another extreme, more difficult to face, in that it tests the inner limits, which implies the acceptance of vulnerability. It is about an inevitable duality between rise and fall, between the two extremes of each trial, like a "doubled world." Comme un éclair dans la nuit de l'âme , each climb becomes a flash of consciousness, an opening both to oneself and to the outside.

For Oana, the mountain is a scene where the balance between physical and inner strength becomes vital. At every step, she finds a foothold, a moment of stillness, where she hears her heart beating with the deep rhythm of the mountain. But at the same time, she feels the tension of contrasts, because doubling means crossing a fragile space between effort and relinquishment, beyond the usual limits of resistance, beyond any control she can impose on herself.

Leadership: How can you transform the polarities of life into a journey of deep and lasting balance, recognizing the transitory nature of each elevation?

Likewise, Thomas Mann's novel The Enchanted Mountain reminds me, at every turn, of climbing as a form of contemplation. In those moments, I realize that ascension is not just a simple physical movement – it is a process of profound transformation. Each peak becomes a shrine of introspection, and the descent is a lesson in acceptance, a kind of serene resignation, in the form of a return to oneself. Like a "Yosseber Hiersadne", a fleeting moment of clarity, the climb reveals to me a whole philosophy of balance. It's not just about reaching the top, it's about understanding that I must leave it humbly, recognizing the ephemerality of each rise.

An appropriate passage from Thomas Mann's novel The Enchanted Mountain, which expresses the idea of inner transformation through the experience of ascension and introspection, is this:

Like a drawing in contrasts, this mountain experience is a fragile balance between lights and shadows, between extremes in balance. Or, as Oana herself said well: "Climbing these steep roads showed me that the appreciation of the ascent becomes all the more profound as soon as I accept the challenge of the descent, especially since here I can learn the true measure of strength. After all, running is a perpetual journey of understanding that both the peak and the valley are parts of the same landscape.I define myself by both because the height gives me purpose and the valley reminds me to stay anchored in deeper truths."

In running you find your balance, a kind of "proximity of extremes" in which you define your place in the universe of movement. With each climb you discover your limits, but also the depths of your descent. It is like a "balancing canvas" that keeps you between the two extremes , shaping you like a work of art based on the contrast between light and shadow. In this journey, you can find your own form of leadership – a leadership of accepting that both peaks and valleys, both ups and downs are necessary for your self to be fulfilled through transformation.

So the success of a blazing course is measured by the degree to which your running form and your determination merge into a unified whole, reflecting a balance between freedom and discipline. From this point of view, the essence of the traveled path can be defined as a journey towards authenticity, adjacent to a harmony between extremes, by contrast with the limitations imposed by conventional thinking.

Leadership manifests itself when you turn the extremes of life into an exercise in balance, recognizing that every climb requires also accepting the descent.

Does your self reflect the essence of a balance born of contrast? How do you manage to maintain the perfect balance between the ambition to reach new heights and the wisdom to respect the inner rhythm?

The law between the Extremes of the Self applies to the search for authenticity, excluding any attempt at superficial compromise, especially on an artistic level. What you feel, what you experience, what you see during the journey becomes a lesson of self-knowledge, from which you constantly learn, beyond the limits imposed by the outside. My sister, Oana Fântânaru, champion of mountain half-marathons in Romania so many times, reminds us all that true power lies in embracing both extremes, finding the essence of balance between them.

In this approach, the "Law between the Extremes of Self" becomes an invitation to discover ourselves and navigate gracefully between the polarities of our being, finding the dynamic balance between will and vulnerability, between ambition and art. This applies both to the mountain runner, who faces his own limits and searches for his inner strength, and to the artist, who juggles between chaos and refinement to create an authentic work. Through this balance, the creative potential of each is manifested, showing that true mastery comes from combining contrasts into a unitary expression, in which the self asserts itself freely and harmoniously.

How can you integrate the lesson of the mountain into your life - that every ascent requires a descent to achieve true balance?

The Law Of Attachment

On September 23, 2010

Attach yourself to people who can make you a better man, and you will find permanently emotional support in them.

A scene from the movie "The Count of Monte Cristo (2002)", which I saw again last night, has remained strongly stuck in my mind. The Count remains alone with Jacopo, his faithful companion, in his golden chariot, after he denies Mercedes, his former girlfriend. He grabs him by the coat, looks him in the eye and says to him, with the determination of the man that nobody and nothing can deviate from his goal:

- If you intend one more time to interfere with my business, I promise, I swear I'll kill you.

Jacopo did not react. He looks at the Count with bitterness. He understood the words hat betrayed a bad conscience, knowing well what is happening in his soul. Then he says to him, unable to control his emotion:

- You have a fortune, a beautiful woman who loves you. Take the money, the woman and live your life. Forget about this plan of revenge. Take what you have won... I am still your companion. I swore I will protect you and I intend to keep my promise, even if I have to protect you from yourself.

Leadership: Do you count on what's running in your background for your merit to be recognized of having given an original interpretation to the role you have in securing a dominant position?

The dominant position you adopt in an unequal exchange of opinions and impressions, based on the optimization of the experience-knowledge relationship, allows the evaluation of a starting point of a vision between the feedback you send in order to observe what it is that you actually need to change the feedback you receive so you do not forget to reflect on what you did not expect to see in yourself.

In your background runs a command of the type: "I shouldn't listen to anyone" or a command of the type: "I need to know the truth that can free me from myself ! "?

A heart enchained by other people opens only to a true friend. The Count of Monte Cristo, although he was always surrounded by the society people, he only trusted in one man, Jacopo. His words, said with good intentions, pierced his heart of steel, chasing sorrow and that bitter taste of vengeance and suffering from his soul.

Is your level of leadership continued by responding to the feedback received, from which the immediate recognition of your authority to act in the name of your own truth derives?

Your level of leadership can imply an interpretation of an exploratory conclusion based on facts and hypotheses from which derives either the immediate recognition of your authority to act in the name of your own truth or the challenge to your ability to meet the requirements of a role of a guarantor of change.

Only a true friend takes part wholeheartedly to your misfortune and is at your disposal for any of your needs. Only a being that you placed higher than any other human beings can manage, using all possible means, to give meaning to your life.

The famous Abbe Prevost was quite right when he said: "Nothing is more admirable and doesn't value virtue more than the trust with which you knock at the gate of a man's heart, whose honest character you know."

Jacopo's Christian impetus, or maybe his gentle compassion, or his convincing advice attenuated the Count's thoughts of revenge, refreshed a little his frigid heart, causing that sense of emptiness and pain he was seized to the bone to disappear. Jacopo's warm words had a notable influence in the Count's life who, at the end of the movie, reconciled with Mercedes and got back to his life after the original ordinance.

Personal development is based on the virtue of not becoming the decisive criterion of truth that does not save you from the glory of vanity – defined as the sum of all regrets and enemy intentions.

The attachment to someone you hold dear broadens your horizon and gives you back your optimism. Everything in leadership is closely related to your relationship with other people. The most valuable evidence of a true friend is the warmth of his feelings. Jacopo's constant presence near him, as well as his love for Mercedes, removed the Count's hostile intentions. The Count had great need of this man, who gave him a valuable advice at the right time, a last resource of life, healing the wounds of his soul.

The attachment for someone springs from deep inside you and amplifies your aura that protects you of yourself and the obstacles of life. Nothing can stop you change but yourself, but a friend who cares for you and which you feel attached to can read deep inside your soul and can give you that undefined impulse you badly need to strengthen your spirit and enlighten your life perspective.

Leadership is the temperament you show in the midst of tumultuous feelings, approached from the standpoint of availability to react against everything that is inconsistent with your highest values, beliefs and aspirations.

Conclusion: The leader is a man with thoughts and feelings, as well. And, just like any man, he needs emotional support and listened to, needs to share his anxieties, fears and hopes to someone.

Who should be most fit to play this role? Certainly, only a true friend. And, as a great Romanian doctor said, "If you found a true friend, you should keep his soul with steel hooks."

The Law Of Biased Judgment

On March 10, 2010

When the team loses, the one who suffers is the leader, even if he's not always guilty.

In my opinion, the best Romanian football coach of all times is Victor Piturca. He trained two of the three biggest Romanian football teams, Steaua Bucharest and Universitatea Craiova. He trained the national team for 62 matches, scoring many victories. He succeeded in qualifying with the Romanian team at the European Championship in the years 2000 and 2008. He is, beyond doubt, a true role model for others, he is one of those coaches who know what button to push in order to become admired and praised.

But when it comes to leadership, nothing is certain. Last year, in 2009, the Executive Committee of FRF decided to cease the collaboration with coach Victor Piturca, the latter being removed because of the weak results the Romanian National Team scored at the World Cup, being replaced by Razvan Lucescu.

In a way, I was expecting for him to be removed and I can say I feel sorry for him. Beyond doubt, Piturca was and still is a great coach. But, unfortunately, the failure of the Romanian football team turned up to be a killer for him. He would have escaped all the accusations brought against him with great difficulty. Because when you start doing something, you must fulfill it earnestly and get exceptional results. You can't numb people with the hypnotic of promise, any explanation being utterly futile.

Leadership: Are you studying your successful path in a mirror through which the Creator looks at himself?

What are the credible benefits of your leadership? Are the benefits of materializing the idea that the key to success is always to expand what you have done?

In leadership, the creator is a permanent standard of how man has to manage his decision-making processes beyond the flux and reflux moments of his journey. He represents his triumph even after the moment of his ascension, by the merit of regaining his self-esteem and the motivation to feel useful in comparison to the results obtained along the way.

The fact is that people respect and admire you as long as you meet their expectations, you offer them your best, you make sure of their success or you bring forth enough advantages they could obtain having you as their leader. They support and love you because they think you have the courage and you are capable of coping with all challenges of your high position.

Leadership is the effect of an intense color (updated as an inner experience) from an imperfect image.

They all struggle abreast, hoping you'll gain solid results. But if they lose, in that moment of crisis, blind anger, they'll totally forget what you did for them, all the success they owe you, all your prior struggle for the commonwealth. And they don't give you another chance.

Did Piturca deserve his "punishment" for the failure of the national team? I don't think so, players share a great part of the guilt, as well. Actually, from the moment the match begins, the chance depends largely on the players' will and talent. And if, during a decisive match, one or another hits the post or has the bad luck to score an own goal, is the coach to blame? You always need a great amount of chance in football.

Leadership: Do you have the power to go against the current to show the public what you are hiding in yours, not what you see in the image that others create about you?

Arm your heart to face the truth. In leadership, you are seldomly entitled to a rematch. You rarely enjoy the opportunity to prove your innocence and that you were overcharged. In leadership, you can be praised in a flash by those surrounding you, and the next thing you know, they are also those bringing you down till the deepest darkness.

It's no use to be ambitious, talented, motivated and having the energy to lead a team, if the team loses - its members being disappointed of their failure will blame you because you were the one leading them. And because you couldn't make the team win, although you possessed the authority to take decisions, to institute strategies, to make the needful changes, to criticize, organize, judge and decide body and soul, of your own, what's best for the team, you are the one who must pay.

Therefore, they will accumulate all the possible arguments in order to start the judgment - their judgment - whose aim is to quickly dethrone you from the leading of the team. And you can't object. Unfortunately, you can't fight the weakness of human nature, you can't convince people they are doing a huge mistake while you had absolute freedom in taking your own decisions, in choosing the players and in the way you trained them, and they followed and listened to you dutifully.

Leadership: Are you prepared for the quest that awaits you in case you lose in the context in which the psychology of your responsibility to the image that you acquire depends on how you express your commitment to the values of a certain parameter of interest?

Before becoming a leader, you must prepare yourself for the heat in case you lose. When the stakes are high, there are but winners and losers. If you don't want to be at feud with others, if you don't want to awaken a dire fury inside people, if you don't want to be removed, then you must display the energy indispensable to a leader, the stiffness and will to carry out his duties. Only if you insist on the results and you always score victories you can save your congeniality with people.

Your abilities don't turn you into a champion. You are a champion only when you gain the admiration and the respect of people for good. You can score a fulminate success, but at a certain point you can come to a standstill and fail. If you want to the utmost extent to maintain yourself in a high position, you must do your best not to fail. Because a high position involves a lot of responsibility and the moment you gain it you'll always be on the razor edge. It will all be wonderful till the first failure when, ten to one, your position will tumble down.

The values of the risk parameter of your interest in a particular field correspond to the way you anchor yourself to the feeling of respect for the accusations brought to you in case of failure. In football you have no right to blame the audience for your team's performance. The audience only requires victory. Therefore, the "tense" opinion of your audience about your team's performance is a risk parameter that should not be overlooked when evaluating decision factors on revising your coaching status.

The attitude of self-esteem is given by the ability to accept and understand other people in the natural rhythm of your interest in maintaining the unity of the team you form and value.

Conclusion: Mostly, people judge others according to the solid results of their work, largely involving a partial ingredient. On second thoughts, things may seem different. That's way a qualified and careful reassessment and even a check analysis are periodically suggested. It would be ideal for the leader himself to initiate this assessment and he should without fail make a self assessment, because as an anonymous poet said:

„You haven't been a God and you'll never be.

And don't you ever think that you are perfect,

Because God has not created duplicity."

The Law Of Dominance

On December 19, 2010

The more you keep the ball moving in the opposite playing field, the more pronounced your influence will be.

Blessed be the day you swore that you will reach your goals. Blessed be the moment when you armed yourself with will, perseverance and hope, in order for you to carry out your plans. But even so, you will never have any guarantee of success in your plans. And here's why:

In the movie « Forever Mine (1999) », the main character, Alan Ripley, falls in love with Ella Brice, the wife of the renowned politician Mark Brice, an extraordinary attractive woman, with a remarkable soul. Mark, a corrupt and nefarious man, finds out about their affair and, out of jealousy and envy, plans Alan's assassination. So said, so done. Only that Alan wasn't killed, but was badly injured – which Mark and his associates didn't' know.

Years passed by. Meanwhile, Alan, with the help of his good friend, Javier, created a new identity and became a successful banker (Manuel Esquema), having business relationships with top-notch people. Finding out about the problems Mark Brice was facing with, for whom he bear a huge hatred on his soul, he decided that this is the most fortunate moment to get revenge. But his desire for revenge, ambition and hope weren't at all the decisive factor for his success. He must surprise his adversary and create for himself as many real opportunities to "score".

Leadership: Is your need to compose the consciousness of hidden intentions contained in an exact framing of dependence on demonstrating your priority in a game of reconciliation with your own nature?

The nature of man from the point of view of the decision-making process turns out to be often a falsification of the reasons for why the conditions for significant changes are fulfilled. It is not directly responsible for the peace of mind or the storm of life lived at the highest tension, by accepting the consciousness of realizing an act of duty, but it does have an instinct of survival and creative power.

Nothing gets you closer to success in leadership, rather than the immense power you exert over the others, but especially over you enemies. The slightest indiscretion can lead you to failure. So it becomes imperative that, through the strategies you adopt, you gain time on your side and prove that you're always in control of the situation. this is the power of the dominant game.

A valuable soccer team manages to dominate a game ever since the first half – and it is the only way it can quickly defeat the enemy. Alan had thus proceeded. That's why the power of his influence quickly expanded in Mark Brice's business circle, managing to ruin all his plans and relationships.

The game that Alan played was an unexpected one, based both on intuition and strategy, the same game that great football teams usually play: the defensive game, fought with intelligence, not only with speed, in half of the opposing team. He showed both prudence and ability, managing very well since the first moment he got in touch with Mark Brice and allegedly offered to help him. He didn't let himself become fascinated by his own powers and didn't lost sight of his priority, not even for a single moment.

Leadership: In what position do you find yourself when your nature unleashes without trammels, from the point of view of the necessity to appeal to the reality of the facts that happen because no one asks you to account for them?

When the nature of your being is unleashed in a long line of challenges, trials, adverse effects of influence and manipulation, constituting a violation of the golden rules of consciousness, it means that you have become what you have never wanted to be: an incomprehensible reality from which you can only save yourself by hiding. Or by running away and resisting.

You can't advance and win a match if you hold the ball in your own playing field. I used the story from the movie « Forever Mine » to offer you a vivid picture of a pretty serious leadership law – "The more you keep the ball moving in the opposite playing field, the more pronounced your influence will be."

The best leaders know that the only way to maintain and expand their power of influence is to dominate any "match" as long as possible. And when I say leadership, I don't refer only to sports and to the business environment, but to all fields of activity, because there is and it will always be a real competition.

Reality is always preferable: you can't be in an advantageous position if you play in retreat, just as a football team can't win any match if it only keeps the ball in its own playing field. You must advance into the middle of the game and create opportunities for you to score.

The question is the following: when you advance into the adversary field, do you find yourself in a position of deviation from the essence of your own consciousness or in a position of constructing intelligence?

The true value of leadership is achieved when you no longer have to demonstrate that you are strong enough to give a real picture of the explosion of intelligence.

For your leadership to have value, you must have a dominant influence over other people. Or, in other words, it means "to keep the ball in the opposite playing field as long as possible". And the supremacy in leadership means winning as many possible matches against as many possible opponents. It's hard to do that and it is quite dangerous sometimes.

In leadership, you must learn to know your opponents and you potential enemies, because you will always have them, too, not only friends and supporters. This is possible only through a careful observation of those around you, who you always interrelate with. Vigilance will keep you out of trouble.

Before being in line with the science of leadership, ask yourself the following question:

Do you understand the purpose you seek to achieve from the point of view of the need to favour an intellectual position that can not give you protection emotionally?

The Law Of Dominance refers to your ability to keep your enemies in "check" before giving them a decisive "check mate". But without altering your true nature, your nature and human qualities that make other people appreciate, enjoy and admire you.

The Law Of Far Seeing

On December 18, 2021

Stay with yourself, even when you feel distant from yourself.

Nighttime. It's not so cold outside, the wind blows gently, a cold draft can be felt. You return home, lazy, your eyes wide open to a sky covered with a thick curtain of clouds, in a setting dominated by the presence of the moon, so hidden. Walking is good food for the mind, an enigmatic exposure to what makes you feel vulnerable, but included in an absolutely unpredictable, exciting journey. In the window of an antique shop, a trivial book pops into your eye. One color, red, but with dark writing. You approach slowly, as if you want to understand something, just a bit. An inscription in black ink on the back of a mystical book states the following:

"Faith is a bright star that helps the researcher unravel the mysteries of nature. You must seek your center of gravity in God and build your trust in a divine, sincere, pure, and strong faith, and remain faithful to it wholeheartedly and with all your soul, with all your mind, and with all your mind. If you have such faith, wisdom will not hide its truth from you, but will reveal to you its works in an unusual but credible and comforting way."(Paracelsus)

Night strolls are wonderful. Quiet. Lots of lights and lights ...

Leadership: Does your determinative character become significant in the way you relate to another essence of your own being projected into another time and another space, to which the intelligence of a metaphor creator is directed?

The light stroll is like a profound revelation of what happens to you when you don't know what's wrong with you, maybe when you feel paralyzed by a fear of a circumstance you have to face. The night accentuates the air of illusions of any kind, in any way you would feed them with flashes of imagination. Somehow, he would like you to be a small star on the huge celestial vault, a small glow in a huge constellation, so that all the changes on this earth do not reach you.

Imagine a symbol to draw with one eye and then the other. You know that you are that symbol, which the night walk transforms into an astral, spiritual, or energetic body, beyond the physical body. Or, maybe the tricks of the eye make you drunk with the pride of knowing you are too broad in your orientation...

Therefore, the stroll can be interpreted as an adventure of an astral traveler, if and only if you feed your mind with those hidden in the focus of an astrological observer who captures and highlights for the ordinary mortal, the configuration of a self that makes the connection with God. And if the evening stroll is a symbol, highlighting the image of a self that realizes a unique and coherent connection between body and mind, then God's place is in the middle: in the way the heart feels things that the eyes cannot see and knows that which the mind cannot comprehend.

"Only a man penetrated by the serenity of the universe can become a visionary."

The night stroll is the moment when a man is sent into the astral and automatically becomes a spirit-carrying specter, wrapped in soul, leaving the mind free and floating in the magical world of symbolism. Or in the material world, the science of seeing the hermeneutic characteristics of the relationship between the astral and the ephemeral is of no use to man in terms of well-being, normalcy. And even if the only thing necessary is to know oneself, man will always seek to see only what is dictated by the rhythm of earthly events, so fleeting.

Here the walk has reached the point where it can be said that the world revolves around a naive person who still believes in what he sees. And without knowing it, without wondering why, he sees only what the stars wrote to him in the sky, but dictated to him on earth: be with yourself, even when you feel far away from yourself.

Leadership is achieved through the moment when you appear as someone else from the unique perspective of the trajectory of a creation: as a visionary who, knowing how to create the unexpected, makes of himself a transcendence of time and space.

Or, as the poet John Alexander rightly put it: "Only a man penetrated by the serenity of the universe can become a visionary."

The Law Of Far Seeing highlights the thinking of the visionary who knows how to ennoble a relevant moment in his life in the conquering forms of Creation and Transformation. What matters here is how you relate to another essence of your own being projected into another time and another space, to which the intelligence of a Creator called to animate a mortal body is directed...

The Law Of Healing

On April 08, 2010

Be a person of great character by placing your own practices in the area of an event meant to enter the consciousness of people as a critical point that can be avoided.

I don't regret being that day in the wrong place because, right there, I fortunately learned a valuable lesson. But am I doing the right thing by telling you what strange thing happened to me? I think so, because that particular episode is not one of those better to be leave unnoticed.

I was in a hospital with one of my best classmates from college. We were waiting for someone. I had the feeling I was going to spend my entire day there, in the waiting room. And, all of a sudden, while I was taking thought, I heard the scream of a man coming from the next room, the scream of an agonizing man, a despairing scream as though it was coming from the bottom of his soul: "You would better let me die ! "

I thought the patient was about to die, pushed by his own will. Suddenly, dozens of questions assaulted me, and I think my colleague and all the others there, as well. Dozens of questions crossed my mind, but I was unable to find any answer.

Then, a complete silence spread in the room, as if the patient had died, and his last words yelled on a tone which, I must admit, scared the hell out of me and sounded more like a warning: "Run for you lives".

Leadership: Can you reconsider your attitude to the meaning of life by formulating a condition of belonging to an experience such as "exposure to a situation in which you fear for your level of anxiety", so that you reserve the right not to be subjected to an automatic decision of a significant character?

A half hour elapsed in waiting, a terrifying wait during which I could only imagine the worst scenarios, then the door opened. The doctor, seized by a state of inner peace, stepped out the room and looked with his eyes for a certain person.

In that very moment, a middle aged lady, too deeply inspired with the ardor of faith, but her heart beating ripping her chest, immediately got up. The state she was in was casting a gloom over me and everybody around.

- I prayed to God from the bottom of my heart for the last two hours. Please, tell me, how is my husband?

The doctor, noticing the tumult of the woman, feeling her blood frothing in her veins, hurried to answer her, in order not to overshadow even more the terror he felt deep inside her:

- You have nothing to worry about. Your husband is now out of danger. Tomorrow, he will be able to return home.

I honestly confess you I have never before seen a happier person. The waiting was the most dire for the lady's heart, and every second hit her like a plumb hammer. But when she got the news that her husband was fine, that he was completely cured, everything inside her came back to life. The meaning of her life seemed obvious: she wanted to live her happiness with her husband.

I managed to reserve the right not to throw myself in the face of an automatic decision of a significant character, so I did not give a harsh and unfavorable (moral) verdict to this situation, I did not label the term "hospital care" with ill will, by the fact that I highlighted for consciousness the virtue of not putting my finger on the wound, the virtue of achieving an agreement between sensitivity and the reason of not drawing conclusions before having all the answers.

Leadership: Do you adopt a position of fragility with regard to the impact of possible external "shocks", under the domination of differences in interpreting a result that can be expressed in two ways: as a cry of despair, or as a gesture of influence?

The most difficult thing for a doctor is to set the correct diagnosis of the patient and to define the illness he suffers of. And once this thing is done, it's essential to give the appropriate treatment. The doctor must consult the patient, to detect the particularities of the disease related to the patients, because there is no pain without cause. He can give the impression of fragility regarding the quality and professionalism of the care services he provides if he issues an alert response in the face of uncertain situations. This fact can be perceived as a kind of cry of despair of the man who is about to permanently escape the torture of painful thoughts. In medicine, this is not allowed.

On whom do all of the patient's hopes rely on? On whom does a sick person puts his hopes in? Obviously, on the doctor's efficiency. The role of the doctor, his most important and most difficult at once mission is to do his best in order to cure the patient and not comfort him with words. No man suffering from a very serious illness and seized by an atrocious pain gets to recover neither completely, nor partially only by being comforted by the thought he will grow better.

At the same time, the result offered by the doctor regarding the health status of his patients can be perceived as a gesture of influence if it is expressed as an uncertainty regarding the diagnosis or the treatment, because thus he puts himself in the hypothesis of a "major event", dominating the situation through an increase in the state of confusion, of waiting, of tension. It is a psychological test. At this point people are becoming more and more anxious, expecting a positive response, but in this waiting state full of emotions they would be capable of doing anything to make the good news reach their ears. It is a struggle between the "God" power of the doctor and the sensitivity of ordinary people.

A patient is truly happy only when he gets to enjoy health again, not when the doctor inspirits him with positive thoughts. You're trying in vain to encourage a patient who suffers atrocious pain; he won't feel better thanks to your words full of optimism and hope. When a patient tells the doctor: "You would better let me die", it's out of doubt that he suffers such tremendous pain that you either get him well or you don't. Encouraging the patient in his most critical moments doesn't impact a spectacular effect of complete recovery. However, we mustn't minimize the power of words which often have a complementary effect to therapy.

Leadership: Do you have the power to create the feeling of obligation to the course of an event that is becoming more pressing, considering all the possible complications of a "moment of truth"?

The role of a leader, his most important and at the same time his most difficult mission is to also do his best in order to completely "cure" the living of people, and not to comfort them with confident and optimistic words, not only to grant them happiness instead of the despair, with which they are seized with.

People follow the individual who has the ability to handle intangible things, the one capable of looking deep inside them, of feeling what they are feeling and the one who succeeds to give them back their happiness. Only the one able to cure people, both in body and mind, offering them moral and material support, can truly win their admiration, respect and trust. And as I already said scores of times, doctors are by far the only ones who have the biggest influence on people of all ages, all nations from everywhere.

If I had to imagine the ideal leader, he would doubtlessly be like a doctor. A doctor who can figure out what is the people's performance ability, their state of health and the factors which exert influence upon them. A doctor capable to keep people out of any kind of disease or affection (stress, fatigue, idleness, dissatisfaction, anxiety, nervousness, and so on), and to render their vitality. I also believe that the ideal leader must possess a remarkable analytical ability and dispose of the appropriate methods of "therapy", including "verbal therapy" as a complementary means.

If you take a look on recent history, you will see people like Bill Gates, John D. Rockefeller, Thomas Edison and Michael Dell filling the top of the best "doctors". They became financial giants, building fabulous empires, "healing" as far as possible the lives of people.

Madonna, the uncontested queen of pop music, is intensively involved in acts of charity oriented towards the poor areas of Africa. Thanks to her, many people are healthier and enjoy a better life. I don't think Madonna finished Med school, but she certainly has healing abilities, because, through her constant involvement in helping people, she saved many sick people from death and improved the life of many Africans.

The moment of truth is synonymous with that force of character obtained only by the experience of seeing the suffering of others as an opportunity to display your moral side of personality, advanced knowledge in a field, the task of carrying yourself with much affection, and the capacity to discern situations by exercising authentic discernment.

The Law Of Healing is revealed only to those who know how to heal the human soul before healing the wounds of the body, considering as the first means of comparison that imperative of becoming: "Never take as an affront to your own beliefs what is presented to you as the only option in a fragile context of great significance."

The Law Of Influence

On March 17, 2010

You will be ready to lead only when you have the power to see beautifully colored horizons in the eyes with which you read your diary alone.

Curiosity has always been in my nature. Out of curiosity I started to write, to research, to learn as many things as possible about the science of leadership and to devote myself to the development of the people around me. I started on this road on the wrong foot, making many mistakes, but it was worth the effort, and now I believe that this road is beginning to be more and more easier.

I write and I will always write. I don't write in order to praise someone, I don't write in order to flatter someone or out of the desire to generate more traffic on the website. I write in order to know myself better, but maybe some day my words, the messages I convey and scatter through the simple words and phrases will get to mean something for someone. Maybe my words will be covered in the thick dust of time. But maybe they will make someone curious. And if they will stay on many people's minds and will have the power to inspire them, make them discover and use their potential at a maximum, I will truly be happy.

This was the first test I alone decided to give myself. The test of influence. Depending on the results obtained, putting in balance the number of positive and negative feedbacks I receive from my readers, I will know the level I'm at, which, in fact, is the measure of my influence. Influence must be measured before determining its quality.

Leadership: Are you trying to access the desired destination through the attractiveness you inspire to others, or through the attractiveness that you create in the struggle with what it means to capitalize on your passion?

I don't intend to attend a master's program nor a PhD program in order for my professional training to be taken seriously. Ultimately, if they would be of any help, they would only help me. And just like a great writer noticed, man can learn a lot, but learning doesn't mean having knowledge. Beside that, no diploma in the world will make a person with influence and not that many a door will open for me. But if I improve enough and share with others what I know, what I think, what I believe, through the internet, both me and others will have something to gain.

Leadership is a team game, a game which everyone must win. If I would think only of myself, confidently miming interest and concern, I could have a short term influence and I would ultimately be marked as "spam", just like more and more politicians, who use a lot of techniques in order to trick people.

But as far as literature is concerned, there is an exception to the rule: you can win by yourself the notoriety available only to an artist who knows how to combine words to give life to a masterpiece. The eventual satisfaction of a writer does not arise from the feeling that what he expresses bears the name of a miracle, but from the miracle with which he tunes all his feelings when his words bloom and change reality.

He is driven by the power with which he believes in something beyond understanding, as a positive experience of uniting with One as evidenced by the power with which he can open his heart and mind. In fact, he lives on the idea that all accumulated knowledge belongs not to himself, but to all, and that his destiny depends on the preferences of those who use them to come to union with One.

The peak of influence is reached when the idea of linking sentiment and action is materialized in a written act incorporating the decision to revolutionize the existence of those who read faithfully.

This is why I write, always trying to add clear, quality and as useful as possible information, so that everything I know, all the knowledge I gained in time will reach everyone's ears. I cannot keep at the bottom of my being something that for others would be really useful. And I will always be as honest as possible, without trying to cut a dash only for wanting to be remarked.

The capitalization of passion is accomplished with that magnificent exaltation of the discovery of an expression that captures the charm of an intense friendship. A friendship that gives birth to an obligation to transmit new authenticity in interpreting the role of a facilitator of memorable experiences.

Leadership: Are you willing to accept all the angles of approaching the materialization of your thoughts in order to find the perfect technique to strengthen people's guidance in the difficult way of ascension?

The angles of approach to thought materialization are the spaces between the notions you use in order to increase your representativeness in relation to the general collectivity.

Martin Luther King Jr. was a Baptist priest who wished from all his heart the fulfillment of the biblical principles of life and freedom. He understood that the Americans were lucky to have been born in that great country and that there is no other nation like it in the world. This is what he said in his speech on 28 August 1963, on the occasion of the march on Washington:

"I have a dream that my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin, but by the content of their character."

These words are pure gold. They inspired all the color population in America. Only a man with strong convictions, who has a dream and completely devotes himself to fulfilling it can speak some words with such great influence. Only a man motivated to fulfill his ideal and who looks for ways to build bridges between people can guide them on the difficult road of upswing. Martin Luther King Jr. was certainly a leader with an incredible power of influence.

Leadership is a top supplier of production and storage space for the "enchanting" effects of a prophetic speech.

Whom and how do you make your influence? First of all, leadership requires influence and not everyone has a high enough ability to make an influence. In real life, the higher the position a man takes in society, the higher his level of influence.

What would you like more: to rule or to be ruled? If your greatest ambition is to be in a dominant position, then extend your level of influence. Your success will greatly depend on the success of the people you lead. Your influence will be the greatest if their success will be the greatest.

Just like a teacher is always judged by the results of his pupils, you will also be judged by the results obtained by the people you lead.

If you hold a leadership position, don't forget that the problems people have to deal with are always your problems, as well. You won't be able to have a positive influence over people if you don't get involved in solving the problems they have to deal with, leaving everything to chance, thinking that it is only their job to solve them.

The only written act that can confirm the variant of a new self-consciousness is characterized by the process of composing an image that colors the canvas of the possibility of the reality of self-denial, showing something beyond being, different from being.

Influence is what you manage to change in your person after you re-read your own book: you begin to center your power to believe in a virtual reality which is made possible by the chance to belong to a world that follows to the end.

It is a real art to know how to make yourself listened to and be followed by the people around you. But you can obtain this only by hard work and sometimes taking difficult roads. Feedback from people will help you to assess yourself and to continuously improve your relationships with them.

How do you measure your influence? How are you labeled by other people? Is your influence of short or long term? How do you build bridges between people? Do you have strong convictions? Are you devoting yourself completely to the fulfillment of an ideal?

The Law Of Limited Ascension

On June 08, 2010

Any ascension has its limit. The one not knowing the limit of his ascension shall collapse.

The strongest man is always driven by a single thought, because all the power he possess, the energy, intelligence and will, are used in one direction alone which he follows with holiness.

Qin Shi Huang was such a man. Since the age of 13, when he took over the throne, he had a single ambition: to bring glory to his kingdom and to unify China. At the age of 29, he decided to put his plan into practice, his lifetime obsession, that of becoming the absolute ruler. He could achieve his plan only by the force of weapons. Kingdom after kingdom, his armies destroyed everything in their way. Nobody could fight against his powerful will. And the one who tried resisting befell a terrible fate.

Leadership: Do you show the valuable side of your personality after you realize that the one who has incommensurable power feels a continuous need to enhance it?

In the year 221 B.C., Qin Shi Huang becomes the absolute ruler of China. His power seems unlimited. He rules over millions of people. He is the king of everything, till Heaven. But the one who has an overly high power always feels the need to increase it. Qin Shi Huang cannot be content with his possessions, with earthly power, but like any man greedy of power, he wants more, always more. And what can mean more, can be more valuable, above all power which nobody can resist, but one: the power of being immortal? As an emperor, he feels he is entitled to the powers and the immortality of the gods.

Therefore, he needs to confront one more enemy, but an enemy he fears more than anything: death itself. He has so much to do in a single life, why losing it like any other mortal? So he starts a vast campaign, in search of the secret of eternal life. Because he is decided to spend whatever it may cost in order to fool death, he invests a fortune in all sorts of alchemists from all over the empire, one more sophisticated than the other, with various personal recipes who promise him the elixir of life together with other spells beyond imagination, meant to offer him immortality.

Leadership: Are you in a position to be part of an agreement placed in a guilt context guided by the premise that the possessor of something is always haunted by the fear of losing what he possesses?

One single thought consumes the emperor: the life-giving cure, the magical fluid which can make him immortal. He cannot think of anything else. He perseveres in his search for years. But his health starts deteriorating because of stress, anger, anxiety which continuously torture him, and with all liquors from the so-called alchemists, nothing can stop his aging.

Just like a sick man on his deathbed, whose heath condition becomes crankier, the emperor, physically tired, still hopes for a miracle. Any illness, pain or suffering can be cured if he finds the elixir in time !

Leadership: Do you support yourself in the struggle with the destiny of your own work on the argument that when you start falling into a well, you cannot climb back up?

The patient being in the terminal stage of his illness has a last chance of being saved. One of the alchemists who come to see the emperor, or maybe one of his doctors, gives him a mysterious liquid which can surely cure him: the mercury (a highly toxic substance). Several grams carefully administrated can guarantee immortality to the patient. So the emperor, anxiously, full of hope, swallows some pills containing the fluid meant to make him immortal. And, ironically, he dies.

A leader's work is not built on estimating the vulnerability of his own forces in the face of the road he builds for himself, but on the background of the change in self-consciousness that affects the assumption of his role in society. The wise words proves to be true again: "You cannot escape what you fear most." You cannot fight destiny. It will catch up to you, no matter what you do. In front of unavoidable death, people often fool themselves with the most impossible thoughts and hopes, but just as nobody can stop night to fall, no man can escape the implacable destiny.

Leadership: What is the limit to which you can accede by the accepted means of power and glory, taking into account the variant of self-image that does not follow criteria other than "superlative value"?

A brilliant strategist, ambitious all the way through, Qin Shi Huang conquered all of China, which bears his name up to our days. An extraordinary desire of life laid in his heart, which was intensified by a great desire to have power and glory that he wanted to keep on satisfying. But after so many conquests, he fell into a deep state of depression. Because when a man possesses something very precious, he is always haunted by the fear of losing his possessions. And nothing is sadder for such a man than the feeling that death will separate him from his dreams.

Throughout his life, the emperor got all that he wanted, power, wealth and glory. But all these didn't make him freer, but on the contrary, they handcuffed him. He became the prisoner of his inability to obtain more than could have - just like a climber who, after much struggle, reaches the top of the highest mountain, and absorbed by the amazing view which appears in front of his eyes, doesn't want to dismount anymore, but to rise even higher. But there is no such thing as higher ! But the emperor, trying to achieve immortality, wanted to overcome human limits, which is impossible, and "the elixirs of eternal life" had only helped him to collapse sooner. Indeed, when a strong desire blinds a man, nobody can open his eyes anymore.

Every climb has its hill, that's what emperor Qin Shi Huang didn't want to accept on any terms. From the moment he started to fed himself with the illusion that he can fool destiny, embittering to live forever, everything changed. And the road to failure was growing even shorter.

The limit to which you can accede by the accepted means of power and glory is given by the point where the consciousness of a falling from a height and the acceptance of a reality that exists beyond what you think is reality meet.

Conclusion: Everyone have their limits. And every intelligent man knows his limits, and when he realizes he reached the maximum limit, he is content with his achievements. Lingering and acting in order to surpass some possible limits won't attract benefits, but will cause his quick decline, and even collapse.

The Law Of Limited Trust

On June 08, 2010

When there is even one dishonest man in the team, you lose all of your confidence in the team.

I've always liked sports. And my favorite sport was, undoubtedly, football. But I also practiced contact sports, six years of wrestling and almost two years of Taekwondo. And like everyone who lives in the mirage of his own desires, I wanted to become a great champion.

At the beginning of the 10th grade, I attended the National Taekwondo Championship in Bucharest. I was very ambitious and confident in myself, but I must confess that I had no experience in terms of martial arts competitions. I would have certainly done well at any wrestling contest, but that was it, I was practicing martial arts at the time and I had to prove what I was capable of.

Leadership: Do you build a steady foundation of ascension to the fulfillment of the ideal of unity, without taking into account the effects of placing your own being in a "Extend Your Guarantee" context?

I remember very well that I won the first fight, but lost the second. Therefore, I can say I didn't perform very well, but I indulged myself with the fact that, for an average martial practitioner, I did pretty well.

My guarantee of quality was the loyalty statement in the service of the team and the obligation to fully represent my character, temperament, mood in relation to the advantage of victory or the bitter taste of defeat.

But the thing that I would never forget is what happened at the end of the championship. I must say that I forgot my kimono at home, and the coach was nice and gave me his in order to get into the competition. Well, after my last fight, that in which I was defeated, I asked the coach to let me take his kimono at home, to wash it and bring it clean to him at the first training. He agreed.

But when I got home, to my amazement, the kimono was no longer in the sports bag. It was only then that I realized it was stolen. Buy by whom? Well, I don't know, but definitely one of my colleagues from the club was responsible, because only they had access to my bag from the stand assigned to our team at the competition. Full of regret, my mind was consuming with black thoughts and my conscience was seized by a deep sense of dissatisfaction because I had too much confidence in my colleagues, and one or maybe more of them have cheated it.

Leadership: At what point in your evolution from the affinity of assertive tendencies are you willing to be forgiving without obeying an order that violates your rights and the option of honor?

When you are part of a team, you believe in it. But up to a limit. Until your chance of assertion begins to line up with some misguided trends of integration and growth within the team.

I didn't try to discover the truth at that time, to ring the changes, to ask questions and try to find answers, the fact was consumed. So at the first training of the week that followed, I paid the equivalent of the kimono to the coach, because it was my responsibility to take care of it. But then, after a brief conversation with the coach, when I explained him how it all happened (but he did not want to believe in any way that one of his older students was guilty), we agreed that I should move to another club. My place was not there.

This incident was the turning point of my life and taught me one thing: nothing can please me when, joining a team from which I expect to be effective, united, organized, competitive, I discover that, in fact, I can't count on anyone. Because it always happens for a man who steals once and is not caught, to steal the second time around. So rather than begin and suspect everybody, I would better look for another team, a team based on principles of collegiality, unity and dignity.

Leadership, maintaining the color of a creative anticipation of other realities, retains the option of withdrawing from an agreement that contains only "final chapters".

Who doesn't have great confidence in his own team cannot "work" at full capacity. It I'd stayed at that club, I should have always been wide-awake, always looking out for an unseen enemy.

Just like a spectator who witnesses the presentation of a trick, knowing from the beginning that he will be fooled, he creates some psychic protection devices, trying to observe the moment when the illusionist cheats him - I should have created a psychological shield to protect me from the unforeseen moment when I should be cheated. And that would have been stressful and tiring. Or I should have taken an attitude of polite neutrality, which is to quietly come and leave the training, without having too many relationships with anyone, thing that would have created other problems, because nobody tolerates eccentric people. And if I had left time to pass, hoping things would improve, I would have been terribly wrong.

Later, after about a year, at another competition, I learned how everything happened. One of my colleagues took my kimono and sold it for a golden ring to another martial artist from another club in the country. Therefore, it was proved that my suspicions were founded. So I took the right decisions when moving to another club.

Leadership: Can your level of honor be restored by the great contribution of promoting the values that have defined the mission of putting you at the top of others' preferences?

The values I have been trying to promote starting with my integration into the team have been the willingness to agree to believe in a sport that suits me as a state of mind, the willingness to accept thinking in the spirit of an ideal of cooperation and the fairness of accepting any compromise in sight.

A lasting, united and ambitious team is born out of comradeship and friendship and is carefully preserved. If even one of your colleagues is unfair, and especially if you don't know which is that one, you eventually arrive to consider everyone else guilty, which lowers your confidence in yourself, because you get to feel alone, surrounded only by false people. A team comprising only one dishonest man is a team the standard of which is not common sense, so which is not based on integrity and respect.

And the leader of such a team, where there is at least one black sheep, and who doesn't take action, means that he doesn't know well enough the people in his team or that he accepts them with all their flaws - and, in this case, he is likely to be manipulated and even compromised on their account.

Trust is the unit of measure of the level of expectation you relate to a person when the feelings you nurture for them are reciprocal.

Conclusion: A team is strong when it relies on collaborative relationships, honesty, fairness and fair-play. The leader is the one responsible for cultivating these relationships, both by his personal example and by the measures he takes to keep them.

A leader who accepts ethical violations and doesn't promptly punish them is actually the accomplice to the one who violates the ethical principles, which should govern a team. This negative element in the team, unauthorized at the right time, will continue to "sabotage" the team.

The Law Of Mutual Service

On August 26, 2010

To develop a Brand of great impact, you need to help people capitalize on their potential by identifying a common denominator.

As I mentioned in the previous article, The principle of accelerated development, the Google Translate tool is currently the best and most popular translation tool. This tool, which improved visibly in the past few years, is mainly based on openness and closeness between people.

Google redesigned its customer orientation, providing better services than other competitors (yahoo, Bing, msn, etc) and continues to innovate. The strategy of Google development turned in a direction that satisfies general interests of people. Offering them this free translation tool, which has strongly developed in the past few years, the people at Google ensured that their business will not record any decline. Therefore, Google stands out unlike other competitors in terms of performance, because it meets people's needs, increasing their efficiency and productivity with tools and services which are constantly improving.

Leadership: Is what exactly conveys the values behind your brand and its visual identity the story of an unforgettable or suppressed experience?

The durability of Google corporation's success depends on its ability to offer unique services. And, without doubt, one of the main pillars of its business became lately the free translation tool, Google Translate. With this tool, Google expects that the basic needs of those who browse the Internet be assured - Respectivelly the online translation of sites and web articles in any language, as soon as possible.

Regarding the Google Translate tool, Google's strategy was to involve users in improving it. In other words, Google offers you quality services, but it also expects for you to help improving these services. People need to understand the benefits of such a service and then involve as much as possible, increasing their efficiency and productivity, in order to ensure it a continuous improvement.

The story of the success that Google has today is the story of an unforgettable or supressed experience because the main roles of those who are part of it have been and can be interpreted by other actors than those who have become famous as a result of development of this web concept.

The actors are not just the people who say memorable lines, rather they are those entities that populate the system, those players who play a role in advancing, influencing or managing the processes of integrating new knowledge and notions, new beliefs, new values, new experiences.

You can't develop a process all alone. You must work with a lot of people. You need Google Translate, but Google Translate needs you as well, in order to develop. Without this mutual and supported service, nothing lasting and efficient can be built. And a low effort brings minimal results.

Leadership: Is the image of the concept that you are developing by investing in a source code to choose and display in real-time valuable information, an illustration of the reality that you experience in the vision of an artist who outwardly expresses his interiority?

Google Translate, like the cell phone and the mobile phone network, created a new category of benefits, enabling users to communicate freely. And, indirectly, by adding texts and their own translation, they help each other. When someone translates a text from a foreign language, and the translation is not done perfectly, he has the possibility to help correct that translation.

The time you dedicate to help improve Google Translate tool is an investment, both for you and for the Google Corporation. When you offer, both you and the one receiving it gain. It's not at all a waste of time and energy to bring your contribution to the development of a tool or process which, after all, helps you as well. Adopting a constructive approach, interacting with other users by correcting or adding new translations, you earn an extra credit and, besides, you have the satisfaction that you have contributed for everybody's good.

The artist who outwardly expresses his interiority is the actor in a play played in public who does not let himself by driven by the belief "I have talent", but rather keeps working, just as much, as keen on detail, aware that any short sequence he films catalyzes the public's attention.

Google became a world leader through its innovative ideas with great practical implications. This was possible with the help of specalists not only in computer science, but also with a great creativity, who thought this system so as to involve as many people, bringing their contribution to its development and improvement. Google largely "speculated" the wish of those people who want to bring voluntarily their contribution and help others unconditionally. It's a good thing that such people exist !

The common denominator that people need to identify in order to realize that their potential lies in the effort they are prepared to submit when the goal is not to reach a destination, but to make it a benchmark on the map of the criteria of appreciation of quality services.

Conclusion: Mutual service is a prerequisite to underpin progress. This mutual service is needed in leadership, as well. A leader, however good he may be, without the help and support from the team or "the senior hierarchies", can't achieve its goals to the benefit of all.

The Law Of Ordering Spontaneity

On October 20, 2023

Any event that occurs by chance has the chance to spontaneously form a new order.

Each person, each brain has a certain peculiarity. It is not necessarily something hereditary, but rather something that develops over time, through experiences or observations, influencing the way you perceive and appreciate sources of information and knowledge. Even if you don't keep the memory of another life stored in your spirit, even if you don't have any kind of map in your head that allows you to know the point of departure and the point of arrival, I am sure that the universe treats every person equally, in depending on the three spiritual constants: faith, patience, perseverance.

You may think that you have no skills, that you are good at nothing, absolutely nothing, you are just a nobody. But at some point, by chance, a cell in your brain will encounter a stray cell in the surrounding space. And then a connection will be made at the neuronal level, a synapse, the place of communication between two neurons or between a neuron and another cell. The genetic code will be rewritten, the instinct not being written in this code.

Or maybe the saving cell itself will "invent" a coincidental phenomenon through which the lucky "happening" will occur. And if the "happening" occurs, then all the surrounding minds, the most brilliant, will not be able to understand the mechanism of your thinking which, starting from a single particularity, could move an entire world.

From that moment, all your intellectual capacities will reflect a superior intelligence, an Uthemish-Isfithes, an intellectual potential and special cognitive abilities, this being in harmony with the genesis in the bible where we read that God proceeded to create man in his own image. Even if you do not have the advantages of other people, the universe works according to the rules of equality giving favorable circumstances, following the following rule: "every event that occurs by chance has a chance to spontaneously form a new order".

Leadership: Can you build an image of your faith through visual metaphor, without representing it figuratively, by inciting the viewer to imagine?

I remember the movie "Rain Man" (1988). Raymond, who was a misfit, an autistic, no one paid attention to him, he didn't know how to handle himself, he was a nuisance to everyone. But at one point, his brother takes him to a casino. And here something completely miraculous happens. Only at this moment, completely unexpectedly, the click occurs. Out of nowhere, Raymond's wheels start turning, he suddenly sees the winning cards, he understands the game mechanism with superior intelligence. And he starts winning big at Blackjack, so much, until he gets kicked out of the casino. He doesn't cheat, but in his mind he sees the winning combinations of cards that no one else could see.

Well, that's what happens when that unique feature of your brain meets the environment that can stimulate it.

No one in the world will outdo you, and everyone will be effectively speechless. All the so-called "brilliant" minds will never understand how a single man, banal, without a future, could make such impossible calculations and connections.

Leadership: Can you experience the greatness of your own existence, as if the miraculous would intervene at every seemingly trivial moment?

The miraculous intervenes in the life of every man who believes in miracles. That's it. To believe, to be patient, and to never give up. And one day God will show himself to you through a trivial incident. And yet, so rare are these instances when God shows himself to someone. Maybe you must have been the last one after all. Because the story of Jesus is a prophetic parable that repeats itself in every generation: "The most humble becomes the strongest, the dead revives in the spirit, what is apparently impossible becomes reality."

A parable with unreal, fantastic elements, but which becomes a parable of patience, of dedication in these times dominated by selfishness and the model of "smart boys" who destroy SYSTEMIC HARMONY. A parable that is meant to keep us awake to the duty of living permanently in Christ.

Those who do not have Christ in their souls quickly achieve some success, but they will never know the divine, such as the genius of creation and the greatness of the universe. In fact, genius, the divine spark, consists in the extraordinary ability to think, create and produce in a way that exceeds the ordinary limitations of human knowledge and imagination.

Leadership explores the potential of transforming the ordinary man into an outstanding leader, based on the idea that anything can be achieved if the man is anchored to his inner resources and trust in his own ability to bring to light latent talents and abilities.

The Law of Ordering Spontaneity refers to the fact that sometimes seemingly random events can lead to miraculous moments and the manifestation of remarkable abilities in people who, at first glance, might be underestimated or ignored. This law suggests that there is an untapped potential within each individual that can be released spontaneously, bringing a new order to their lives.

Sometimes events, although they may seem chaotic or unforeseen, can have an ordering or organizing effect in the individual's life in the sense of a positive evolution.

Certainly, people with exceptional abilities have formed a unique perspective on the world, having the ability to see things that others cannot see and to understand things that others cannot understand. This increases their confidence in the possibility of miracles.

In particular, divine manifestation emphasizes the rarity of certain occurrences and the idea that, despite obstacles or difficulties, there is the potential for miracles or transformation, bearing in mind that seemingly random events can help create a new kind of order or structure in one's life. Only spirituality has as its central aspect the healing and transforming power of faith and humility in the face of adversity

The Law Of Refined Perception

On August 25, 2024

The trained eye can detect hidden meanings in seemingly insignificant details.

Passing through the Galala neighborhood, I was attracted by a simple but meaningful inscription drawn on one of the ends of the bridge that guards the small neighborhood: "Bridge of Love: Petronel and Evelina."

The writing, engraved with a black marker, carried a deeper story than it appeared at first glance, a mysterious call of the unseen, a kind of daily revelation hidden deep in the hearts of those who daily passed by this statement. The search for meaning in life often manifests itself through creative or unconventional gestures.

I don't know why I think this, I don't know how to rationally explain it, I can only intuit a sliver of the hidden mystery. For those simple, small words, written with a black marker, seemed to carry on their shoulders the burden of a story older and deeper than it would appear at first glance, suggesting that eternity of feeling from the extension of an intertwined destiny. The story stretches like a subtle network, woven into the hearts of those who pass by this anonymous testimony of love, becoming an invisible bridge between those who love and those who keep silent.

Leadership: Can you leave an imprint of your soul in a captivating visual representation, trying to preserve for eternity the echo of your feelings in a world that is fast passing you by?

I asked myself then, carefully looking at the writing: can such an inscription, the snapshot of a simple and ephemeral moment, acquire the greatness of a work of art capable of defying time? Can the lightning impact of a revelation turn into an "Epedysasis Harrexhium", an eternal call to self-transcendence? Can anyone, in front of such an inscription, feel that thrill of immortality that only genuine art can bring to the collective consciousness?

And when we think about the impact of such a revelation, don't we imagine that, like a meticulous painting by the hand of a master, every detail becomes a touch of eternity?

There, on the bridge, in that fleeting moment, I felt the pulse of a teenager who, caught in the nets of first love, tries to steal from the flow of time a piece of eternity. The "Bridge of Love" was no longer just a string of words engraved in passing, but became the discreet expression of a universal aspiration: the desire to keep alive, even in such a simple gesture, the echo of a feeling. With every glance at that inscription, the young man wanted the world to remember him and his love for Evelina, a thin thread of light between the present and eternity. "Bridge of Love" is not just a spontaneous title, but a discreet call to immortality, comme un pont entre le visible et l'invisible.

Leadership: How does your artistic expression influence the bridge between your inner reality and the outer world, bearing in mind that simple gestures hide deep truths?

The inner eye of creation can discern dimensions that transcend ordinary perception. The more I looked at that inscription, the clearer it became to me the truth it was trying to communicate: a fragment of life caught in a fleeting moment. It was as if those words had the power to crystallize the entire experience of a young man searching for a place in the world, like a Kandinsky painting where every dot and line takes on a cosmic meaning. Or, as in the fragment from the novel "Foucault's Pendulum" written by Umberto Eco:

"Creation is a process of divine inhalation and exhalation, like a restless breath or the action of calves. Try to create something out of nothing. It is a once-in-a-lifetime thing. Oh God, to blow the world as you blow into a glass globe, it needs to contract in itself, to receive the breath, and then it emits the long luminous hiss of the ten sefirot. For this it is necessary that the lights of the Sephiroth to be collected in some receptacles capable of withstanding their radiance."

Leadership: Can your intense feelings motivate unusual actions, while inner sight provides deep "insights" into human nature and the universe?

With each passing day, with each glance at that inscription I realize one thing. The boy sought to convey a piece of his soul, hoping that the universe would remember him and his love for Evelina. Or maybe the cries of hearts wounded by the passage of time are hidden in the silence of symbols. Whatever the truth, it is essential to understand that this seemingly simple act is actually a manifestation of the revelation of the intangible mystery.

The inscription left by the boy for Evelina thus becomes a creation similar to a divine breath, an attempt to capture eternity in an ephemeral moment. As God concentrates all his energy in the ten sefirot, that simple engraving, tiny words, carries in them the weight of a whole inner world, an intense and fragile light. Like the divine foals in "Foucault's Pendulum", the boy gathered within himself the strength to express his love and, in a burst of inspiration, left this imprint, hoping to withstand the passage of time.

A feeling, even caught between a few lines, can become a bridge between the transient and the eternal, between the artist and the viewer. Isn't that right?

God breathed, and light was made. Perhaps this "Bridge of Love" will be just a passing drawing for some, but for those able to see beyond appearances, it will represent a window to a world full of undisclosed hopes, dreams and desires. And you, reader, what invisible bridges are you building between your reality and the infinity of possibilities?

Leadership derives from the desire to transform the ephemeral into an enduring creation rooted in deep spirituality and motivation.

The Law of Refined Perception refers to the ability to decipher the subtle meanings around us, giving every detail a deep meaning that goes beyond the ordinary interpretation of reality. So for perception to become a tool of deep understanding, we must be willing to open our minds and hearts to the truths hidden in seemingly insignificant details.

The deeper I contemplate those words, the clearer the truth they are trying to convey becomes clear: a moment suspended between oblivion and the burning desire to remain alive in memory. That inscription, drawn carelessly but with passion, was like a piece of a young man's soul trying to shout to the world about the fire that burned his heart.

The Law Of Safe Shelter

On March 05, 2011

The one who does not develop the sense of congruence in people's consciousness, will never find a well protected shelter in their hearts.

I always associate the concept of leadership to life events or situations, to some stories or characters, moments, actions or experiences once lived by other people. Hence it is that, wanting to expand my knowledge and understanding of what it means to be a leader, I reread yesterday the biography of the famous Irish writer Oscar Wilde, whose works traveled around the world.

Wilde was a much respected person in the high society, a person whose influence was exerted on all those whom he came in contact with, winning their sympathy with his fine manners and his elegant personality. His works have been admired, he won many literary awards. At the age of 30, he became so popular, that all the London circles had heard the name "Wilde". People's attitude toward him was very positive, so he got to call himself "The king of life" or "The symbol of arts and culture of his time".

But the genius who boasted his own ingenuity finally loses his fortune and reputation. Accused of immorality, "The king of life" has fallen into disgrace as easily as he previously won everybody's sympathy. Success provoked him too much, the inner joy he felt while fulfilling his desires one by one, increasingly pushed him to the bottom of the abyss. Because of his exaggerated individualism and selfishness, which he displayed more and more often, people got away from him more and more.

During his imprisonment, Wilde gave birth to his last creation, "De profundis" (The voice deep within), in which he recognized, tormented by a vicious inner war: "Tired of being on the heights, I deliberately went to the depths in the search for new sensations. I grew careless regarding the lives of others. I took pleasure where it pleased me, and passed on. I was no longer the captain of my soul; I allowed pleasure to dominate me. I ended in horrible disgrace."

Deficient leadership is very similar to a large, one storey house, but where the sun doesn't penetrate more than a few times a year, and only two human beings live in it: you and yourself. It's like you were in an isolated land, at night, thrown away from the world.

Quality leadership isn't a house with a single tenant. Success or failure largely depends on your ability to build strong relationships with others and maintain them well-conditioned. Quality leadership means to host others in your soul, to project into their consciousness a feeling of perfect fit for you, at your turn, to find a well-protected shelter in their soul. Only the warm friendship that binds you to other people will give value to your leadership.

Leadership: Do you manifest yourself as an echo that spreads a state of reconciliation with the soul in trying to experience the essence of your own consciousness?

Just as a painter masterly observes the natural attitude of its models, alike, people easily see your characteristic features, your inclinations, the feeling you nourish for life, them and your own person. Anchor your thinking in a way to understand people's feelings, perspectives and values, providing a valid and serious example.

A thinking based on the denial of the principles of others will turn you into an absolute individualist: You will no longer be interested in the opinion of others and you will treat everybody with indifference, as Oscar Wilde did. What a waste for virtue !

The conceptions that you make about your role in society, your attitude towards yourself and others around you, the goal appropriate for you to have and the means to realize it draw you away from or near to others. In the absence of a thinking based on sound principles, as the principle of honor, mutual respect and trust, in the absence of common values with those of others, your success, as a leader, is impossible to achieve.

Leadership is the focus on creating and externalizing experiences that do not exceed others' power to join them.

Being a determinant factor of dignity means to charge yourself with the value of the intelligence to convey to all the people you meet that "here" in the present and "there" in the future you are ready to accept the causes and effects of faulty feelings that are not allowed to exist outside of you.

Conclusion: Those who bear in their souls the sense of congruence, especially with their leader, will line up with him, will break the ranks and thus "create" a safe shelter for all, one which will withstand major storms.

Transform your leadership in a shelter for the benefit of both you and the rest of the world.

The Law Of Science Fiction

On November 23, 2014

Make a distinction between fiction and reality, focusing on the dominant element that imposes new standards of exigency in approving the criteria for assessing your identity.

Undoubtedly, I was headed for somewhere undefined. Towards a beginning of the road that continues up to the confluence of two distinct worlds, marked by the relativization of truth and the multiplicity of consciousness. A world of invisible shadows and one of isolated signs revealing an inner look. They far exceeded the limited power of understanding direct knowledge, propelling me to a new opportunity to approach the phenomenon of ambiguity – both in relation to myself and especially in relation to the entity called space-time.

Was everything just in my imagination? Was it a tangled game of my own creation, a trick I had played on myself? The worlds were not worlds, but silent spaces, forgotten by the meanders of the intellectual abstract – which meant a knowledge without rest, whose relationship with existence corresponded to a living reality sublimed in time.

I had explored them because I wanted to change them before they changed me. And even if that was the case, it was a mere chance. Chance and its consequences. Everything was turned back, like a mirror overlaid on top of another mirror – but still standing. Though its position was set in void, in the various fields of virtuality. I think I was rather doing science fiction than science.

Galileo Galilei, with his looking glass equipped with lenses of only a few centimeters in diameter, saw in 1612 an unknown star near the planet Jupiter. A star which actually did not exist, but which probably was the planet Neptune at that time in conjunction with Jupiter. Galileo was not aware of what he had discovered, and so the planet Neptune was only acknowledged later.

I was not going to get caught in the trap of doubts and feel disappointed by the lack of power to make the difference between fiction and reality. But only later I understand: you cannot believe in a new world unless you honor its invitation to be discovered and accepted as true.

Leadership: Can you ensure your navigation between fiction and reality in such a way that the specifics of an "inferior" science convert to the "superior" type?

There is darkness and light in everything we try to unravel, as a validation of our ability to analyze from many possible angles what others do not know, do not see or do not understand. Darkness encompasses everything, light reveals everything. Whoever thinks he knows himself well, always finds something new and different in him. But at the same time he can starts doubting himself. A kind of paradox of becoming needing to be balanced, focusing on the dominant element that imposes new standards of exigency in approving the criteria for assessing identity, beliefs and the abilities of perception and knowledge.

And this dominant element, associated with subjective experiences, while deserving of being correlated with the present and the future within an inner space and its possibilities to emerge through the indisputable power of chained thoughts, flowing one after the other, spread in any direction, must have a non-null origin value.

That is, not to be eliminated by the accelerated development of science, to prevent the revelation of an immense reality, to present the guarantee – by lighting a new light in man – that the understanding of certain ideas presupposes from the outset the existence of a pile of truth which can be probed through fiction.

A "lower" type of science reflects the tendency towards superficiality in addressing a reality full of uncertainties, which implies a constraint on your ability to deepen yourself in the adventure of your being.

On the other hand, a "superior" type of science, which helps you define the significant spatial cutaway in order to represent yourself symbolically in a particular way, takes as a standard an emergency of discovery of rediscovery of the Ego in the purity of intentions of expressing a universal reasoning through analogies with phenomena and actions of ordinary life.

Leadership: Do you keep a constant balance between the careful observation of reality and the imposition of a helpful imagination that invites you to go through new leads of interpreting what it means to be a significant "event"?

Fiction is the beginning of a process of differentiation of science that never ends, a depth of intellect that certainly exceeds the line of the unanimously accepted norm. But which provides leadership with a superior approach to traditional concepts in relation to a doctrine, as to what you can reserve for your future; a consistent way of accessing a reality after building a part of it; an alignment between beliefs that limit you and those that set your orientation points by the force of the creative view.

Leadership can advance to a profound reconsideration of the prospects of ascension to "superiority" only by the power of controlling your thoughts. Or, better said, pushing the thought forward to a reconsideration of the foundation and essence of the horizons of knowledge and excessive expectations, by interpreting reality. To overcome the limit of your rational and pragmatic condition through a mixture of ingenuity, novelty and boldness that is out of the ordinary depends entirely on the scientific nutrient you consume.

Ensuring your navigation between fiction and reality means continuing to function in the sphere of a higher ideal even if it seems untouchable to others. That would really put you in the forefront, with the risk of being incomprehensible. For being a significant "event" in the constant presence of fiction means losing your marks and waking up into a reality that you do not understand and cannot accept as being possible.

And the one who tries to understand a superior entity first needs to convert the "inferior" type of science to the "superior" type, that is, to connect to depth levels that go beyond the limit of perception that most have. Which means to become captive himself between reality and fiction. He would be a Master of Creation able to implement visions inspired by his own self, through the relationship between space, time and matter.

Confirming your identity in a wider space means to transpose yourself in an experiment called fiction from which you will draw conclusions that will help you see the utility of those visions that can keep reality in balance.

The Law Of Science Fiction is aimed at that "slip in a direction that's beyond control". But it invariably brings the joy of an advanced form of knowledge that helps you realize the importance of thoughts in materializing the vision.

What distinguishes you from others is the vision – the art of seeing invisible things, then accepting them as true, connecting them to reality, and capitalizing on them in your favor in leadership. And that can put you in the position of redefining your identity.

The Law Of Sight That Is Not Lost

On November 28, 2022

The closer the object of the gaze is, the more the perception of its importance is reduced to experiences and feelings.

The chair on which I am sitting right now at my desk, the same chair that my artistic sensibility has so often perceived as a work of art, an animated reality with which I have forged a lasting friendship, was not only intended as a stand-alone structure, but as the singularity of a pragmatic theme that invites you to a labyrinthine journey where you feel that you are entering into a dialogue with the space and matter from which the works of the great Creation come.

Encompassing it with the vision that comes and goes, in contradiction to any scientific representation, I realize that I approach respectfully, shyly, patiently, the primordial condition of art: the construction of an honest vision that inspires a story.

To become its friend, the best confessor, now that friendship is dearer than gold and less pure than a living color, now that you shrug in answer to all that the eye sees but does not feel, and yet pretend that I have reached that threshold of thought in which my imagination focuses only on the animating content, without discovering its mysterious world depicted in a memory communicated beyond words, is similar to capturing the mirage of a desolate world in which the artist confused with his own creation.

And if I somehow changed the color of the background of my vision, then the object of my gaze would seem as significant as a pictorial portrait that weighs in the weight of time the despair, the doubt, the desolation of a completely unpredictable existence. Yes, it is something emotional, a soul connection between the two of us, especially between the object of the gaze and the object of evaluation of a blind but sensitive world, whose continuum is not made up of recurring characters or narrative threads, but rather is compatible with the evolution of a state of spirit, of an idea, of a context of mutual tolerance where fun and good will are in their element.

Leadership: Is your creation based on the notion of affective simultaneity between a Self that transcends the diversity of material objects and a Self that transcends reality in the mind of the observer?

This is how far the object of my gaze brought me, how much this chair imposed itself on my artistic spirit, with that magnetic force, similar to a perpetuum mobile, giving simultaneity in an inertial field of reference, constant in time, which has both influence as well as memory. I still do not realize whether, seeing him with his eyes subject to the rules of combining colors and the insatiable mixing of contrary principles, under the cover of beauty, he does not somehow lack the two abysses: life without death and the creative effect accentuated in a symbolic art.

And if I were to describe him in the strongest colors, as a prisoner of the obsession for beauty, a pensiero prevalente che richiede attenzione e che provoca un lavoro mentale prolungato, approaching any theme from the perspective of his own sensations and perceptions, then probably I would find the mirroring of the style of interpretation of reality in the source of the satisfaction of pretending to paint only what I see, without seeing what is important to see.

Situated as if beyond the present, in a space of creation, reflection and dreaming, the chair weighs on my memory of the past, ever since I saw it years ago at a "Mobilo Expo", and the coincidence is too striking, too revealing to banish the idea of a perspective frame for the drawings and paintings inspired by the desire to create an alternative user profile of subjective reality. It would seem that he feels my mental states beyond the manifestations of creation, claiming his place as the hero in a novel by Paul Auster:

It is the idea of being there, of being between the four walls, of breathing the same air as the writer who sees in him an artist before he actually becomes an artist. From now on, he tells himself, whatever happens will influence everything else. At some point someone will knock on the door. The artist will approach me, taking the place of the writer, and suddenly all distances will be erased, the thing and the thought becoming one and the same. Anything, but not to interrupt the flow of words on a canvas whose reading takes the form of a decipherment, for in this way the rest of his being can enjoy the freedom to look around the room, to observe the observable, to think, without diverting his attention from an identity full of: "I am worthless".

Leadership: Does your creation make it possible to perceive the "thing" seen as having multiple parts or determinations, in accordance with that part of the soul that it lacks?

Durable, recognized by the existence of a singularity too often despised, confirmed by the reality of a vision that does not deceive its eyes when a stable and predictable construction must be perceived, my office chair expects from me an attention called Prelinahveh Gandattva (an expression of solidarity towards style and form, allied with the feeling of inner illumination) so that it can be placed in the foreground of a creation that should not be overlooked. Therefore, I feel grateful that I made a common thing into a form of connection with my inner world, without betraying my instinct to actually sip from the snapshots of reality, searching, finding, choosing, uniting all the forces of art in a single vision: Interserenza Acetothysion, that "nothing" can remain hidden.

Dear chair, more than you think you are, you represent that part of a character full of feeling, which is felt only through text and actions. I owe you these lines, to the feeling you released through the mind-soul connection, a feeling reflected in the form of a subjective, own and unique experience. No, I have not overlooked your presence just like the distracted and careless crowd, just like those ordinary people who pose as omniscient but who cannot reach spiritual heights through creative activities. Please keep this in mind, and increase my comfort when I work in the office.

And you, dear reader, if you haven't seen what's inside the chair you sit on daily, if you haven't felt what it feels like when the dawn disturbs your senses, if you haven't looked at it as a work of art recomposed in permanence from emotions, if you did not offer it the part of the soul that it lacks, that part of the soul that you put in a few words to which the emotions give wings like Prometheus, then you probably did not understand that matter is energy transformed into something tangible, physical.

So, I urge you to look at everything you interact with, the same way I look at my office chair: as an attempt to overcome the figurative-non-figurative dilemma.

The transition from vision to creation can take into account the idea that leadership is a form of connection with your inner world, starting from the observation of something seemingly insignificant, but which facilitates the contouring of the self-image and the image of the world, making the image that you promote to be commensurate with the feeling that crosses and metamorphoses every artist.

The Law Of Sight That Is Not Lost refers to the artist's ability to perceive a reality that the eye cannot escape from, that reality contained in the dimension of things about which feeling and fantasy always have something new to say.

The Law Of Soul Mates Located In The Astral Plane

On June 24, 2020

Souls that have the same vibration or the same astral antiquity are identical or have an intimate connection with each other.

Everything around me bears the subtle influence of an artist's gaze, perhaps greater than any monument and any mountain peak by the very permanence of his works, an artist who promotes the idea of an art created according to life patterns available in the pattern of a story full of meaning and a visionary coherence. Once again, I feel the need to provide an answer to my soul, so pushed towards the mirage of another world, in an initiatory journey of the imaginary, regarding what all the creative forces of nature speak, its expressions being contained in a secret language accessed only with the uncorrupted soul of a child.

Of course, my so finely weighed observations, related to artistic representations and productions, concern the broadening of the horizon of a spiritual content noticeable only through Estuanprithes, an attribute of the enlightening effects of free minds engaged in the book of my destiny, in the reason of my creations, as otherwise than by the drawing of a beautiful thought that finds at the right time the chosen rhyme in a word that includes all the imaginary forms of the relationship between man and nature. And this word, Estuanprithes, denotes the approach of a destiny torn from the loneliness of immortality, behind the whole work of God.

The world of freedom and art, here I open my soul, my mouth, my horizons, to respond to another soul, contained by the face of a rose so fine, so great at first glance, which I can, at this very moment, seem to touch and feel all its purity, radiance, naturalness, inside me. And its eyes, contained in an effect of mirror, of illumination, of great pictoriality, like pearls reminiscent of the splendor of sea or ocean waters, steal my heart and thought, sucking my words like multicolored whispers taken from a world of dreams.

Art is not a spiritual satisfaction unless the painter faithfully depicts the details of a sensational capture taken from the beauties of nature, in the form of an immortal story. Here is the essential mystery that is always the source of true art: to be the designer of the universe in the image of an earthly world.

Leadership: Does your creation result from the original intentionality of the ego that tirelessly scrutinizes its condition of "self-definition" integrated into the essential mystery, to decipher the meaning of a high spirituality and to express it in a concrete, lasting form of living?

If my soul listens to a rose, delicato come una farfalla, and if its heart agrees with me, that our conversations may appease any fury of nature, then it will be happy because it has been given a name, and because everything else which abounds in the masterpieces of art derives from here. From a name that symbolizes my great thoughts, the emotions of a memory in shapes, lines and colors.

That's right, the happiness of an artist comes from the existence of a flower that lives in its place another reality, in a parallel world.

A higher artistic plan, revealing itself even when the drawing is made quickly, spontaneously, with the sole purpose of faithfully recording a certain image, allows the assumption of an experience of otherness born from the agreement with the pure forms of beauty, sensitivity, being, by correlating with other expressive means of rendering an equivocal reality.

Here I enlivened the rose with a lot of imagination, with the help of vibrant colors – red and yellow, and it enlivened me with its frankness and naturalness, with that speech of a pharaoh who wrote on his emerald tablet: "It is appropriate that my soul may make my life pleasant in the land of the setting sun."

Souls that have the same vibration or the same astral antiquity, are identical or have an intimate connection between them, uniform on any plane of life – spiritual, physical, mental, emotional, familial, but also on any plane of human history. No wonder the relationship between me and the rose "Double Delight", the dialogue started from the symbolism of symmetrical hearts that pours around this balm of guiding souls, spiritually evolved, is an unbeatable combination of a form of subjective expression, a process of creative imagination, and a powerful source of artistic inspiration, strengthened especially by current astral energy.

Leadership: Does the unique attribute of the art you practice perfectly attract the idea of the existence of an inner court, of an Absolute Self that realizes a unique and coherent connection between a sharp mind and a soul with divine potential?

The artist takes his creation to the level of art by outlining a rose that comes to life in another world, in a completely new dimension, he being a visionary of fantasy, of the astral realms and of sacred art. And I am a special artist, author of the work "Parole derivate dall'ascolto di un misterioso sussurro", because everything I have accomplished in earthly life, and which was previously planned by an astral force, empathizes with the symbol of an assumption of nature under the species "interioritatis".

In turn, the rose symbolizes the destiny of the enlightened man, determined in the astral world even before he is born, to change something in the purpose of the earthly world. Let the man who has something to change, change it. Let the man who has nothing to change, himself change, and change for the better. And the rose, listen to me when I tell you, is happy when someone recognizes its origin, depths, symbols, perfectly attracting the idea of the existence of an inner court, of an Absolute Self, of a spiritual life captured in the reproduction of a plein-air painting, in the spell of another time, in a god's eye surrounded by rays of light.

And I am glad when I speak of the rose as the face of a Uomo Dell'Universo, handsome, of great sensitivity, so sincere, endowed with the science of all the appearances of nature. It is, perhaps, the same joy with which the writer Mary Balogh analyzes her characters from the perspective of attachment to the freedom of artistic creation:

"Inspiration had to be above all else. The artist had learned this in the last ten years. And now he felt inspired. He saw every being as it was and how it was to appear on the canvas, and he could not paint it fast enough so as not to lose that spark in him that saw all its beauty. How to capture the light, the hope and the vulnerability on the canvas, without losing the delicate balance between them and without giving in to the temptation to paint only the everyday aspect – in her case, a very nice being."

A concrete, lasting form of living in the vicinity of art can be represented by rendering the beauty of a friendship experienced in the light of holy words, between the graceful body of nature and an artist of time simultaneously.

The Law Of Soul Mates Located In The Astral Plane prioritizes the intimate connection established between the spiritual nature of an artist's existence created in the image of God expressed by the delicacy of an image that persists in the idea of generating a state of understanding and universal acceptance of the message: "The soul of great holiness and purity opens its own horizons to the discovery of other worlds."

As for the unique attribute of my art, here it is, please remember it as the brilliance of a diamond that springs from within: it is the perfection of knowledge from the perspective of an extensive science – the science of nature.

The Law Of Supremacy

On November 19, 2010

Be the master of your whole little world before being the master of the whole world.

The Count of Monte Cristo, thanks to the wisdom gained from abbot Faria during the thirteen years when he was imprisoned, he managed then not only to build a strong image and a sound name thanks to his skill, but to rise above all, exercising his influence in society, in the economic field, social and especially in the political sphere.

Fervently wanting to reach the main goal - to punish with a vengeance on those who threw him in prison without mercy - he changed many destinies left adrift. Monte Cristo has become a person of influence so great that one of his gestures, one word can change a life.

But eventually, after he managed to "solve" all problems of the soul, only then the Count realized that the world is full of sublime whom he had built with much craft, it was not a perfect world, was by no means a world to express his true values, a world that would not heal his remorse which gave him no peace. He wrote a farewell letter to his good friend, Maximillien:

"Tell the angel who will watch over your life, Maximillien, to pray sometimes for a man who, like Satan, thought a moment equal to God and then recognized that - with all the humility of a Christian - that supreme power and wisdom is only in the hands of almighty God. The prayers of your beloved Valentine maybe will sweeten the remorse's that he bears at the bottom of his soul."

Leadership: Do you concern for your own world before changing other worlds?

Words full of lessons and reflections of the Count of Monte Cristo, where you can feel the impulses, memories, pain made me remember what once said the great English writer Aldous Huxley: "There's only one corner of the universe that you can be sure you can improve, and that is really your own person."

If you detach from your own world, your own "inner rampart" that protects you from negative factors to fight your way through uncharted territories, with the sole purpose of satisfying personal interests based on emotion, you venture to go in the same situation like that of Monte Cristo - to fall into a deep feeling of guilt.

Your way towards the freedom of being better is an attempt to position thinking and ideals in a context of exploring the possibilities of repairing what happened caused by the pride of believing yourself to be God.

To overcome remorse, instead of living with it, is proof of the validity of progress based on a decrease in dependence on affirmation of superiority, on a culture of forgetfulness and forgiveness that highlights a profound spiritual and moral rise.

As a leader, be confident that you will take a personal struggle with what is true and what you want to be in the world's eyes. You will often be in a position to choose: between being a victim - a victim of your own - and being a man of character who knows how to cope with all the emotions, fears and concerns that arises in life, and all the desires that can hurt his heart. Something within you must be so strong that any event cannot mentally break you down.

Can you represent your leadership as a means of determining the future that the very force of the feelings of forgiveness and gratitude reserved for you after communing with God?

A man with a weak mind insists with ferocity only on reaching a goal, supporting with strength and pride his own views, opinions by arguments that cannot be neglected. But because of how he interprets things and situations might be tempted to believe that his world is the only one that exists. And this is a deceptive victory; the negative effects will be seen later.

Leadership: Are you your own biggest enemy?

Muhammad was quite right when he said: "The strongest man is the one who wins the battle with himself." This is a great truth. You can soar to the heights, you can conquer the peaks, but you can crash into the darkest depths if you do not conquer the battle with yourself.

The fortunate to meet happiness will be smaller. Your world will fall apart if you do not gather strength, if you do not arm yourselves with patience, understanding, courage, willpower and, above all with wisdom - against blows that can make life getting lost in your world to another - without them it's like a big surf where pirates freely roam without taking drastic measures to get your defense.

The inclination towards the craft of polishing your character has as its basis the merit of man's victory against vanity when there is a progressive accentuation of dependence on superiority.

The law of supremacy refers to the ability and capacity of the leader to rule over his "world" in its immediate vicinity, including the one by himself - and only after she "works" at full capacity, he can aspire to other peaks. I mean, first of all, the leader needs to be the master of his little world, before being the master of the whole world.

The Law Of Temporal Experience

On November 26, 2014

Find the significance of a science that fulfills the function of superiority in an attempt to give meaning to an untrained experience.

I wanted to divide every assumption on the functioning of a separate world in new terms of representation, to break down everything into small fragments that highlight less obvious aspects of the relationship between science and understanding. A key finding due to existential reflections, before clarifying the notions of art to modify the leakage of time, was needed to define the unit of measure of the amount of information that had to be processed to verify an experimental hypothesis.

The result, rich in representations of complex perceptions subjected to distorted effects of unanimously accepted truths, serving as an element of comparison between two completely opposing structures of thought, but with the same purpose, could have easily eliminated the inappropriate evolution of the factor called objectivity. One thing useful to matter and its ability to gather in quasi-independent units, but also to interact with each other, creating a new space-time configuration that made sense of an untrained experience was directly related to my roots.

Consciously, I was exposing myself to the risk of remaining captive in absolute subjectivity. Incessantly, I was overwhelmed by an inexplicable feeling, as if I was marching through the white wand of the absence of any form of life, isolated in a non-material field that extended to infinity. Time had originated in me, its constant being a continuous journey to the realm of profound understanding.

During this haze of reflections from which the future was taking shape, one which I felt existed and one which grows exponentially, kept ringing in my mind the words of Scottish poet of the 17th century, William Drumond: "If you complain that there will be a time in which you will not be, why do you not also regret that there was a time when you were not, and also that you are not as old as this enlivening Planet of Time? That will be after us, which, long before we existed, was."

Leadership: Can you develop an original version of self-experience through proper use of time in other periods?

All evidence of the whole vision of the world and its reality outside the normal length of time that elapses while pressing the trigger of madness, when you jump into the imaginary, in the name of an irreducible superiority, based on the idea of "accessibility" in an expanded thinking space. Time, devoted to accessing reference benchmarks such as the trend of development in a framework for creative fulfillment and enhancement of the potential of knowledge becomes part of reality in its own imaginary universe.

To understand leadership in terms of access to a higher level of knowledge, hard to quantify, but necessary to being part of a scientific component revealing new depths and meanings, we must start from the premise that truth is relative and interpretable. Subjectivity versus objectivity. What you believe shapes a changing reality, valuing it through an agreement related to complex reasoning, others may believe the opposite – that reality is a mere shadow of feelings and sensations experienced.

Information not available to all, in a way that the various past experiences influence the interpretation of the world today, come together to give rise to what you have unconsciously always sought. A new "Yourself" used as self-awareness that seems to fill an entire universe and gives it meaning.

But can this universe function in your absence? In this case, leadership becomes a means of representation of a higher reality, for it is no longer reduced to the experiences of your relationship with others or how you perceive the world around you, but to examine scientific, occult experiences.

Leadership: Can you ensure a correct understanding of the distinction between what is essential and important, of what is secondary and minor, in a journey of reflecting on the role of an experience experienced through a counter-definition of reality?

An original version of self-experience is sometimes accomplished by a rejection of ideas that can be labeled as being utopic, which will turn against you, just like a boomerang you have thrown out of naivete. But the utopias are very real and very present in your life all the time succeeding, truly, in highlighting those high ideals that broaden horizons in so many ways that you have never imagined.

The starting point of what will be materialized in a higher form of approach to focus your orientation for future extreme innovation, addressing the need to express creativity through the art of fragmenting all aspects less obvious of the relationship between science and utopia, no matter their nature, can be amplified by the activity of thinking remaining uninfluenced by the test of effective reality.

A counter-definition of reality is accomplished through an assumption of ideas that do not know hindrances and are not limited by a certain restraint from public opinion, to the extent in which the image you build of yourself has as a prime argument that need for transcendence, to give a meaning that will surpass the "Ego" of existence and the identity conflicts of the thinking being that claims its presence in the world of imagination.

A thinking that rethinks itself is the ground of man's self-modelling in a world of imagining ideas and visions, guided by a subjectivity which in turns is a bearer of meaning and value, in which everything is changing, but at the same time close to a power of creation that stretches its threads everywhere in reality.

The Law Of Temporal Experience is aimed at trying to develop an original version of self-experience, related to creation, through appropriate use of time in other periods. Meaning thereby that you transpose yourself in another being's situation, from the past or future and to understand it through your own ideas, imagination, especially from a paradoxical perspective: the more dependent you are on superior science, the more you are addicted to the key of space-time relationship.

And leadership can become a science of the absolute, a product of existential time that exists in the consciousness of a genius, considering the value of the parameters of knowledge that must be maintained between the limits imposed by the "subjective" and the "objective."

The Law Of The All-Encompassing Moment

"He who has looked at the present has looked at all things: those that have happened in the impenetrable past, and those that will happen in the future." (Marcus Aurelius)

I sit in the sun, on the grass, in the mountains. In front of me is the hotel I return to every year. The grass knows all too well my habit of finding myself in the midst of nature, but the hotel doesn't know that. The hotel wants me inside, which makes me feel like a captive, just like when you can't escape from a place where time is running out, people are alike, and there's no starting point towards self-satisfaction. However, my soul leads me to the hill behind the hotel, where the vivid colors combine with the smell of the mountains, next to which flows a spring.

Nature invites me to approach its purity, its secrets, its color palette, with peace and a lot of light. Maybe it's better to sit in the sun, feeling the green grass transpose me to the old land of heroes, Avalon, so trying to experience something forgotten not only by me, but by the whole civilization. The wonderful grass, full of wild flowers, so fine to the touch, being a part of this lost totality, never changes its appearance.

But no one thinks of the grass full of happy flowers, no one is aware of its power that makes you recognize yourself as being the same across the rigors of time.

As can be seen, I recognized myself in a legend that has its origins in ancient times. I recognized in the presence of the blades of grass the very presence of symbolism, that drive to the scent of legendary times and I came to fully appreciate the dimensions and meanings of a myth in which Camelot of Avalon is the very hotel that now paints my horizon.

Even the colors of nature have withstood the rigors of time. And they are the same, immortal. Did Knight Lancelot think the same in his moments of solace?

Leadership: Is the acceptance of a succession of feelings, sensations and thoughts a model according to which you form the image of a previous duration and a later duration?

We will not find self-satisfaction in a place full of people, where everything is similar in need and aspiration. Rather, I think we get to know it if we feel the satisfaction of fulfilling a unique moment in our lives, which we imagined coming from another life, from other times, from the places where we would like to stay. After all, perhaps the true feeling of self-satisfaction is that we existed in a time before time.

It is better to be the irremediable prisoner of self-satisfaction, devoid of any contact with people's daily routine, than to betray the memory of one's own greatness obtained in another time, in another life. Therefore, I prefer a miracle that arose from the imagination of a positioning in the high sphere of a time-defying vision.

Yes, I am the same Lancelot knight who, in years and years, will be recognized as a Jedi knight, under the guise of a Luke Skywalker. As long as I live, nature will help me to increase my inner strength, to overcome my self-doubt, letting myself be guided by a memory that persists through a kind of warm, settled, airy state.

Happiness can also be achieved through simple, seemingly minor things that you can do every day, at any time when you sit alone on the pleasant-smelling grass. Equally, the reunion of the self is a drop from a place where the sensations of banality are blurred, taken out from the pressure of the concrete, these being discerned by the memory left by the idea of the space you traverse in time, through discretion and wisdom, just to get to the same place in which you were once a knight or a king.

The great revelation of the self consists in the recollection of a moment beyond which I cannot imagine others, so that it may seem to you that the place of your rediscovery comprises eternity.

We must discover the analogy, not the identity of the countless individual destinies that have left their mark on time, if we want to be aware of what Jorge Luis Borges long ago expressed in a single idea: "The physical universe has stopped because one man has reconnected with nature and its very essence, in a course without time and without clock."

And, I allow myself another crossing of the knowledge of nature and the universe, taking into account what Marcus Aurelius had to say: "Even if the years of your life were three thousand or ten times three thousand, remember that no one loses a life other than the one they currently live, and neither does one live a life other than the one they lose. The longest term and the shortest term are therefore equal. Remember that all things rotate and rotate in the same orbits again, and that it is the same for the viewer whether he sees them for a century, or two, or indefinitely."

Here is the conclusion: The man who fails to imagine anything beyond the space he discovers around him, not believing that there is another, is a man who does not recognize the immensity of another sphere: the Meta-Universe.

The great revelation of the self encompasses the meaning and emotion behind a gaze directed to a moment when what surprises you is your transformation into a person who knows how to move from a stagnant present to a lasting present.

The Law Of The All-Encompassing Moment emphasizes the need to capture a reality that from another angle might seem an opportunity to escape to another world, completely different from real life. Are you a person who recomposes, recreates the past, selecting, sometimes adding fictions that he thinks are real, true?

And since we got to this point, here are some words that go straight to my heart, someone shared them on a web page:

"Sometimes, we feel that that magical atmosphere that we all remember from childhood fairy tales and that made our world more beautiful, has disappeared from our lives. However, from time to time, we need to relive that sublime feeling, to let ourselves be carried on the wings of imagination in a place where everything is possible. And, above all, to open our eyes to the world around us, because the great mysteries are always hidden from us, in our current state, in the feeling of being one with nature. It's up to us to figure it out."

The Law Of The Art Within The Broad Horizon Of Science

Unleash your artistic side and free your imagination by creating an existence that is lost in the unlimited moment from which a great revelation can arise at any point.

The only form of long-term human resistance is the ability to create, a pendulum between several complementary colors, viewed from the point of view of belonging to the artistic conduct of a painter, reminds us more of the unique way of rethinking the limits of a symbolic world. It touches the ceiling of the absolute through the words and breaths of the soul, and there is the danger of confusing the universally-valid with the universally-known.

I will only ever understand the notion of predestination of the treasures of the universe through the living plasma of the words that encompass and express an "outside" from within the being. Whoever tries to relate to me, as painters do when they choose their inspirational models, by a kind of value equivalence, will first have to replace intellectual knowledge with intense experience of being close to sacred mysteries.

Being in the possession of a knowledge that no one can penetrate with their minds alone, but through the mechanism of action of a passion coming from a lover of beauty, as a personal witness of the scenes captured "in a stylized never-ending story" between the artwork and that part of life experienced with open eyes, I was telling myself that I would never escape the trap of the most advanced aspirations. And I haven't.

Undoubtedly, I learned a lot from the impressionists, not only visually, of the application of principles producing eclectic effects, but rather in the form of an intellectualism of the wider view of the universe that can be contained only by the means of the Great Science, the ups and downs of a suite of visionary concepts that grow under the idea of Living Art. The expression used to reach the sensitive strings of the corazon, its mysterious vibration, introduces the absolute value of seeing beyond illusion, through the power of reason to liberate the concept of "reflection" from the inevitable limitations of an inexhaustible life experience.

Before me, painters like Rembrandt, Delacroix, or writers such as Hugo or Dumas, referred to the dimensions of art as an act of communicating a knowledge derived from personal experience on the occasion of using certain hypostases of the spirit by reuniting with THE PRIME MATTER, symbolizing faith in God and in the living forces of creation.

Leadership: Can you maximize the value of uniqueness you give from the position of an active participant in the development of an unequaled art that promotes intense livelihood by getting closer to the unseen secrets of life experience?

The subtle art of understanding things holy is the branch of science that deals with identifying, locating, defining and knowing the trajectory called "vibration", expressive purity, with which the experience of life is impregnated. And to play with science is similar to build your own Lego city. So, you still need to form your thinking of an engineer endowed with the spirit of morality, good sense, taste for beauty and respect for nature.

Then everything is so easy and engaging at the same time to embrace the vivid dialogue of primordial colors with the passionate fervor of the real existence conflicts, investing by contemplating any object with that lasting quality of cosmic conjunctions. But so easy ! And yet, only a handful of people can manage that.

Science responds to you as you want, as a relationship of symbolic forces, emotions and emotional qualities. No matter how you arrange the pieces, in what order you want, even in your sleep, in the middle of your dreams, if you are an engineer something beautiful always comes to light. And if you have an angel wing in your soul, you can give a poetic aura to your entire creation.

If you see on the sidewalk a tiny leaf from the tree and you do not know how to make it a new concept of dwelling, then you cannot call yourself an engineer. An engineer manages to always project endlessly, from nothing, a true masterpiece. But only the painter gives it a little life when he experiences the achievement of immenseness, enlightenment, through that power of suggestion, full of affection, compassion, purity.

Order science to obey your will, as if you were its master, the one who gives it life, that is Diderot's greatness. To support the sensible basis of pictorial construction on a play of interactions between emotional states and atypical life situations, it is the sensibility of being authentic that distinguishes Tiziano Vecellio.

Leadership: Do you permanently update your artistic approach by analyzing the realities of the contemporary world through a visual journey that takes into account the past and is projected in the future?

Science and art have as a common element the full-fledged correspondence traced by an apparent resemblance, from Diderot's writings to Fulcanelli's famous works, to the zigzags of a literature that knows oscillations or exaggerations through art as an instrument of investigation of reality. They reveal a thought centered on the logos, the existence of unlimited possibilities of analogy, where God's intervention seems necessary when it is necessary to consolidate the truth from the diversity of a world full of sensations and appearances.

By means of a visual path that takes into account the past and is projected in the future, the approach to a new dimension of perception of aesthetics and depth in relation to the spirit of the epoch is achieved, by combining the new with the old in a manner of elegance and good taste.

Victor Hugo, master of the passions that bind man to God's Spirit, ended his spirited moral reckoning on the very last page of the novel Les Misérables: "I do what I can, I suffer from universal suffering and I am trying to relieve it. I have only the weak powers of a man and I cry to others: Help me ! "

The Titans write history when they meditate, but they recognize their depressing powerless that expects its revitalization in a companionship with a strong partner. Sometimes I do not know much about the expression of the different states of mind that characterize my inspirational models, just as it happens with a book before I go read it, some distance away from the conquest of new terms of high expressivity. But it is better than to always cry for help.

And I am surprised to realize that the vision in terms of a color dialogue is not at all what I imagined at first sight, hence the quirk of an unexpected coherence and enviable lucidity. At the same time, I am aware that my part of the story is to be seen as an overwhelming presence of occult content, but I must assume my belonging to an artistic approach that can forever change the perception of the power of transforming matter based on the evolutionary model of the universe.

In art, the synchronicity between manifestation and expression is accomplished by your finding in regards to what you feel, admitted exclusively as a kind of ambulatory library, in those creative moments traveled through faith, in a special relationship between Life and Universe.

The Law Of The Art Within The Broad Horizon Of Science could be as follows: adjust your vision according to the confessions your life contains in terms of an armistice signed with the destiny whose script is written with the matter and energies of the universe.

The Law Of The Man In The Storm

On November 18, 2012

Do not throw yourself in the spumous waves of the performance, without assessing in advance the intensity of the storm, which can disturb your character and your personality.

There is no mystery, which could not be unraveled by the strong waves, enormous, and hardly combated of the truth. Events may facilitate and pave the way towards highlighting the personality. Or, conversely, may temporarily overshadow this personality. However, seeking and accepting the truth, mystery, this impassable territory, is unraveled.

I was heading towards the professional success as an actor that relies solely on his art to disguise himself in order to better enter into the skin of the other characters. I was caught in my own trap, much tighter and tougher than I could have imagined. However, an exhilarating race, oriented somehow towards performance. Thrown between two large oceans: "to be" and "not to be". Caught in the middle of an existential storm that did not promise anything sure.

I thought that the power of rising myself above the condition of a passer through the world and becoming much more than I was, could be stored in a kind of special batteries for to be available at my request and used at any time. Therefore, to enable the defeat of any boundaries, as well as the intact preservation of the identity - that seemed to rust in the decisive moments.

Leadership: How do you define your reality as long as you try to remain distinctive through the absolute uniqueness of the freedom to be yourself around a belief that dominates your thinking?

More specifically, I was in front of an unknown fact. Between an absolute of the real and an absolute of the fiction - against a cunning enemy that probably no one was suspecting him. Like a hero of Jules Verne, I was engaged in a struggle with an unseen force. An invisible hand was following me everywhere, threatening me with the sword well-propped in the middle of my reality, cutting all my roads in the intention to align myself to some "extremist" convictions, opposing all my concepts about life and its purpose. Without being able to riposte. Without anyone could intervene.

Everything was carried out on the real plan, like a concern that absorbed me completely. An incomplete awakening in the middle of the decline, but an awakening of which I took account. The only persuasion that dominated my thinking, in correspondence with the skill of the will to function according to the norm of the talent and of the creative spirit, was that everything could end with the success of the idea of free-will in front the predestination of belonging to a world that fails to rebuild itself. A world seen as an expression of an incomplete vision of what success or failure represents.

Living in the world of my own values, I was in fact stubbornly trying to live in an isolated world, driven by uncertainty. Could I have tried tricking it, try a maneuver to get away from this limit of my perspective, this pitfall of confusion, whatever it may have been? I do not know, I do not believe. I could not; I did not have the courage to risk drowning myself into uncertainty. In that continuous confusion that first spins until you do know where you are; then shakes you soundly, from here to there, on the spot, until you do not know anymore who you are.

I risked to lose myself definitely, to let myself be exploited by the force of uncertainty. I was caught in the middle of the storm. I was sinking little by little, among the deceptive waves of life. I manufactured my invincible mentality by the lack of responsiveness. I doubted myself. This was the truth.

Leadership: Are you prepared to deepen yourself in the twitching of a sense of overcoming limitations so as to identify yourself with the main values of a man who adjusts his direction by how things anchor in another reality?

As far as I am concerned, the values that guided me to understand the phenomenon I was experiencing through a continuous quest for questions and answers were totally different from those of others: I coveted only things that were not easy to get, and set aside those known by everyone else.

The road of self-knowledge is essential in leadership. It starts from the point where you are and ends up where you want to be. Assuming an identity that honors you by what you are, what you do, the way you present yourself before the highest court - your conscience. And consciousness means filtering all things with your inner acceptance before you act and see what reaction you get from life.

Self-knowledge is like a road that opens other roads. However, just as well, could mean a lost war with yourself, preventing you to complete yourself, making you to feel limited in a certain area or a certain part of your life.

Only the favorable events can occasion you the enhancement of your most precious good, your personality, which is formed and noticed precisely in the moment of smooth transition, but sometimes hard and painful, from an existential state to another, by assuming the courage to be vulnerable or imperfect.

The true light that connects you to the value of life is the consequence of the final confrontation between the decision to abandon yourself to a desolate feeling of frustration and the power to rise above and beyond limits of any kind.

One of the things that you learn and accept during the course of the leadership's process is that the power to rise yourself above the condition of being an effect of a cause and to change things around in order to get as high as you can, is set by the will to free yourself from the scenarios of a struggle with unseen force. By identifying and assuming mistakes. You will always remember the mistakes that you made, but that has propelled you towards a constructive and a higher becoming.

In this respect, it is important to remember the point of view of the expert in leadership, John Maxwell: "I still feel the sting of the very painful things that I've learned when I try to pass them on to you. Yet, I'm also encouraged because I'm glad to recognize that I am wiser today than I was in years past."

The human character and personality that embraces the science of leadership, it is formed by going forward, but always looking back, at the mistakes you have committed in the fight with yourself.

Leadership: Do you offer a unique value to the life resulting from interpreting an unknown fact during the assessment of self-consciousness?

Self-consciousness in the mysterious picture of life is revealed with the recognition of those values of meaning that make you proud and honor you, such as continuity, originality and permanent renewal, from which you have to choose only your choice of truth. Do you attach a sense of ascension or descent to your journey? You find out the truth when you come to give yourself the particularity of functioning by recognizing and accepting your own limitations and mistakes.

The only unknown fact that you have to sketch out through thoughts, attitudes, and skillful approaches, through lines of great sensitivity, drawn out angrily, in that constant whirlwind that first turns you until you do not know where you are, is the freedom to be yourself and defeat yourself.

In leadership, it is not enough to be high enough to shine, but you must shine from the perspective of what you cannot do, through the observation that you are not who you thought you were, just as the sun shines when it is covered by clouds.

And to some and others of those who respond to the call of leadership, and to the debutantes and artists, they deserve all the gratitude of the corresponding composition of the action plans and personal development needs. Especially, for the kindness and promptness with which, they expressed their willingness to contribute to the composition of a "sketch" of the future leadership.

In their possession is the essence of different viewpoints and prospective attitudes regarding leadership, which constitutes the basis of an edifice that reflects their personality. Under the form of those raw impulses of acting, of becoming increasingly perfect, they stimulate their imagination, desire, will, thoughts, and emotions - maintaining them in distinct positions throughout the process of development.

Only those willing to take seriously the construction and maintenance of this edifice, and to deal with the leadership's future, will come to set on foot that whole, called Success.

The success or failure of a person depends on what he imagines to be in a reality that is no longer perceived as a whole, but as separate fragments of his personality.

The Law Of The Man In The Storm shows off the position of the man towards himself, the responsibility to consecrate himself towards a development that can propel him forward, towards success, only through an analysis of the sacrifices and efforts imposed by overcoming the obstacles. Only by investing the character with the most beautiful traits, someone can get close to perfection.

Are you standing in front of a cunning adversary, "the Man within you"? Can you lunge, by trying a maneuver of removing yourself, whatever would be that, of what did not define you, of what is toxic for your becoming?

Are you manufacturing your invincible mentality by the lack of responsiveness before the mistakes you make throughout the period of probation of your character? What are the parts of your personality that remained immature, by making impossible your development?

The Law Of The Unique Personality

On November 26, 2012

Trace the coordinates of your own identity, without substituting yourself to another personality.

I was in front of some truths that no one suspected them, feeding my spirit, expectations, with the false impression created by a bunch of unrevealed thoughts. Simple innovations, units, based on a unique center of depth to see, to seek and find what is not said in words or can not be explained rationally, pertaining to another reality.

An inner door, locked with many large bars, separated me by another space, another man, by another way of being, by a different purpose. As if I had consistently pleased the requirements of a new consciousness, the premise of a new becoming, build from a tough layer of knowledge, like a scientific and cultural establishment, functioning under the authority of a supreme council.

The words of Alexandre Dumas came back to my mind, smoothly and calculated, raising a doubt accompanied by an inner tremor, felt so powerful that the delicate strain of my creative energies, sometimes painful, persisted for several minutes:

"Investigate the past, investigate the present, try to predict the future, and look if not by chance you are a tool". The tool of a force created by an Alter-Ego, only some fragments of images and thoughts that go crazy. Be careful not to get away from yourself, be careful not to get lost in someone else's personality.

However, the gearbox of the conscience, which was intended to amplify the reality, seemed cut out of the landscape.

Leadership: Do you attribute a unique value to your situation in the context of an Alter-Ego comprised of what isolates you and what draws you close to your secret springs of motivation?

I turned more and more into a magician, but into a Wilhelm Storitz with a sharp sword that could penetrate any material body, just as easily as in every heart. With every drop of blood, every tissue, every cell, an invisible force was imposing itself more and more, triggering questions waiting for answers. Un dernier spasme de la défaite. A deep wound that could be healed only in great secrecy.

My secret motivation, from a long line of unanswered searches, was to get to know myself by studying a different world, by approaching a new theme in psychology, by assimilating a more complex and ambiguous identity, one in which darkness is given legitimacy in the order of existence instead of being denied in favor of burdensome perfection.

A new personality, a different way of being, a Wilhelm Storitz possessing all the complexity of passions, feelings and human beliefs. A person loaded with mystery and the holder of some long-buried secrets – the secrets of a mysterious state, invisible, but suffocating like a tightly-screwed cordon around a curtain.

A wave of blood was gushing coldly and cutting, while another one warm and precious receded suddenly like the ocean's water, leaving behind a wet beach. An acute sense of reality, the measured pride of my character's metamorphosis.

The same whisper, fierce and seething like a drop of whiskey in the desert, pushed backward "Investigate ! Investigate ! Investigate." Just like an invisible body that starts to regain its physical form, appearing in the supreme convulsions of becoming. In somehow definite pleasure, by making place in every nerve of my body. A new reality. The last deadline in order to meet my unseen enemy: myself.

Leadership: Do you connecting yourself to the two terminals of your personality to induce yourself a direction towards Good or Evil??

There is one thing more difficult than changing yourself, and this is the bet made with you – of not changing yourself.

A reorientation, the possibility of a renaissance, a revival of your most beneficial and important qualities, by an impulse of the will, the development of a creative energy through a renewal of the "Man" within you, all these are just some filaments that measure on a single wire that magnetic bobbin, which if it is not interrupted can give a higher impetus to the leadership.

Even so, a simple source, such as a battery, has two terminals, one positive and the other one negative, between them existing a difference of potential. You cannot be relaxed and tense at the same time; you cannot go forward with stubbornness and determination, repeating the same mistake, always hoping to get a different result – a positive one.

Before reaching the destination, before embracing the leadership, you must connect the two terminals of your personality "to make yourself unseen" and "to show you in the light of reality" through a more comprehensive and a more open circuit. So that would rise a new current, based on a bolder, and a more progressive configuration, such as "I am who I am supposed to be" or "I'll do what I was supposed to do" from the point with a lower potential, to the one with a higher potential.

When you are unseen, your orientation changes for the worst, because you gather within yourself truths from an adversarial experience that rejects inclusion and social condition, disorienting your entire psychic structure. You begin to see an intransigent attitude similar to the man who relates to God, maintaining his true identity in a security and alert context or in a threat and intimidation context.

The leadership, from the first until the last impulse to get up to the height, needs a great potential that could make a change. First of all, it is necessary the piercing of that isolator, which prevents your ability to be what you are supposed to be. An escape from the reality that does not suit you, hostile, injurious, or that does not fulfill you enough.

Leadership: Can you detect your "Wilhelm Storitz" syndrome only when your valuable content ends below the expectations that the inability to be a reflex of greatness justify?

Once you create a fabulous world through the merit of transforming yourself into someone else because of the power to make yourself unseen, beyond the aspects that could be improved at the level of building a great character, you will have to plead your beliefs in greed, arrogance, lack of respect, persecution and hostility.

The barrier in the way of the creative energy transfer that can undeniably highlight your leadership qualities is given by the estrangement of yourself. A common phenomenon that occurs in the cases of discharges with positive energy, and laden with negative energy. Be careful not to get lost in someone else's personality !

Investigate ! Investigate ! Investigate ! Investigate the past, investigate the present, try to predict the future and look if not by chance you are the creation of an Alter-Ego. Examine yourself very well, and look if not by chance begin to appear some discordant notes between "the one you are" and "the one you are not supposed to be".

An unseen opponent, you yourself, changed at 180 degrees. A Wilhelm Storitz who, possessing all the complexity of passions, feelings and human beliefs, can take over all your conscious, by transforming you into the person that you never wanted to be, into the personality that does not honor a leadership of quality.

Do you find yourself in front of some contradictory truths of your true nature? Through your actions, through your system of values, through the thoughts that you gather, are you transforming yourself into another personality - created by an Alter Ego? Are you dressing the robe of a personality, which negatively marks your leadership? Can you pass that last deadline in order to meet your unseen enemy: you yourself?

What do you do when you wake up stuck in the elevator, without knowing when and how you will get out of there?

To substitute yourself to another personality it is like waking up stuck in the elevator, without knowing when and how you will get out of there. You can only wait for the arrival of some help, or you can suffer a fatal reaction.

Or, you can initiate your own rescue, giving away the curtain of vulnerability and distributing yourself into a superhero role, in which you must give all of yourself. A role, in which the power to be yourself, discovering your full characteristics and assuming everything you do, is the most important advantage to get rid of the influence of an Alter-Ego, thus defeating the symptoms of "Wilhelm Storitz" syndrome.

The law of the unique personality highlights the uncertainty that you feel when you are at the point of turning yourself into someone else. In leadership, you do not have to change your personality, but you must shape it, to refine it in order to be as close to an ideal whose coordinates are widely accepted.

At the same time, highlights the feeling of guilt towards yourself, towards your weakness - that you are not who you are supposed to be, that you understand things differently than they are in reality, and that you look at everything with less lucidity. Nevertheless, all this new press, replacing the old one, all this amalgam of energies and vibrations directed elsewhere, takes place in a private framework. Everything depends on you, to equip this framework with a kind of stronger "to be" that does not succumb to the influences and pressures, alien of the leadership of quality.

Trace the coordinates of your own identity, without substituting yourself to another personality.

The Law Of The Whole Reduced To One

On September 19, 2023

Realizing that you are part of a larger whole can give you a sense of connection with something bigger than yourself.

Every time I arrive at the seaside, the sensation is the same: I experience the intense feeling of "new beginning", ShaUrtho, and the strange sensation of unreality, a detachment from things and a withdrawal into a supposed mystical communion with the divinity, that something flows as if from me, starting from the chest and reaching the limbs, is one that I have not experienced in any other context. With certainty, every detail that sight can encompass is the work of God, before I give it a special meaning through drawing or painting.

Only because of the perspective in the real plane of diversity in unity, taking into account all that is necessary for the sublime to manifest itself as "una belleza que no existe en proporciones, sino en correspondence con el alma y su resonance con el universo", the artist succeeds to give exclusively aesthetic meaning to the image with which his eye broadens its horizon. Painting is essentially the art of observing, enjoying the right moment, capturing a moment in a split second. With every single thing your sight captures, with every experience you have in every memory, you paint your own canvas of reality, thought by thought, choice by choice.

The steps with which I tread the sand, the steps with which I leave behind a sign of my presence, a story about myself, the imprint of an ephemeral work of art on the sand of the coast, where the sea and the sun become muse and inspiration, testify to my journey through time and space. They shape my destiny through a kind of Inthensiodios Aspras, a moment that will never return, and weave the story of my life in the same way that the painter interprets the world around him, full of sensitivity and compassion, as a way to see beauty in the world, even in the most unexpected places.

Leadership: How is the inner struggle that you have to overcome, in order to highlight the connection between the soul and its image on the outside, reflected?

In the movie "Swimming Upstream" that I recently re-watched, there was a scene where Tony Fingleton is swimming alone in the pool after an altercation with his father. This scene is deeply symbolic and reflects Tony's desire to escape the harsh reality of his life. Water is a refuge for Tony, a place where he can retreat and feel free, unconstrained by his problems. And I think that from an artistic point of view this scene, shot in a way that accentuates Tony's loneliness and isolation, also expresses the essence of his existence through the beauty and purity of water, true sources of renewal at the level of self. They help him connect with the world around him and find meaning in life.

The same thing happens to me when I'm at the seaside: the sea is not only a splendid summer landscape, full of infinite blue, where the sky embraces the depths, but it becomes a space of reflection and introspection, a space of identity between the soul and its reflections in the outer world, where every thought and emotion meets the pure essence of my being. The waves of the sea, like Tony's thoughts and emotions, come and go, bringing with them memories, hopes and dreams, making the rendering of a painting accentuated by the waves crashing against the swimmer's body, symbolizing the interaction between man and nature, but also the introspective search for its essence.

Art is like waves, sometimes strong and scary, sometimes delicate and soothing.

Just as Tony finds peace in the pool, I find it in the vastness of the sea, where every wave seems to whisper unheard stories to me, peace that calms the soul and mind, contrasting with the hustle and bustle of everyday life, which gives me a new perspective on life. Tony is an artist who experiences through feeling and thinking, not necessarily through will and ambition, introspection and the labyrinth of human interiority as captured in a painting like "The growing wave in Pourville" by Claude Monet, in the contrast between cold colors and warm ones. The wave is a strong and unpredictable force, and the sky is calm and clear, a contrast that creates a visual tension amplified by the fact that the wave is closer to the viewer than the sky.

Leadership: Can appreciating the present and the idea that you are part of a greater whole enhance your connection with yourself and give you a sense of a higher meaning of existence?

An artist may use the image of a swirling sea to represent a period of inner turmoil. In terms of the scene in the film, water was Tony's tool of expression, and swimming was his creative process. Man must be calm even when the sea is rough. He painted his own canvas of memories and emotions, coloring that moment of internalization with unique shades of life, namely: ephemerality, or the contrast between calm and storm, freedom and connection with nature. Indeed, waves come and go, each unique in form and movement. Therefore, this constant flow creates the idea of transience and renewal.

Appreciating the present is but a revision of the idea of the fleeting moment, part of a greater whole, for each wave, though fleeting, contributes to the rhythm and essence of the sea as a whole. Or the idea of being part of a greater whole, resonating with the image reflected by a deep sensation, mainly refers to the feeling of connection with something greater than ourselves, such as the universe or the life force of nature. This may denote a clear spiritual value, a spiritual kinship with the Florentine artists of the early Renaissance who were guided by the idea of "homo universalis", which is basically man perceived as a microcosm in relation to the macrocosm, seeing in man a reflection of the universe and divinity.

As for me, about the sea, about the waves and about swimming, about the sun that illuminates my moments of introspection, towards the deepening of the connection with myself, I can say that I am part of an image that is not imprisoned in the ephemeral, but free in eternity. The fact that the overall image I created is related to the artistic area, giving it a special value as an instrument of expression and communication of the idea of "transcendence and interconnection with nature", underlines the power of my art to evoke and to communicate transformations of the soul in the context of a reaction to external challenges and stimuli. Whether it's major life events, meaningful encounters, or simple everyday moments, they can trigger a series of inner changes.

As an expression of self-improvement aspirations, leadership focuses on those moments of internalization that catalyze personal growth in the context of a reaction to external challenges and stimuli.

Art, in its many forms, can capture these moments of introspection and response, reflecting the struggles, joys, and revelations that come with them. In this way, art provides us with a mirror in which we can see our own reactions and thus better understand the emotional and spiritual complexity of the human experience. Finally, when the last brush is put down and the last color dries on the canvas, there remains an unexpected cry rising to us - a complete work of art, a story told in color and form, a vast chapter in the evolution of the human spirit: exploration and self-knowledge.

The Law Of The Whole Narrowed To One refers to man's ability to connect to the vitality of nature by harmonizing with his inner self, where introspection becomes the bridge between individual consciousness and the universality of existence.

The Law Of Those Called Upon To Recreate Life

On April 16, 2017

Try to attain perfection without departing from the responsibility that must be assumed by refusing the condition of an ephemeral being and by becoming a "judge of life."

I had the impression that these people, through the action of the ruthless virus, behaving like computer programs that overturned any ad blocker by suggesting a naturalist fatality that pressed on the destiny of a tumultuous agony were serious mistakes in manifesting the fierce will of nature that wanted revenge at all costs.

The privilege of the richness and diversity of nature, a phenomenon of cannibalization as a symbol of rebirth in the heart of a cruel game, dealt with by an unknown factor, was to combine life with death. Brilliant biological evolution !

In this picture of fatality, the predominant fruit of genetics was indirectly a tributary of the much-challenged river of existence. It reminded me of those wonderful verses from the beginning of the Ecclesiastes, from which I selected only the words: "The vanity of vanities" due to general chaos, which, paradoxically, seemed to me to be revealing and refreshing.

Instead of accepting a stupid animal fatalism, to die in pain just to reach a wildlife imposed by the boundaries of advanced genetics, a Zombie, a performing hybrid in a pestilence of terror, it was better to follow Nietzsche's advice: "The one who has a reason to live for can endure almost anything."

And not only to endure the terror, to understand it, but to create from it the elementary conditions of a new life, more active moments of initiation, freer, to control it by means specific to the theory of evolution towards the Mendelian laws of genetics. Nothing and no one prevents me from promising to transform the world, electrified as a current descended from the space of an abstract mystic from contact with various bearers of the virus, demonstrating that in the depths of life there is an intense revolutionary activity.

Leadership: Do you impress to fulfill the purpose of life by moving from a state of acceptance of a fatalistic vision to a position of genuine curiosity in seeing who you really are?

With obvious attention, I realize that within me there is a fondness of malice, a cruelty of intellectual and realistic-naturalist taste if you want, an absolute immorality committed for purely Machiavellian reasons. But, at the same time, there was also a fear of a fatal contamination. They made me want to punish any mistakes, any deviation from the normal, unanimously accepted by the golden rules of medicine. Could I have abandoned my search for a cure just to enjoy the sight of death?

If I wanted to pass the experimental examination of genetics, untouched as a God by the great fate of nature I was witnessing with astonishment and interest, with the soul unconquered by the great fast of a biochemistry that had gone mad, I had to conform to a strange message, derived from the boldness of prohibited sciences: "Qualcosa è absolutamente non vero."

One of the aspirations of the scientist, in the view of the great doctor Constantin Maximilian, is to create life. "To control it, to become a demiurge of a universe – the genetic universe – happened by chance, started on unknown roads to the boundaries of danger and necessity, in a continuous game, without seemingly steady rules, it seems to me the most tremendous responsibility that must be assumed. We, an animal species deeply anchored in the history of the Earth, want to overcome the animal condition to become the judges of life."

One way to understand what life is trying to communicate is to design a new version of yourself in the context of the endeavor to head off on unknown roads without abandoning the search for a high ideal of perfection.

Creating a "shield" from the science of observing and applying the laws of life and exploring the self in the context of the reflection movement on the immediate reality is the best way to protect against the demands of reason based on discrimination that strengthens the individualistic dimension of one's own being.

The leader must be, first and foremost, the brilliant representative of humanism, starting from the motto: Man wishes to know all that can be known; this, let us research, seek, learn, know, attain perfection... without departing from the responsibility that must be assumed by refusing the condition of being ephemeral and by acquiring the status of a "judge of life."

Who are you really? Are you a man who endures terror in order to expand his research into new conditions sustaining life? Are you a man who judges life through the exploration of the surrounding nature that demonstrates its superiority? Are you a man who promises to turn the world into a balance of life, emboldened by the anticipation of the ultimate end? Or are you a man studying the effects of his evolutionary experiences in a mirror through which the Creator looks at himself?

The interpretation you give to events that happen to you reflects the level of supportability you tolerate in search of a life that can turn you either into a winner or a conqueror.

The Law Of Those Called Upon To Recreate Life can be defined according to the answer to the above questions. It applies to those who, with one sense of duty to science, a pretentious one, and by the obsession to record everything that is happening in the midst of the storms of life, try to make a final judgment that will raise them to the rank of Creator.

They should, however, recall that at the helm of their ship is someone much stronger. God.

The Law Of Value

On March 03, 2010

The more a player registers more performances, the more his own value and the one of the team he's a part of grows; and the more players a team has, the more its authority grows.

One of my passions was football. During college, I played almost every day with my class mates. We all had the same vision and will to get involved and because we were pretty good, we soon made up a stable team. We met on the playing field of the Faculty of Sport and, hour after hour, often till late afternoon, we played against different teams.

Of all, George Hahui, currently the football coach of a team in the USA, stood out the most; he was the best striker I have ever known. He scored consecutive goals, with his head, his foot, from penalty shots, one better than the other cross passes and goal passes, he made fast and fantastic dribblings, and, thanks to him, the match became a veritable show. He made the running of the team, he ruled the matches, he set the strategies, he was the captain.

In less than a semester, many schoolfellows had heard of him. Sometime, one evening, one of our PE Teachers, seeing him play, asked him if he wanted to enter the academic football championship. He accepted without taking too much thought. When he gave us the good news, he didn't omit pointing out: "We must keep up seriously with our trainings. We had our fun till now, but, as of tomorrow, we're all going to start playing better, giving a taste of our quality."

The one who proudly shows his attraction to what represents a style of transition between present needs and values open to the future will always be willing to demonstrate that he is the best model to follow.

From that moment on, everything changed. The intense training George was supervising was pretty hard and tiresome, but we got into our strides. When the academic championship started, out of the dozens of teams registered, ours wasn't twice-told. But with every match we won, our fame kept growing. We all played to the best of our abilities, everybody admired our dynamic and well-regulated game style. We were definitely the team with the highest chances to win the title before the finals; its value had enormously increased.

Unfortunately, we lost at the penalty shootout. We came out second place. The opposing team was very well organized, with many valuable players as well, but technically we were more endowed than them.

The benchmark of leadership is given by the player who scores the most goals even when he starts out in smaller teams.

Success is not an accident, nor a matter of luck. It's not a miracle or a goal, but a consequence. If we wouldn't have had George on our team, whose talent we all appreciated, if he wouldn't have encouraged and prepared us for victory, we certainly hadn't qualified insomuch as for the quarter finals. George was the key-player, he started the whole thing. He proved more than once his competence on the playing field, he grew in favor of everybody, he soon became famous, which determined the PE Teacher to suggest him to enter his team in the championship.

It was certainly his talent and performances that allowed us to ascend so close to the title. He formed the team, gave us hope and the needed training, supported and inspired us, improved our potential and encouraged us till the last moment, knowing that merely every player's impulse, desire and talent brings up a team's amazing success. We also struggled hard to evolve and to come to the same level as his. And our team, which wasn't twice-told at the start of the championship, ultimately became the most appreciated, with a dominating and well-defined game style, having very valuable players.

Leadership: Can you raise your attitude to what you have to do through a delimitation from the ideal of perfection?

A leader who likes to do his job as well as possible and wants to achieve success at any cost, to gather around him efficient and utterly reasoned people, and then he helps them evolve. He acknowledges the abilities of those he leads, he sets the tempo of the team, and just like a sailor, he looks for the less difficult way in order to reach the final destination.

Past all doubt, a winning team has a leader who sets things in motion. The more gifted the leader, the more the members of his team will be gifted. The more valuable he is, the more so becomes the team. And the more valuable his team is, the more its authority increases.

Perfection in football does not necessarily mean to score the most goals, but to hit the ball with so much power as to break down any negative feeling the team is going through.

Conclusion: Value is hard to achieve when there's no will of improvement and one indulges oneself in mediocrity or even impassivity, when instead of being competitive and "coming to the fore" we indulge ourselves in playing the invisible, remaining unknown, hiding behind others better than us. And especially the value is hard to achieve when there's no one setting things in motion, through his vision shared with others and through his personal example.

The Law That God Has Placed In My Life

On November 16, 2023

What you feel reflects what you discover when you look deep into your soul and ask yourself if you are ready to become the reflection of the divinity within you.

Perhaps God wanted to put my spirit to a new test, to see if it would purify itself or not. This being the purpose for which throughout my life I developed certain soul qualities, such as compassion and forgiveness. I realized that in order to convince God of my qualities, passed through a comprehensive purification, a reconversion of the senses to the deep essence, I must first be convinced myself that my deeds, everything I did unhindered, without any interference from outside influences or religious dogmas, were and are in full accord with His will.

And if a spirit like mine, free and cheerful, directly corresponding to the astral plane, is charged with two kinds of electricity: the will to win and the will to excel (which endures over time), to which is added discipline and concentration for the achievement of the objectives, then the vast territory of my faith will have as a form of manifestation a kind of divine predestination, an Icenach Haoserhis Uheontus , which makes the success acquired in this world a sign of the fact that I am among the chosen ones.

Endowed with a negative and a positive electrical fluid, my earth spirit must be predominantly charged with passion and enthusiasm to fuel creativity and inspiration on the wavelength of imperishable harmony by uniting a sense of inner peace with a good deed.

Leadership: Do you have an aura so strong that you experience that feeling of openness and deep connection with the universe, similar to what evolved man attributes to the astral body?

It happened recently in my life when I helped a friend in need: more than a listener I became a valuable ally in dealing with difficult times. Attentive, I listened with empathy, through my identification with a crystal that stimulates abilities such as courage, strength and determination. Feeling that I had been able to bring some peace and relief to his soul, I experienced a depth of satisfaction and inner peace, as if God himself approved and blessed this act of compassion and help.

Of course, in order to produce a positive electrical discharge from the heavenly area to the earthly world, so that I become aware of the presence of God in me, to be reconciled with all the consequences of my deeds, to feel that sensation of happiness that the evolved man attributes to the body astral, I first had to believe in the quality of a medium: to communicate with the spiritual world and to transmit messages and information from it.

Leadership: Do you need to experience special moments of introspection that trigger in you a feeling of closeness with the divinity, through a kind of mirroring of the other in you?

It is interesting that at the beginning I wanted to ignore any communication, any attempt to approach a "restless" person, a process that could have disturbed my Status Quo, the current state of balance, calm and serenity. However, within the great cosmic current, I had to be marked by a certain life experience that would trigger in me a feeling of closeness with the divinity.

When you listen to a "lost" man, you yourself begin to wander through thoughts that do not belong to you, but which reach the universe and find their own resonance there, contributing to its energy and vibration. In the deepest way, if you have a strong aura, your thoughts could respond to God's indication by the appearance of spiritual hearing: "look at yourself as if you were looking at a reflection of the other in you."

In heaven, as on earth, the nature of man and the immortality of the soul accompany him who, like a protective genius, continues to guide and influence spiritual and material evolution, ensuring that all the world progresses on its path, a path of release from any resentment or guilt.

Leadership: Can you act selflessly, manifesting your spirit and reflecting the noble soul of your double in the subtle world of energies and consciousnesses beyond the physical plane?

Other times, to act selflessly to bring forgiveness and reconciliation is to understand the power of spiritual likeness, felt in a different circumstance or context, where the connection between two souls is revealed in an entirely new and meaningful way. A kind of release of resentment, leaving the past behind and helping to heal relationships with generosity and compassion. Just like in the case of the great leader Ben-Hur:

Ben-Hur, a rich Jew wrongfully accused, becomes a slave in the Roman Empire. He is saved by Messala, his former friend who sent him into captivity, a tragic exile, full of suffering. Initially he wants revenge, but then he understands that forgiveness is the way to peace. When they meet again, Ben-Hur forgives Messala, demonstrating the nobility of his soul. This story symbolizes the quest for spiritual development through forgiveness and purification of the soul.

The path to liberation from other people's suffering is to practice compassion and empathy, to act altruistically as a form of manifestation of the spirit, experiencing the constant presence of your double as a mirror of your own noble soul, as a reflection in the subtle world of energies and consciousnesses beyond the physical plane, where spiritual forces, entities and experiences interact.

Leadership: Can you find yourself in a contrast of experiences, where you carried the other's light and he carried your darkness, in a game of destiny that revealed the depth of your spiritual connection?

In another life, you were him, and he was you. In another circumstance you carried his burden, and he carried your burden, in a play of fate that revealed the depth of your spiritual connection. In another perspective, you were his image, and he was your image. In a contrast of experiences, you carried his light, and he carried your darkness, in a belief system that values the connection between two worlds.

In a state of free spirit and wandering through the space of a divine dialogue, unseen but intuitive, you will see how at a certain moment of awareness of your "doubling" you will make efforts to reach a high goal, another level of spiritual experience, as and when you touch a crucifix when an oath is taken: a deep spiritual union and an unwavering bond in the search for truth and ascension. Basically, you become the mirror of the one next to you if you become aware of the depth and connection between your souls, reflecting on similarities and differences, and in this continuous process you learn to grow and evolve together within the same spiritual connection.

Therefore, the reflection of divinity in you is explained by the ability to synchronize your thoughts and emotions with the divine flow of harmony and compassion, which frees your heart from the burdens of resentment, allowing you to live in peace, in a light of the understanding of good and of the evil that guides you both: you who could be him, and he who can always be you.

This connects you to divinity and your spiritual essence. What you see in yourself has as a lever the potential to live in harmony with the influences of foreign thoughts, but still felt as part of your spiritual experience?

Leadership, referring to the astral plane where the spirit is found, is guided by the following rule: "what you see in yourself is what is reflected in you, a reflection of your consciousness".

The law that God has placed in my life can be nuanced like this: "The feelings you have at the gates of another can help you to strengthen the reflection of divinity in you."
